BEVERLEY ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Baron Martin, 11 March 1869.

Mr. Baron Martin.] THIS is a Petition presented by Luke Hind, John Armstrong, and Joseph Dannatt, which prays that it may be determined that Sir Henry Edwards and Edmund Hegan Kennard were not duly elected or returned at the late election, and that their election is void. It states two grounds upon which the election is sought to be so declared. The first is, that these gentlemen were guilty of the offences provided against by the 2nd section of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, which relates to bribery; and by the 4th section of the same Act, which relates to treating; and by the 5th section, which relates to undue influence. But the last averment in this Petition charges, as it seems to me, sufficiently well that this election is void by reason of the general bribery of a mass of persons who voted at it, whose votes were therefore worthless and of no avail. That seems to me to be sufficiently averred in the fourth paragraph of this Petition. I have given this matter as much consideration as is in my power, and if I thought it at all likely that further consideration would alter the view I have formed, I would postpone my judgment until to-morrow morning; but the conclusion that I have arrived at is a very clear one, and I think, for the reasons I shall state, that I am called upon to declare this election to be null and void.

The law upon this subject is perfectly clear. When persons have conferred upon them the franchise of voting at an election for Members of Parliament, or for any other office of trust, the law imposes upon them the duty of exercising that franchise honestly, and without being unduly influenced. It is the duty of every person who obtains the franchise so to act, and his real duty is to endeavour to determine which of the candidates he in his conscience believes to be the best fitted to represent the interests of the country in Parliament, and to vote for that man. Now, no doubt this is a duty of imperfect obligation, and that there are many influences which induce a voter not to act upon it, and which the law cannot prevent. No law could prevent the influence of relationship upon a person when called upon to vote for a relation; no law could prevent a man voting for a friend whom he had long known. Nor could it be possible to prevent gratitude for services conferred from having influence upon a person about to vote. These are influences which will exist as long as human nature exists, and no law could control them. Again, there are other influences which, in the same way, no law can control. The influence arising from high birth; from the candidate living in the neighbourhood of the town, and being known and respected there. This is a sort of influence which will exist, and properly ought to exist; but there have, from the earliest times, been what are called undue influences, and if a voter's mind is affected by an undue influence when giving his vote, the vote is void. A man giving a vote for a Member of Parliament under what the law deems undue influence gives no vote at all. It is the vote of a man who is incompetent to give one. The influence is difficult to be got at, but when it is got at it destroys the vote.

This is the common law of England; it depends upon no statute. It is true that the law was administered for years, indeed up to the present year, by a tribunal of persons not necessarily connected with the law, and there is no doubt that contradictory decisions have been given by Committees of the House of Commons, in my belief, intending to do what was right. But the matter is now to be decided by a judge appointed for the purpose. I need not say more, than that I sit under the compulsion of an Act of Parliament to try this case. It is no voluntary act of mine; I am sitting here under the compulsion of an Act of Parliament, and of the resolution of the Judges that it was my duty to undertake this office.

Now this is the common law, and it is a consequence of it, that if the judge is satisfied that the votes of a considerable number of persons were corrupted and bribed (in this case case I think there is evidence that from 800 to 1,000 were), if he arrives at that conclusion, however innocent the candidate may be, and though himself unconnected with corrupt practices, his election is void, by reason of the incapacity of the voters because of general corruption, to give valid and effective votes.

Corruption has existed to a very great extent in England, and Parliament has for the last 200 years, from time to time, endeavoured to stem it. They have enacted very many Acts, and the Acts which now exist are exceedingly strong and cogent. But in deciding that a Member is incapacitated from sitting by reason of an Act of Parliament, the judge must be satisfied that within the words of the Act a thing has been done for which the enactment declares his election to be void. And it is a mistake, which I have seen repeatedly in print during the last six weeks, to suppose that a judge in deciding upon an Election Petition may deal arbitrarily and according to his discretion with it; that if he thinks a thing has been done wrong by a candidate, although the Act of Parliament does not declare that it shall vacate the seat, he, exercising his discretion upon it, may declare the seat to be void, and so unseat the Member. I have seen that mistake in print more than once; and it seems to be supposed that if a thing is done by a candidate which is contrary to some Act of Parliament, the judge—although the Act does not provide that it shall cause a forfeiture of the seat—is to interfere and say, of his own mere will, that it does. But such is not the law; he has no discretion in the matter; he has to take the Act of Parliament and read it and give it its true construction, and except the facts are proved which the Act declares to affect the seat, he has no right to unseat the candidate. A judge is just as much bound by the law in trying an Election Petition as if he were trying a case at Nisi Prius, or trying a man for his life at York. He has no discretion whatever in the matter, he has merely to carry out the law.

With regard to the supposed offences against the Act of Parliament, I do not say that there is no evidence of them, because I think there is; but if the case rested upon the Act of Parliament alone, I should think that it would fail for want of proof of agency within the meaning of the statute. The case of undue influence that was brought forward yesterday with respect to the man Whitton, fails because there was no agency proved between Whitton and these gentlemen; and therefore the question depends upon the common law, and the facts which have been proved before me, and the inferences which I draw from them.

The facts are all pretty clear, and I am not aware of any discrepancy upon them, except that Mr. Wreghitt has sworn that what Vickers swore yesterday with respect to the 100 l. was not true. He also denied what was said with regard to a sum of 40 l. paid upon some former election; he says that that is not true. Whether he or Vickers was telling the truth I know not, nor is it material for me to decide, for in my judgment these matters are immaterial in the present case.

The facts are these, and I am now speaking of undoubted facts, proved as well by the evidence for the respondents as for the petitioners. It appears that Sir Henry Edwards is chairman of a company here, for the manufacture of waggons and agricultural implements, called the Beverley Waggon Company (Limited). And far be it from me to say that the circumstance of his being chairman of such a company is any disqualification for his sitting in Parliament. On the contrary, I think that no man is more fit to represent a town like Beverley than a man who is connected with business in it. I know no one who, primâ facie, is more entitled to consideration than such a man. The manager of that company is Mr. Norfolk, whose evidence we had to-day, and we shall see hereafter what part he took with regard to this matter.

It appears further, not merely from the evidence of Vickers, but from the evidence of Mr. Wreghitt himself, that the latter has been the agent of Sir Henry Edwards for the last 12 years. It seems that at the commencement of that time the constitution of the town council in this borough was a mixed constitution of Conservatives and Liberals, which is generally the case throughout the kingdom; but Mr. Wreghitt has stated that since then there has been bribery in every municipal election where a contest has taken place, and that the amount spent has averaged from 50 l. to 70 l. a year, and upon the contested elections, from 130 l. to 140 l.; in one election which occurred before, he said 300 l. was spent; but there has been systematic bribery at the elections of the town council of this borough for the 12 years during which he has acted as agent for Sir Henry Edwards. It may not be the result or the consequence of it, but the fact is, that that body is now substantially of one political party, and is now wholly in the hands of that party to which Mr. Wreghitt and Sir Henry Edwards belong.

But the matter does not rest here. The freemen of this town have a large quantity of land in which they are entitled to rights of pasture. Their rights are regulated by an Act of Parliament, the effect of which is that there are to be annually chosen 12 persons, who are called "pasture masters," and from the account which lies before me, they employ tradesmen and labourers to a considerable amount. I see that in one year 154 l. 18 s. seems to have been so expended by them. The annual income seems to be 940 l., a very large sum of money. It is not contradicted that from the time Mr. Wreghitt has acted in this borough, bribery has been made use of at every election of these pasture masters, and the effect has been that the whole of them are now of the one political party. It formerly was the practice that six of one side and six of the other held these offices.

These pasture-masters, under the will of a person named Walker, have the distribution of the interest of 1,400 l. Railway Stock, and nothing can be more plain and distinct than the direction of the will upon the matter. It is "to be divided amongst such poor freemen of the borough of Beverley, or their widows, or sons, as may require the same, by reason of losses that they may have sustained by the death of their horses, cattle, sheep, or pigs, and to enable them to purchase stock or carts, or necessary things of a like nature, to help them on in the world." And it is declared to be his wish and intention "that such payments and assistance should be made in such substantial sums as would effect the object that he had in view, and that they should not be given in any smaller amounts, so as to embrace a greater number of objects." I have before me an account of the manner in which this gift has been distributed last year, and instead of being distributed in considerable sums, it is distributed in a number of small sums. It extends over a great number of persons, and amongst them there are 33 who have votes, and of those, 26 votes were given for Sir Henry Edwards and Captain Kennard at the last election.

Now, if the case had rested here, you would have had in this borough bribing at the municipal elections, and in the result, the whole of the body substantially merged in one political party. You would have had that done avowedly by bribery and corruption; you would have had the Beverley pasture-masters elected in the same way by bribery and corruption, and the money distributed in the manner I have stated. That would itself be a matter that would tell much in consideration of the present question; but that is not all. It was known in the summer that the general election would take place as soon as the register could be completed. The then Government were pledged to that, and it was stated, in a letter from Mr. Hardy to the Mayor of Birmingham, that the dissolution would take place about the 12th November. It was therefore perfectly well known that the election would take place some time in November. The municipal election was held upon the 2nd November, and the other was imminent, and did, in point of fact, take place that day fortnight. Upon the Saturday before the municipal election, and upon the Monday (the day of the election), Mr. Norfolk (whose salary is 800 l. a year) applied to a bank in this town, and procured credit for the sum of 800 l. He did not want the money himself, but he obtained from the bank this sum of 800 l. upon his credit, and gave it for the purpose of being distributed in bribery to the men he named, several of whom were persons who have been proved to have accompanied Sir Henry Edwards and Captain Kennard during their canvass, and not one of them is called as a witness upon this trial. And although Mr. Wreghitt stated (and I have no doubt stated correctly) that the highest sum he had ever known employed in any previous municipal election for the purposes of bribery was from 120 l. to 130 l., upon Monday, the 2nd of November last, a fortnight before the Parliamentary election, the sum of 800 l. (six times as much as had ever been spent before) was spent in bribing. And by whom was it spent? It was spent by persons who are named—Mr. Lowther, Mr. Thirsk, and others, all active supporters of Sir H. Edwards.

But again, it is proved, and not disputed, that in the early part of the day the municipal election was decided; the money had done its work, and the Conservative party had obtained an overwhelming majority. But it is proved most distinctly, that after that was done man after man was bribed with sums varying from 1 l. to 15 s.; and it was proved, and not disputed, that the ordinary bribe at municipal elections did not exceed 5 s.; that it ranged from 2 s. to 5 s., and no evidence was given to the contrary. So that upon the 2nd of November last the bribe rose from 5 s., the utmost that had been given before, to three times that sum, and in some instances to four times. It was stated to-day in the witness-box by the gentleman who provided this money (Mr. Norfolk), that the 800 l. was so spent. Now, assuming that it was 1 l. each, there would be 800 persons bribed. Assuming it was 17 s. 6 d. or 15 s., of course the number would be larger, and I think that the evidence shows that in all probability there were bribed for the purpose of that municipal election a number approaching to 1,000 persons. Those persons are probably of a low class of life. There are 2,600 voters in this borough, and it would appear that for the municipal election (and the voters are pretty nearly the same persons who vote for the borough election) there were 800 persons at least to whom money was paid; so that the state of things was, that upon the Monday fortnight before the borough election 800 l. had been distributed substantially among the people who were about to vote at it by members of the Conservative party, many of whom accompanied Sir Henry Edwards and Captain Kennard in their canvass. What, then, is the inference to be drawn from that? Four or five witnesses, as Mr. Serjeant Sargood stated, swore they were told at the time that the money was for "the double event," which people in the East Riding of Yorkshire will readily understand. When I find the actual bribers, the persons who paid this money, active in support of the two candidates, and going about with them in their canvass; when I find bribes four times as much as the hitherto ordinary bribe, and when I find such an enormous sum of money spent, what conclusion can I, or can anyone, possibly draw from these facts? The conclusion, as it seems to me, is inevitable, that it was spent for the purpose of influencing the borough election as well as the municipal one. It seems to me that this is confirmed by every circumstance in the case. I fully accept what Sir Henry Edwards and what Captain Kennard say; I have no desire to impute to them any other than that they gave their evidence truly. But just consider what their partizans must have been. They were in company with them for a whole fortnight after the bribery. Lowther and Thirsk were both engaged in distributing the money, and yet those men never mentioned to Sir Henry Edwards or Captain Kennard what had taken place.

What

What does that tell to anyone, but that they knew the wicked work in which they had been concerned, and that they would not mention it to Sir Henry Edwards or Captain Kennard, because they thought (and I have no reason to say otherwise) that those two gentlemen would have stated their dissatisfaction and their unwillingness to be concerned in such a transaction; but that it was meant and intended for the purpose of the borough election, I have no more doubt in my own mind than that I am sitting in this chair. The men who bribed Lowther, Thirsk, Watson, and Vernom, are not one of them called to deny a single word that has been said. They are in this town, and could have been called without the slightest difficulty, but not one of them has been. What inference can any man draw from that, but that they perfectly well knew that if they were in the witness box it would be dragged from them that it was for the borough election they were acting as well as for the municipal? Not a man has been called for the Respondents connected with this town except Mr. Wreghitt, of whom I have already spoken, and Mr. Norfolk, the man who supplied the money. None of the others are called; and altogether it seems to me that the inference is irresistible, that this money was employed by them not only for the purpose of the municipal election, but also for the Parliamentary, and that there were a number of persons, to the extent that I have mentioned, bribed; for if they were not to that extent, the persons who did it being all partizans of the two gentlemen who were returned, could have been called to give an accurate account of the number. The book which Watson kept could have been produced, and it would have been seen who got the money from him; they could have told us, I have no doubt, every individual who received a bribe. The name of every person was probably taken down in writing, and could have been proved; and if this had been done, it would, I have no doubt, been found that the bribes had been paid to persons who were voters at the borough election, and that they had received bribes in regard to it. If that is so; if that is the legitimate conclusion to be drawn from the facts, what is the answer to it? Why, there is no answer at all. What answer do Mr. Norfolk and Mr. Wreghitt give to it? Mr. Norfolk says that he did not know anything about it. I daresay that he spoke the truth; he had given the money, and he kept away from it; he told us that he never came into the town except to his dinner. I have no doubt it is the truth that he did not know anything about it. But why did he not? Because he kept back purposely, and would not know. Again, Mr. Wreghitt would know. I cannot believe that a man who, according to his own account, had known of the bribing in this town in respect of municipal elections, could have been ignorant of what was going on on the day of the last election; yet we have no explanation whatever of it. The conclusion, therefore, that I come to is, that this money was expended in bribery; that that bribery was intended to operate upon both elections, and that it was to such an extent as to be general, that by the common law an election effected by such means was vicious from the commencement, and that no Members can hold their seats elected by such a bribed body of people, and that the election is null and void. And it is only right that it should be so. The law contemplates, as I have said, that the electors should give their votes purely and from conscientious motives, and that persons who go to Parliament should be elected by pure and free voters. The Member who goes into Parliament does not go merely to represent this town; he is not a Member for this town only; he is a Member for the British Empire; he is a Member to represent the interests of all, and to bind by his legislative acts every individual who lives under the Crown of England, whether within the United Kingdom or out of it; and therefore everyone has an interest in having men returned to Parliament by pure and honest means. And, again, as has been pointed out in one of the ablest judgments that have been given in these election inquiries, the minority have an interest in respect to this matter. The minority of the electors in a town have a right to have a man sent to Parliament who really and honestly represents honest electors, and they have a right to complain if such means are resorted to as have been resorted to here, for the purpose of influencing voters; and the colour that the bribe was given professedly for the municipal election, and that some witnesses said, "We received nothing for the borough election," is of no avail. It is quite true that they did not, in a sense; it was not paid to them the day before they went up to vote, but there was paid to them a fortnight before a sum far above the ordinary bribe, and they well understood what was the meaning of it; it was sworn by several people that it was said on the day what was its meaning. But if there was no such evidence at all, I should draw the conclusion from the fact of such an enormous sum of money being spent for the municipal election, that it was intended to operate, and did operate and did influence the votes given at the Parliamentary election. It was said yesterday, by Mr. Serjeant Ballantine, that a very great number of the 60 people who were called to prove that they had received this money voted the other way. It is perfectly true. But if we had had called before us the persons who paid the bribes, then we should have known to whom the residue of the money was paid; there could not have been 60 l. paid to the persons who were witnesses, because a considerable number of them were paid 17 s. 6 d. and 15 s.; but where the rest, the 740 l., went to, we know nothing, except that it almost all went in bribery, and never shall know anything, except that possibly an inquiry may take place in this town, when it may be ascertained.

I, therefore, am of opinion that this election is void at common law; that there is no necessity to have recourse to the statute at all; that there were a very very great number of the electors of this borough, who were bribed, and who gave their votes at the election, under the influence of bribery; under the influence of money, which if general has from the earliest ages of history been held to vitiate an election. Bribery is an indictable offence at common law; the briber and the bribed are equally indictable, and the Legislature have heaped up section upon section and Act upon Act, for the purpose of endeavouring to stop it, but the common law is still as it was, and in my judgment, by the operation of the common law, this election was a void election, and I shall so report to the Speaker.

I have some other matters to report upon with regard to this election, which I shall willingly do; I shall report that no evidence has been given before me to show that corrupt practices have been proved to have been committed, with the knowledge or consent of the candidates, at the election. I have pleasure in giving all credit to the evidence of the two gentlemen who have been examined; it would be wrong in me to state the contrary, after the evidence they have given. I, therefore, have pleasure in reporting that no corrupt practice has been proved before me, to have been committed, with the knowledge or consent of the candidates.

I have also to make a report whether corrupt practices have, or there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have, extensively prevailed in the election. I shall report to the Speaker that I think there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have so extensively prevailed. I am further called upon to make a special report with respect to matters arising in the course of the trial, which I think ought to be submitted to the House of Commons; I shall state substantially the evidence which has been laid before me, and it will then be for the House of Commons and the Attorney General to deal with it in such a manner as they think fit; the costs will follow the event.

Mr. Giffard.] With regard to the 12th section of the Act, I do not know whether your Lordship thinks that there was anything in the objection that was raised as to the admissibility of the evidence; your Lordship knows that I objected to the class of evidence going back beyond the particular election.

Mr. Baron Martin.] You did not object in such a way that I would reserve it at all; I did not understand the objection in that form, and took no note of it.

Mr. Giffard.] I am extremely sorry for it; I handed your Lordship Mr. Justice Blackburn's decision.

Mr. Baron Martin.] It is the invariable practice at Nisi Prius, that, if any gentleman intends any point of that kind reserved, he should intimate his intention.

Mr. Giffard.] I had intended to do so, and I am sorry your Lordship did not understand me so.

BEWDLEY ELECTION.

Bewdley.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Blackburn, 25th January 1869.

Mr. Justice Blackburn.] THERE are one or two small matters that I must reserve till I have read the notes carefully, and to which I shall refer a little later. But as to the general question, and the general grounds on which my decision proceeds, I can state them at once without any delay.

With regard to the case as it affects Sir Richard Glass, I do not think that anything has been brought forward here that would justify me at all in saying that Sir Richard Glass was personally cognisant of, or individually a party to, illegal practices. I think that Sir Richard Glass wished to be returned, and wished to be returned purely, and that he intended that everything should be done properly. There is some evidence that would go against Sir Richard Glass on that point, but I do not think it is by any means enough to lead me to the contrary conclusion. But Sir Richard Glass, like every other candidate who employs persons for him (agents to use the general term), is of course answerable (although penalties would not attach to him for the act unless it was authorised by him), to the extent of losing his seat, if any person employed in the election as an agent for him was guilty of a corrupt practice.

Now, as to that, it is a matter of general importance that it should be known what would constitute evidence of being an agent or being employed. And upon that I can only say in general that I think one could not lay down a precise rule. I think that every instance in which it is shown that, either with the knowledge of the Member or candidate himself, or to the knowledge of his agents who had employment from him, a person acts at all in furthering the election for him, in trying to get votes for him, is evidence tending to show that the person so acting was authorised to act as his agent. I do not think it is by any means essential that it should be shown that a person so employed, in order to be an agent for that purpose, is paid in the slightest degree, or is in the nature of being a paid person. But I think it is a question what is sufficient evidence upon that point. I should apprehend that where there is evidence given, as in this case, that when the candidate is going about canvassing, a gentleman goes previously and requests voters, in some such way as this, "Will you meet Sir Richard Glass in such and such a place?" And then, when he comes to that place, says, "Here is Sir Richard Glass come to ask for your vote;" or says to the person, what would certainly be implied or understood, "Here is Sir Richard, for whom I wish you to vote." All that is evidence to show that that person was an agent. And I take it that the question for the Court sitting to try the case comes ultimately to be, whether, upon the aggregate of all these things taken together, of which each in itself is little, but is certainly some evidence, the person is shown to have been employed to such an extent as to make him an agent for whom the candidate would be responsible. That, I apprehend, will be the point upon which Judges will find the greatest difficulty, where there is some evidence, which, if there was a jury, you could not withdraw from it; cases in which every one would agree that there was some evidence; the question is whether that evidence is sufficient or not. In each case the Judge must decide, treating himself as a jury or an election committee. I take it that in each case the Judge must bring common sense to bear upon it, and satisfy himself whether it is sufficient or not. I do not think that such a question as that would turn upon minute particulars as to what particular words were used or what particular thing was done, but upon the common-sense broad view of it.

In the present case I feel no difficulty whatever about it; because, in the present case, it is clearly proved, and not a disputed fact, that Sir Richard Glass deposited a considerable sum, 1,100 l. altogether, in the hands of Mr. Crowther and Mr. Pardoe, directing them in his letters (and I see no reason to doubt directing them bonâ fide) that they should apply that money to honest and good purposes, but giving that money to them, and not exercising, either personally or by anyone else, any control over the manner in which that money was to be spent, and not, in fact, knowing how that money was spent. Upon that I can come to no other conclusion than this: that he did make these two persons (it applies principally to Mr. Pardoe, but it applies to Mr. Crowther also) his agents for the election to almost the fullest extent to which agency can be given; and I think that a person proved to be an agent to this extent does not merely himself stand as an agent to the candidate (in this instance Sir Richard Glass), but also that a person proved to be agent to this extent makes those agents whom he employs. The extent to which a person is an agent differs according to what he is shown to have done. I take it that an agent employed so extensively as is shown here does make the candidate responsible, not only for his own acts, but also for the acts of those whom he, the agent, did so employ, even though they are persons whom the candidate might not know or be brought in personal contact with.

The analogy which I put to Mr. Giffard in the course of the case, I think, is a strong one; but it would convey my meaning more to a lawyer than to the general public the analogy of the liability of the sheriff for the undersheriff, where he is not merely responsible for the acts which he himself has done, but also for the acts of those whom the undersheriff employs, and not only responsible for the acts done by virtue of the mandate, but also for the acts done under colour of the mandate, matters which have been carried very far indeed in relation to the sheriff. I need not enter upon the extent to which that goes in law, but to a lawyer that would indicate at once to what extent the responsibility for an agent who was shown to be so extensively employed as those agents who had funds put into their hands for the purpose of the election does fix the candidate.

Then it comes to this question. Is it shown that there was any corrupt practice on the part of the agents thus employed, or on the part of those whom they employed for them? Now upon that, the first question is the question of treating. The statute which now regulates treating, the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 4, "The Corrupt Practices Act," makes it a distinct matter. "Every candidate at an election who shall corruptly by himself, or by or with any other person, or by any other ways or means on his behalf, at any time either before, during, or after any election, directly or indirectly give or provide, or cause to be given or provided, or shall be accessory to the giving or providing, or shall pay wholly or in part any expenses incurred for any meat, drink, entertainment, or provision, to or for any person, in order to be elected, or for being elected, or for the purpose of corruptly influencing such person, or any other person to give or refrain from giving his vote," &c. Looking at those words, it is plain that those who prepared the Act have endeavoured to take in almost everything that could possibly be taken in, but they have very properly and wisely, I think, governed it all by the word "corruptly." And upon that word "corruptly," I think there can be no doubt at all that the true construction of the Act is that which was stated by Mr. Justice Willes in giving his opinion in the House of Lords in the case which has been referred to, Cooper v. Slade, that "corruptly" there does not mean wickedly, or immorally, or dishonestly, or anything of the sort, but with the object and intention of doing that which the Legislature plainly meant to forbid. In fact, giving meat or drink is treating when the person who gives it has an intention of treating, not otherwise; and in all cases where there is any evidence to show that meat or drink has been given, it is a question of fact for the Judge to try the matter whether he thinks that the intention is made out by the evidence, which, in every individual case, must stand upon its own grounds, and upon which I can only remark, as I did in the course of the inquiry, when speaking to Mr. Giffard; but I state it now deliberately, that although each individual case may be a mere feather's weight by itself, and so small that one would not act upon it, yet, if there is a large number of such cases, a large number of slight cases will together make a strong one; and consequently it would always be a very important inquiry what was the scale, the amount, and the extent to which it was done. To illustrate my meaning, I will take one of the small cases that were pointed out. I cannot doubt at all the fact that when Sir Richard Glass had been speaking for some time to a man (I believe Dark is his name), who I think was not a voter, one of the people in the company of Sir Richard Glass did give that man a shilling to drink Sir Richard Glass's health, and that was evidence tending to show treating. But if that stood alone, and if I were considering whether such a thing fell within the meaning of and proved "corrupt treating," I should not think so. I think that in considering what is corrupt treating, and what is not, we must look broadly to the common sense of the thing. There is an old legal maxim, "Inter apices juris summa injuria." To go by the strict letter of the law often would produce very grave wrong. I think that if we were to say that an election was void upon a single case of that sort, we should be going to the "apices juris," and that the result would be "summa injuria." Therefore, the inquiry must be as to the extent and amount of such cases.

But the evidence here shows that a large number of public-houses, very nearly 20 (I think 19 or 20), were at many times during the election habitually open, and whoever went in there to get drink got drink. When we find that done, it would be a perfect mockery if one were to say that he doubted that that was done with a corrupt intention, with an intention that it might produce the mischief which the Legislature intended to forbid under the name of treating, and that it was consequently corrupt treating.

Then comes the question by whom was it done? Was it done by any agent for whom Sir Richard Glass is responsible? We had at first a great deal of circumstantial evidence about that; but now it comes at last to this, that Burnish, Pardoe's clerk, who was very considerably employed during this election as Pardoe's clerk, did order all this drink and control the beer. That he gave it, and that he did so from a corrupt motive, I think there can be no question at all.

Another question which seems material is, whether or no Pardoe, his employer, was at all cognizant of or responsible for this. But as far as avoiding the election goes, I have no hesitation whatever in coming to the conclusion that Pardoe himself being employed as he was in the election generally, and money put in his hands to distribute (I do not rely so much upon his being election agent to pay money alone, because it might be given to a person to pay against vouchers, who was in no way connected with the election at all), as an agent of Sir Richard Glass, and that every person whom he employed in the election is also an agent of Sir Richard Glass. Then comes the question, is there evidence here, which I can reasonably doubt, that Burnish was so employed for the purposes of the election? I find that he was Pardoe's clerk, and that during almost all this time he seems to have been busily engaged, chiefly about election matters, although he appears to have done some other things also. Among the few expenses paid by the election agent, there is a bill for some weeks, I think it was, for Burnish's residence, and board and lodging in the neighbourhood, showing that he was, during all that time, employed on election business. Taking all those circumstances together, I consider that, even if Burnish had ordered all this drink and all this treating with his own hand, without authority from anybody, and paid for it out of his own pocket, that of itself would have been sufficient to avoid the election. I mention that, because I think it desirable that it should be known how far I go, and what the law is, upon the evidence. But I think, as a matter of fact, it is impossible to doubt that Burnish did not mean to pay it out of his own pocket, and did not mean to pay it out of the funds of what is called the Conservative Working Men's Association, and that he did mean to pledge, when he ordered these large quantities of drink, and that it was understood by those who were furnishing it that he was pledging, the election funds; that he was pledging Messrs. Pardoe and the other people who paid the election money, and that this was intended to be paid out of the funds.

And here it becomes a material thing to see how the election expenses were returned. Mr. Pardoe was examined, and upon Mr. Pardoe's evidence it would seem that he himself, whether it was suggested by Mr. Stephen, was wilfully ignorant, or whether it was as Mr. Giffard rather explained it, as I gathered from something he said, that he had got somewhat superannuated, did not personally do much, but that he trusted everything to his clerks, including Burnish. Burnish is one of the persons who make out the list of the watchers to be paid. Burnish is the person who goes and attends all these meetings. Burnish is at the public-houses, and there is great force in Mr. Stephen's remark, that it is not credible that a man who has a salaried clerk would let that salaried clerk spend his time in public-houses and such places, and get remuneration for it unless he intended him to do so. I, therefore, can have no doubt in coming to the conclusion that Burnish was acting there as an agent for the purposes of the election of Sir Richard Glass, being employed by Mr. Pardoe for that purpose, and authorised by Mr. Pardoe for that purpose; and in consequence the corrupt treating, which is clearly proved to have been done by Burnish, is clearly proved to have been done by Mr. Pardoe also. That seems to me important, because, when I report, as I shall in my certificate, to the Speaker, that Pardoe and Burnish are guilty of corrupt treating, that will render it impossible for them to act in any election matter, or to be employed in any election matter, for seven years to come; a thing which, of course, I should not do unless I were quite satisfied of the fact.

Pardoe

Another matter I must remark upon, and which weighs with me very much, is the mode in which the election expenses have been returned. At present I have not to do with the very stringent provisions of the Act of Parliament, or to say how far they may subject either Sir Richard Glass or Mr. Pardoe or Mr. Crowther to the penalties of that Act, nor how far they will practically prevent those people who have given credit for election expenses, and have not sent in their bills within a month, from being paid and recovering the money afterwards; all that will be for others to consider amongst themselves. I can only say, that if the practical result be that the keepers of the different public-houses, who have supplied the beer for the purpose, lose their payment, and find that instead of making money out of it they are losers of so much, I shall not regret it. But whether that is so or not I have nothing at present to do with that.

But I have to do with this; and I think it is a very important matter of evidence to see whether it would show anything corrupt, personally, on the part of Sir Richard Glass, or of his election agents. Now it is quite true that Sir Richard Glass, as Mr. Stephen pointed out, in paying money to Mr. Crowther, did, in the most direct terms, act contrary to the Election Auditors Act. He did then pay it to a person who was not declared to be the election agent. Then comes the question, does that show that Sir Richard Glass, when he paid that money into the hands of his agents, had a personal knowledge or intention that it should be bestowed in corrupt practices. Now upon that I cannot in the slightest degree doubt, myself, that the fact that a fund was placed in the hands of an agent by a candidate, if it is shown that that agent expended it in corrupt practices afterwards, is evidence tending to show that the candidate paying into those hands the money which was spent in corrupt practices, was himself intending that it should be spent in corrupt practices. I do not suppose that there has ever been in a corrupt election of any sort a candidate who was foolish enough, when he paid a large sum of money into the hands of a person, to say, "Bestow this in corrupt practices;" he would hand over a large sum of money to a person and say (I think I have seen this in novels), "On no account let there be any bribery, but bestow all this five or six thousand pounds on the poor." I should not doubt, if such a case came before me, in which the five or six thousand went in bribery, that the candidate did intend it to be done.

Then it seems to be a question to what extent it was shown, if the money was bestowed for corrupt practices, that the candidate who gave the money was aware of it; and in that case, also, the extent to which it was shown that there were corrupt practices would be very material. I think if it were shown that there had been here, as in many other boroughs in former times, and it may be now, extensive bribery, a large number of people bribed, corrupt clubs paid money, and so forth, it would be a very serious question whether the candidate, in putting money into the hands of his agents, was not personally cognizant of it. But it does not come to any such question here. Corrupt treating is shown, but I do not think it is shown that Sir Richard Glass expected it. Therefore I do not think that the evidence is enough to show that Sir Richard Glass, I will not say did not exactly mean the money to go in corrupt practices, but was willing that it should go in corrupt practices, when he paid it into his agents' hands. I do not think there is sufficient evidence in the case to make me find anything against Sir Richard Glass personally. I rather think that the very severe penalties that are attached to a candidate for being a party to a corrupt practice do not extend to all corrupt practices, but only to bribery. In the present case, however, there is nothing to show that any of this amount was bestowed upon bribery in such a way as to subject Sir Richard Glass to those penalties, even if personal knowledge were brought home to him; but I do not think that personal knowledge was brought home to him.

When you come to the other question, whether the money was properly bestowed, and whether Pardoe properly bestowed it, it is impossible to avoid coming to the conclusion, when you look at the mode in which these election expenses were returned, carefully avoiding returning very considerable items that had been actually paid before, sums which you cannot possibly suppose were omitted by accident, such as 120 £. and 90 £., and then the not complying with the Act of Parliament, which I should have thought any person must have distinctly understood who looked at it, by returning what were the expenses incurred, whether paid or not (for instance, the bill at the "George" of 120 £. could not have been left out by accident; I can hardly imagine that any person should have thought that that 120 £., though not actually paid, should not have been returned), that all that was done simply for the purpose of baffling the Act of Parliament, and rendering it a nullity, and not letting it be known what the money was spent for. All that is evidence leading to the conclusion that Mr. Pardoe knew perfectly well that the money was bestowed for purposes which would not bear the light of day. Though he may have frequently committed folly in the matter, the evidence leads to the conclusion that he knew that the money was so bestowed.

As I said before, I must, therefore, find and return distinctly that there was corrupt treating by Sir Richard Glass's agents, and that that corrupt treating extensively prevailed in the borough. I think I should say, in fairness there, that though there is some evidence that there were some on Mr. Lloyd's side who got drink, there is no evidence to show that there was any extensive giving of drink on his side, though there may have been some. There being this practice of treating to this extent in the borough, I think I must say, moreover, that Mr. Pardoe and Mr. Burnish were personally guilty of it. There was quite sufficient treating to upset the election. That is enough on that point.

Then comes another question on which I must make some observations, and that is the employment of watchers. Now I think that the fair result of what I gather from the evidence leads me to this conclusion, that it has been a long-established practice in Bewdley to pay men for what is called watching, but in reality is doing nothing. It has been an old practice which, I suppose, people consider a sort of perquisite of elections, and, therefore, it has been continued. This has been done, as far as the evidence goes, more extensively on one side than on the other; but it appears to have been done on both sides, and it is a very mischievous system. It comes within all the mischief of treating; in the first place, it indirectly influences the men, whether voters or not; if they are not voters it indirectly influences all their friends and other voters. In the second place, when it is given to voters, it would in all human probability lead to an expenditure by them in public-houses and elsewhere, which would indirectly influence voters. In that way it falls within all the mischief of treating, but no statute has yet been passed rendering it of the same effect as treating. Whether the Legislature will think proper to interfere with it hereafter it is not for me to say. It is quite true that where a voter has been employed, no matter whether he has been paid or not, where he has been retained with the expectation that he is to be paid, whether paid or not, his vote would be void. That several people here on this occasion acted as watchers, in the expectation and hope that they would afterwards be paid, I think, is pretty clearly made out. A warning having been given that if they were paid, their votes would be altogether void, that those people were not, in fact, paid is also perfectly plain. If it came to a scrutiny it would be material of course to see how many were actually employed; but on the present inquiry, the scrutiny having been abandoned, the question only is, whether or no the payment made to people for this work of watching, which I must say was not work at all, was with a view of procuring their votes so as to give them employment under this form, in which case it would be bribery. As to that, the evidence has not succeeded in bringing home any particular cases to that extent which would justify me in finding it; I think, therefore, upon this occasion I can only mention that this corrupt practice, for I think it is a corrupt practice, has prevailed. After the warning now given, I should think in the next contested election, whenever it takes place, people will be very cautious to avoid doing this, because otherwise the remark upon its being really bribery would be very strong. I must, then, report to the Speaker that there has prevailed such a corrupt practice to this extent.

The only other thing for me to consider is this, I think, as I have already pointed out, that the practice, of watching has an indirect tendency towards bribery and this practice does exist very extensively. But, upon the evidence before me, I think that, although it may have occurred in isolated cases, there is no ground for supposing that direct general bribery has prevailed to any extent in the borough. That being so, I shall mention that also, which is an important element to be considered.

Then there comes the question as to specific instances of bribery. The Act of Parliament requires me to mention every instance in which it has been proved before me that any particular person has been guilty of bribery or any corrupt practices. I must mention, therefore, what persons have been proved to me to have been guilty in those respects. There is nothing in this part of the case in regard to specific persons that would turn the general result at all. The effect could only be to avoid the election, and that is done already. I do not think that any evidence has been given to prove a person to have been bribed by an agent for whom Sir Richard Glass would be directly responsible. I do not think, therefore, that I need at present inquire into that branch of the case. Three or four persons have been mentioned who are alleged to have been bribed, and some evidence has been given upon those cases. I reserve for my consideration, before I make my certificate, which of them I shall mention as having been bribed. My decision will be known, of course, when I send in my certificate; but at present I do not enter into these individual cases or give the results beforehand.

The only thing remaining is the question as to the costs of the election petition. Now, as Mr. Lloyd has succeeded in showing that the election has been avoided by the acts of persons for whom Sir Richard Glass is responsible, the prima facie general rule, that the successful party has his costs, prevails. If it appeared that there was anything particularly vexatious or annoying I would deduct that from the costs; but at present I do not see that there is any head which I can strike off. I will hear any remarks which may be made upon it; but at present I must say that it seems to me that Sir Richard Glass must bear the costs.

Nothing further occurs to me as requiring to be said now. If there is anything which I have omitted, or which I am supposed to have omitted, I should be glad if either side would mention it.

Mr. Giffard submitted that the costs of preparation for the scrutiny ought not to fall upon the Respondent.

Mr. Justice Blackburn stated that inasmuch as the words of the Act in relation to the costs were, "And shall be defrayed by the parties to the petition in such manner and in such proportions as the Court or Judge may determine;" and inasmuch as it might be fairly fairly presumed that if the Petitioners had proceeded with the scrutiny, they would not have been successful in it, his decision was that the costs of the Petitioners should be borne by the Respondent, except those incurred solely and exclusively for the scrutiny.

Mr. Fitzjames Stephen reminded his Lordship that Bewdley and Stourport were independent places, and asked him to report that treating had not extensively prevailed at Stourport.

Mr. Justice Blackburn stated that he could not enter into that distinction, but must confine his Report to the borough as a whole.

Bewdley.

BLACKBURN ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Willes, 16th March 1869.

Blackburn.

Mr. Justice Willes.] THIS is a petition praying that it may be determined that William Henry Hornby and Joseph Fielden were not nor was either of them duly elected or returned at the last election for this borough, and that the election should be declared void, and the petition states several grounds upon which the court is invited to arrive at that conclusion. One ground alleged was bribery. That is put forward in the petition. It was adhered to in the particulars delivered shortly before this case was coming on for trial. Another was treating. That, in like manner, was adhered to until a short time before the petition came on for trial. Both of those grounds for the petition have been abandoned, and there has not appeared in the course of the inquiry any reason for supposing that those grounds ought ever to have been laid, and I could have desired, with respect to this or any constituency anxious to maintain its honour and its credit, that those grounds, as they have been largely put forward on the part of the Petitioners, and specifically adhered to up to a late moment, had been more amply withdrawn. It must be taken that they did not exist. So far the election must be taken to have been a creditable election.

It has farther been suggested that the election was void upon the ground of undue influence, upon the ground that the voters were not left to the free exercise of the franchise as they were entitled to be, but that they were unduly influenced, partly by persons having authority over them as employers, or as servants of their employers who had a right to dismiss them, dismissing certain of them because of their political opinions, and thereby not only persecuting those who were sent away, but also intimidating those who were allowed to stay, and making it less easy for them to make up their minds in comfort, and to express their opinions with freedom.

Lastly, it was suggested by the petition that undue influence and intimidation, of the description charged, had extended (because so I must read the general clause with which the petition concludes) to such a length as to be general, and that the election ought to be declared to be void upon the ground of general corruption, whether in the shape of the abandoned charges, or of undue influence, the charge adhered to, extending to such a body of persons in the borough, that, quite apart from any influence of either the Members or their agents, there was no freedom of election here.

Now with regard to that last charge, it is unnecessary to consider the technical reasons which were advanced for holding that no judgment could be founded upon it, because, although at one time in the course of the inquiry, in consequence of the answers given by a witness, I think, called Ramsbottom, and the witness who immediately followed him, there did seem to be some grounds for supposing that there was general ill-will amongst the voters of Blackburn, at least that numerous body of the voters consisting of the working classes, and that they were generally disposed to ill-use and persecute one another because of their political opinions, yet it is quite obvious, from the general tenor of the evidence, that Ramsbottom's judgment, which one ought to say, however, was rather extracted from him by sudden questions than given as the result of his deliberate conviction, was an unjust judgment, so far as it applies to the general body of his fellow-workmen in Blackburn. It is quite obvious, therefore, as the result of the inquiry, that there was no bribery of which the court can take notice, no treating of which the court can take notice, and if there were any of either, of course it would have been brought forward; and that with respect to any general ill-feeling amongst the working classes in Blackburn, such ill-feeling only existed in the imagination of one or two men who had been ill-treated unquestionably, I think both those men were ill-treated, but who, having been ill-treated by individuals, extended their just judgment of the conduct of those individuals to an unjust judgment upon the class to which they belong in this borough. Having put those questions, and having elicited those answers, I feel bound to say that those answers were exaggerated, and I am satisfied that there was no such general ill-feeling in the place; indeed, if there were, it is impossible that one could have witnessed so much good and orderly conduct, as one has done during one's stay in Blackburn, of the very great masses of people who have been assembled, taking an interest, apparently, in this inquiry, and who have conducted themselves in the most peaceable and orderly manner.

Well, the inquiry, therefore, is limited to the charge contained in the fifth clause of the petition, and that charge is, in effect, this, that the sitting members, by themselves, or by some agent or agents of theirs, have practised undue influence with reference to the Parliamentary election; and that again is limited to acts of an agent or agents, because Mr. Hornby and Mr. Fielden having been called as witnesses, have denied it, and everybody appeared to be satisfied with their denial, and I myself am thoroughly convinced of its truth; indeed, there was no evidence against them personally to make it necessary that they should come forward if they had been unwilling to do so, but they did come forward, and everybody appears to be satisfied (and I am of the universal opinion upon that subject) that no misconduct can be attributed to either of those gentlemen. They must stand entirely acquitted personally of any misconduct or irregularity in the course of the election. The only suggestion made upon the evidence against either of them was the suggestion founded upon the evidence of the witness Carroll, who stated that some persons had told him that it would be the worse for his daughters, who were working in Mr. Hornby's mill, unless he took a certain political line against his principles, which line he did not choose to take; and then it was said that his daughters were interfered with, and that, finally, on the third of this month they were sent away from Mr. Hornby's mill. Carroll stated that it was the act of individuals who had nothing to do with Mr. Hornby, and evidently were acting without his authority; and to conclude that those girls were sent away from the mill on the third of this month, so long after the election, and just before this petition was coming on, upon the ground of the politics of their father, would be a conclusion absurdly reprehensible and far-fetched, to an extent beyond anything which I think the most suspicious mind can entertain now that the evidence has been given and the amount of it ascertained. There is not the slightest ground with respect to either of those gentlemen for saying that he personally was guilty of or sanctioned undue influence in the course of the election.

Well, then, was any agent of theirs guilty of undue influence with respect to any voter as touching his vote at the Parliamentary election? That is the true question which the court has to determine, and upon that there is a mass of evidence requiring the most serious consideration, and upon which it becomes my duty to pronounce.

Goodwin's Case,
2 State Trials, 91.

Nothing can be clearer than this law; it has existed for a very considerable period; I believe certainly from as early as the time when James I. came to the throne. Some 265 years ago, the general principle was laid down upon the first and only occasion upon which the jurisdiction of the House of Commons over Parliamentary elections was seriously questioned, and upon which occasion it was confirmed, and it is enacted and settled as the law, by the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act of 1854, section 36, which, to my mind, does no more than lay down in very distinct terms that which always had been the understood law of Parliament, or rather the common law of the land, with respect to the election of Members of Parliament; that is to say, that no matter how well the Member may have conducted himself in the election, no matter how clear his character may be from any imputation of corrupt practice in the matter, yet if an authorised agent of his, a person who has been set in motion by him to conduct the election or canvass voters on his behalf, is, in the course of his agency, guilty of corrupt practices, an election obtained under such circumstances cannot be maintained. As it has been expressed from early time, no person can win and a wear prize upon whose behalf the contest has not been fairly carried on, or, as it was expressed upon the occasion to which I refer, non coronabitur qui non legitime certaverit,* which is only so much in Latin, showing the antiquity of the principle which I have already expressed in English; no person is to have or wear the prize on whose behalf the contest has not been legitimately and fairly carried on; and whether it be that the person who contends himself in respect of any unfair play of his, whether it be the owner of a horse in respect of the unfair play of his jockey, whether it be the owner of a ship in respect of the fault of his steersman or the hoisting of an additional sail against the rules of the race by one of the seamen, or whether it be the candidate in a Parliamentary contest in respect of his agent, in every one of those cases, whether it be the principal who has been guilty of the illegality, or whether the illegality has been committed by his agent only, even though without his authority or against his will, provided it be done in the course of his agency, and for the supposed benefit of his principal, such principal must bear the brunt, and cannot hold the benefit in respect of which the agent has compromised him, and would, in a matter of this description, have also betrayed the public, who have a right that a just election shall be had. The amount of the injury done by the agent, if the injury has been done of the character which I have described, is immaterial. If an agent bribe one voter with half-a-crown, and that voter votes for the candidate, election void. If an agent bribe one voter with half-a-crown and the voter taking the half-a-crown, with purpose express or implied of voting accordingly, should break his promise and vote for the other side, election still void. Although the result of the bribe was nothing as to the poll, the result was, in point of law, that an illegality illegality of so gross a character and so difficult to trace would have been committed, that no election would be safe, no community would be sure but that elections were gained by the exercise of corrupt influences, unless, for the sake of all, the election in which an agent had been guilty of such a mal-practice were held void as against the principal of that agent. It is not by way of punishment to the principal that the election is held void; it is not because the majority has been swayed or even affected by the mal-practice, that the election is held void, but it is because mal-practices, designated as corrupt by the common law and by the Legislature in the Corrupt Practices Act, are so odious and are so dangerous that it is thought better to hold void an election where either such practices have generally prevailed, whether traceable to a Member or his agents or not, or where a single instance of such corrupt practice has been distinctly traced to the Member or to an agent of the Member.

* Mr. A. E. Hardy, of the Inner Temple, has drawn my attention to the fact that this maxim is adapted from the Vulgate, 2 Tim. ii. 5, "Num et qui certat in agone non coronatur nisi legitime certaverit."

The question for consideration here, therefore, is whether, upon the evidence brought before the court, it has been proved that such corrupt practices have taken place. It must steadily be borne in mind what is the question; whether any voters or any voter at the Parliamentary election has, in respect of his vote, been unduly influenced by an agent of the sitting Member? If so, the court has no alternative, whatever regret may be felt in the individual case and with reference to the particular constituency that so grave a result should follow from acts which to some, not to me, may appear to be trifling; the only duty of the court, if that can be made out in the affirmative, is to pronounce the election to be void. If that has not been made out in the affirmative, the duty of the court is to pronounce the election to be valid.

Well, now, to come a little nearer to the precise question in this case. It must be made out affirmatively upon the part of the petitioners, for the purpose of founding a judgment to void the election, that there was undue influence, and the particular sort of undue influence here alleged is the intimidation of persons in employment. It must be made out, (1,) that that undue influence was used; (2,) that it was with reference to the Parliamentary election; and it must be made out, (3,) that it was undue influence exercised by an agent of the sitting Members. With respect to the first head, it does not appear to me to admit of much remark. Ingenious criticism may be applied to the language of the 5th section of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act as to what is practising intimidation, and what is inducing to vote or not to vote; and I can conceive cases exceedingly difficult to deal with arising under that section. I can conceive of cases in which fellow-servants ill-treat one another, and even expel one another from the common place of employment, and they unquestionably are guilty of the offence against which the undue influence clause of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act is specially directed. I can conceive of their being guilty of that offence in the worst form in which it appeared at one at least of the mills to which reference has been made in the course of the evidence, that of persons ill-using one another, shoving, pushing, and throwing mud, resorting to violence and acts of ignominy, which it is quite sad to think should have been committed by one working man against another. And I can conceive the case of a master who, though he must know that the law authorises him to interfere for the protection of his servants, to prevent acts of violence and breaches of the peace against them, especially when they are engaged in his lawful employment and endeavouring to serve him, being so wrapped up in his own business or so dead to the indignation which ought to arouse a man's mind at seeing others ill-treated, as to stand by and fold his hands and let matters take their course; and I can conceive that in an indictment against the master, under such circumstances, it might yet be impossible to procure a verdict visiting criminal consequences upon his head. I put the case quite abstractedly; in such a case I should not much pity the master if the jury said he must have known that if he interfered he could have prevented the men from doing what they did; if he felt he was too weak to interfere, at least he ought to have remonstrated and retired; and if he did not approve, one would expect that he would have visited upon the men, if not dismissal, at least reproaches or rebukes for the misconduct of which they had been guilty in his presence; and as he did not, we arrive at the conclusion that he must have been abetting, or, as a great personage who in his youth was present at a great crime, himself afterwards described it in his repentance, "consenting" to what was done. And if a jury under such circumstances did convict the employer, I do not think that anybody could blame them. At the same time, if the jury gave him the benefit of the doubt, and thought that his abstaining from interfering was from weakness or pusillanimity, or even looking rather to his pecuniary interests than to his moral duty, in the protection of those over whom he had influence, and whom he ought to have restrained on the one hand, and protected on the other, nobody could blame them if they gave him the benefit of the doubt, and acquitted him. I can conceive in such cases very great difficulty in fixing the master. I cannot, however, doubt that if such a practice as that were general, that if in many mills there were outbursts of that description, and that the masters or those in authority in each stood by and did not interfere at the time or afterwards in the manner which I have referred to—I can conceive a very strong inference arising that the masters in those mills were supine or indifferent at least to what was done; and I think it would be very difficult to avoid the conclusion that those who were subordinate to the masters in the mills, in the position of overlookers, for instance, who were only just a degree raised above the men, although they have influence over them from the power of dismissing them—I can conceive a very strong inference raised that the men would not have acted as they did; that the workmen would not have broken out in these reprehensible passions, and that they would have been interfered with more completely and effectually than the men were interfered with in the mills of Blackburn, unless in the first instance the overlookers at least had led them to suppose that such conduct would not be (as, however, when considered, it must have been) very much to the distaste of their better informed masters, or if, in the first instance, the overlookers had exercised the control over the men which they ought to have done.

Apart, however, from that view of the matter, I am obliged to take illustration from the case itself, but I purposely take the illustration from that part of the case, which, after having heard the witnesses for the respondents, I am bound to consider as not only proved on the part of the petitioners, but uncontradicted on the part of the respondents. Having considered the matter in the first view, with reference to an illustration so taken, I must now consider it in another point of view, also with reference to matter which also has been proved on the part of the petitioners, and has not, as appears to my mind, been satisfactorily answered on the part of the respondents; but in respect of which the case of the petitioners has been indeed rather strengthened than removed.

Having thus considered what the effect would be in a trial of this case, upon a charge against one of the employers, or managers, or overlookers, who did not interfere in respect of the misconduct (to use a plain phrase) which took place in some mills upon the 3rd, and in others upon the 4th of November last, with reference to the carrying out and the sending away—I am coming now to that part of the case which raises the more general question, and as it appears to me, with reference to future cases, the more important one, because I must look at the case or cases of violence as exceptional in themselves, and I must look at the carrying out on the 3rd and 4th of November last, as being with reference to this place exceptional—a matter of very great importance as it appears to me, with reference to one of the other heads of inquiry, to which it is necessary to direct attention by-and-bye.

The second view is expressed in this question: is it undue influence, is it intimidation within the "Corrupt Practices Act of 1854," s. 5, to discharge servants who have votes on the eve of a Parliamentary election, upon the ground of their politics differing from their master's. That is the plain question which one has to consider. It is even to my mind a plainer question than the first, because as to the first, I have already stated that in my view there would be very great difficulty in getting a verdict in a criminal case, with reference to the merely standing by, and not effectually interfering at the moment. However morally wrong it may have been, whatever want of presence of mind it may have shown, there might be sufficient element of doubt in such cases to allow of a jury acquitting upon the sacred principle, which I hope never will be departed from, in criminal charges—giving the accused the benefit of any substantial doubt. But with respect to the second point of view in which this case must be regarded, what answer ought to be given to that question? It is one, as it appears to me, of common sense, that if I have a person in my employment, if I am a Tory, for instance, and I have a person in my employment who is a Whig, and I want him to vote for the Tories, and I ask him to do so, either by myself, or by some person in my employment holding a responsible position, and he refuses, and I send him about his business shortly before the Parliamentary election, and give no good reason for doing so, except because he was a Whig and I was a Tory; and when I am called upon to explain my conduct, I suggest other reasons which might have operated upon my mind, which, though not given at the time, might be those upon which I acted, or partly acted; but it is shown that that person has been in my employment some 25 years, three years, two years, and so on, how am I to be judged? I should have thought that the answer would be, you are judged according to your acts; your acts and your words conflict; you give a faint and tardy excuse for what you have done, rather than deny it or disprove it; you, a Tory, have turned away a Whig shortly before a Parliamentary election, and after he has been canvassed and has said that he will stick to his Whig colours. Well, the conclusion, I think, that must be arrived at, would be, that I had turned him away because of his political opinions. In that case the master is a Tory, and the other a Whig; it may be put either way, of persons of opposite politics. I think the answer of common sense must be, that the servant was treated ill, because of his political opinions.

If that be so, the rest of this question is matter of law, but the law and the common sense of the matter seem to run very much together in the questions which arise before these tribunals. If the person turned away was turned away because of his political opinions, and that upon the eve of a general election, was he intimidated? It certainly was made uncomfortable for him to have announced his political opinions. It may be that with respect to the one person so sent away, he is sent, as it was put in the able argument of my brother Ballantine, into the enemy's camp; he is not influenced directly, he is sent away from influence; it is only made worse for him that he has been of a certain political sect. He is sent away, and it might be said that all idea of influence is removed, because he is not only sent away into the enemy's camp, but he is sent away angered by the ill-treatment he has received; he is persecuted, and he is the more likely to crown his martyrdom by voting for the other side. Therefore, it is argued, no harm is done, and no violation of the fifth section of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act of 1854.

Well, that may be so in an individual case. A good deal, I think, would depend upon the circumstances; a good deal would depend upon whether the injury inflicted upon him was an injury which would make him likely to change his mind in order that he might be received back into the service of the person who had discharged him, or that he might be taken notwithstanding that discharge into the service of some other person of the same political opinions as the master who had dismissed him; and dealing with reference to the individual case or even several cases of dismissal from one mill in Blackburn, for instance, it might be material to consider whether there were not a great many other mills of the same colour as that from which the man or men had been discharged, and at which it might be impressed upon their minds by the improper discharge that they were less likely to be received unless they chose to change their political mind, and to give at the election a vote different from that which they had announced their intention of giving; and although with reference to one or more persons who were determined in their political views the effect might be the very contrary of influence, yet with respect to bodies of persons, and in business where there is a large class of employers of the same mode of thinking as the one who was guilty of the wrongful discharge, it may be that a different result would be produced. But the matter is not at all concluded here, because the section says that the undue influence which is reprehended by it shall not be practised, whether directly or indirectly, and it is not because the one man who may be shoved or hooted, or pelted with mud, or dismissed from his employment on account of his political opinions may, if he is a man of independence, be only the more fortified in them, and only be influenced against the persons who ill-treated him, that therefore no influence is exercised upon other persons in the same class; on the contrary, whilst the strong-minded would be influenced against the intimidation, the weak-minded and the waverers, whether in the same employment or in others, under like circumstances, would or might be deterred. That they might be deterred is sufficient. I conceive it to be clear that the "practice of intimidation," mentioned in the fifth section, is a phrase carefully used to avoid the sort of quibble which persons who are not lawyers suppose has arisen in cases of highway robbery, where the indictment used to contain the words, "putting him in fear of his life," and the prosecutor, a brave man, being asked, "On your oath, were you in fear of your life?" replied, "On my oath I was not." In order to prevent the possibility of any quibbles of that kind, the Legislature, in the fifth section, has used language which makes it undue influence to practise intimidation, directly or indirectly, with intent to influence the vote of a single voter. Whether that voter be the person ill-treated, or whether the ill-treatment be violence or damage done by the removal of custom or business, or employment, is immaterial. If it is done with a view to affect votes, or interfere with the free exercise of the franchise, it is within the prohibition of the fifth section.

I think, therefore, that the proper answer to the question, in which I have presented the second view of the first head of this case is, that the wrongful dismissal by an employer of a voter or voters from his employment shortly before a general election, upon the ground of his political opinions, is evidence of intimidation within the fifth section, upon which the court is bound to act, if it believes that evidence.

It is hardly necessary in the discussion of a legal point to refer to facts in evidence, and especially it is hardly necessary to refer to facts which are only illustrations of common truths, namely, such as that persons may be intimidated by such conduct directly by dismissal, or the fear of dismissal of themselves; and indirectly by the dismissal or the ill-treatment of others upon the ground of their political opinions; but perhaps it is right to refer to the illustrations which a common truth has received here from Anderton's case, who announced, and apparently quite truthfully, that—I will not say from direct intimidation, because he was one of the men in the Wensleyfold Mill, where I think, intimidation was not established to an extent to make a case under the fifth section—I am satisfied with Riley's explanation; but it is an illustration of the effect which may be produced even by such conversations falling short of intimidation, as Riley had with the overlookers of that mill; and in which reference was made to the fact of its being worse for overlookers than for weavers, if this system of "carrying out" practised elsewhere was resorted to. Anderton appears to have been so acted upon by his fears, that, notwithstanding he was a Liberal, according to his own account, and had not voted at all at the municipal election; I think he had no vote at the Municipal election; he voted as a Conservative at the Parliamentary election; he stated that his vote was affected and influenced by his fears of being turned out, in consequence, not of what Riley had said, but of the rumours in the town; showing that whatever had taken place at the municipal election, had gone on echoing through the town afterwards to such an extent that at least one man, Anderton, was influenced, and voted against his principles at the Parliamentary election.

That is one instance to show the effect of such proceedings. There was another; I think his name was Robert Hindle. Now Robert Hindle was in Greenwood's Mill, and Greenwood's Mill is the mill from which Langtree did turn out more than one man of the Whigs without any satisfactory explanation, except the fact that they were of Liberal politics. There, I say, several were turned out. I need not refer to them more particularly at this time, but one man remained at the mill. That was Hindle, the overlooker.

Now Hindle is a remarkable illustration of the effect of influence of this description, because Hindle voted at the municipal election upon the Liberal side. He voted as a Liberal at the municipal election. When the Parliamentary election came, he had before him the example of several men, Fish, Cattrell, Daxbury, and also of Daxbury's wife, having been sent away and some others, making up, I think, Mr. Greenwood said, six or seven in all, who left upon the occasion of the municipal election. Hindle was not sent away, he remained at the mill, and having voted as a Liberal at the municipal election, he was canvassed by Mr. Greenwood for his vote as a Conservative at the Parliamentary election. His answer was that he did not like to vote, and he would not vote, upon which he says, Mr. Greenwood smiled. He said that Mr. Greenwood had been cross with him in respect of his vote at the municipal election, but he said that that was partly owing to his having had some drink, and therefore I pay no great attention to that; but as a fact, he stated that Mr. Greenwood had been cross with him in respect of the municipal election. He said that when canvassed for the Parliamentary election after the others were turned out, that Mr. Greenwood expressed satisfaction by smiling, and he did not vote at the Parliamentary election at all. He had gone away on the Monday morning, the day of the nomination, and did not return until the Tuesday night. Therefore here is a second instance of a man who appears, one would say, most probably (so probably, that it is my belief that it was so), to have been influenced by what had taken place in respect of the treatment of other men.

I think there is one more. It is not easy to trace these cases of influence. There is a certain pride, as was instanced in the case of one of the witnesses, which prevents most men from admitting, as Anderton did, that they really were influenced; and it is very hard to find out, if you find a corrupt influence existing in a constituency, it is exceedingly hard to trace out the persons who could exactly prove to what extent that corrupt influence has gone. This is one of the reasons given why a single proved case of corrupt influence, brought home to an agent, ought to be held to avoid the election. But these two instances having been given, I will refer to a third and a fourth. Those other instances occurred at Hutchinson's mill, in the case of a person of the name of Lever, who had a municipal vote, and voted on the Liberal side, and he had a Parliamentary vote, and he voted on the Conservative side. He goes out for his Liberal vote in the movement after the municipal election; he is sent for and comes back, and then votes to the contrary at the Parliamentary election. Lever would not admit that he had been influenced. That must be left to inference. I do not go into the examination. I think the result is that he would not allow, he rather denied, that he had been influenced; but there is the fact, unquestionably, of his having voted in a different way at the Parliamentary election.

Well, then, there is the case of Matthew Johnson, at the same mill, who had a municipal and a Parliamentary vote; and Matthew Johnson's is rather a remarkable case. He I think was a cloth looker. He had been canvassed. He had, as he states, received a strong intimation before the municipal election, as to the desire that his vote should be given against his principles, and upon the Conservative side. He had resisted that at the municipal election, but he so far yielded as not to vote at all, and he did not vote at the Parliamentary election. That is the man for whom the high character was prepared at Mr. Hutchinson's mill, stating that he had been a very long time in the employment; I think 30 years. That character was prepared, it was not given to him, it was kept till after the Parliamentary election, and he did not vote at the Parliamentary election, although he was a Liberal, according to his own account, in principles. But I think that there was a special reason, in consequence of his religious belief, for his voting Liberal upon the particular occasion. One always dislikes going into any inquiry of that description, but it was relevant to ask him the question, and he was asked the question upon this occasion. Well, he also appears to have gone away, and not to have voted.

Now, whether I look upon this as a question of common sense, or a question of law, or as a matter of inference from the evidence, which has been produced, I am obliged to come to the conclusion that expelling or wrongfully discharging voters shortly before a Parliamentary election, in consequence of their politics being different from those of their employers, does at least, under the circumstances of this case, amount to undue influence, both direct and indirect, within the fifth section of "The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act of 1854."

The next question to consider is, whether the persons were expelled or turned away upon the occasion to which so much attention has necessarily been directed in the course of the case with reference to their political opinions; in fact, whether any person was turned away with reference to his political opinions.

Now that must be taken partly as a matter of law, and partly as a matter of fact, but the only question of law that arises I think, is this; where the employer had a mixed motive; where he had a reason for getting rid of the person apart from his politics; was he bound, in point of law, to abstain from getting rid of him merely because of the general election coming on.

Well, I think I should answer that in point of law, as an abstract question, by saying, that he was not bound to abstain. I think that the employer would have been well-advised, I think that any sensible man or sound lawyer advising him, would say, you may do so, but take care how you do so, because unless you prove very clearly to the satisfaction of the court or the jury that you have a clear ground for discharging your servant, apart from his politics, it is inevitable that your discharge of him may be imputed to your dislike of his politics, and not to a dislike of his person. And in this case, although there were suggestions against a number of the witnesses who were called upon the part of the Petitioners—against several of them would be a more correct expression—grounds which it was stated would be sufficient, and would justify the discharge quite apart from politics; yet when you come to see that the persons turned away against whom those grounds had been suggested, were turned away in company with others against whom no such grounds were laid, that they had remained in the employment for a series of years, and in some instances for a considerable time after the alleged misconduct justifying dismissal, apart from from politics, took place, without being interfered with, and that it was only upon a political difference arising that the discharge took place, I think one must come to the conclusion that the abstract question of law does not arise, that it is excluded by the facts, and that the discharge or expulsion which did take place was due not to the personal qualities of the individual, but was due to the colour which he had thought proper to adopt.

Then the remaining question is one entirely of fact under this head of the case, namely, whether the dismissal and expulsion had reference to the Parliamentary election.

I have already sufficiently stated my opinion as to the proper conclusion of law, and fact to be drawn, that if it had reference to politics, it had reference to the Parliamentary election; and therefore it was that my learned brother Ballantine urged upon the court that which was the strongest point to be presented on the part of the respondents; that what was done, was done with a view to the municipal election; that it began and ended (I have a difficulty to adopt that word with reference to the voting) at the municipal election; that personal interests interfered which did not affect the Parliamentary election, and that in point of fact all that was done in the way of wrong (because, of course, he is too good a lawyer for a moment to contend that wrong was not committed), that what was done in the way of wrong had to do with the municipal election only, and had no bearing or effect upon the Parliamentary contest.

Now, that is a question of fact, and if it were made out upon this evidence that the municipal contest was merely personal and not political; if, for instance, the municipal contest had taken place three months before, as it was put, and the question was, whether some Act of Parliament should be adopted for the government of the borough, or whether some rate should be imposed as to which both Tories and Liberals were divided, it had been really a local question, or if it had been a question even only of whether some quiet people who were very much liked and admired, and thought well of as men of sense and benevolence should be elected, or whether some stirring politicians, having nothing else to recommend them, were to be put in the place of town councillor or other municipal office, I should have thought that would have divided the municipal election from the Parliamentary, and that no notice ought to be taken in reference to the Parliamentary election, of what was done with respect to the municipal election; and I should say the same if such a municipal election had taken place three days before, instead of a fortnight before the Parliamentary election. The question seems to be one of fact, whether what I have just been putting is the real state of the case, or whether the municipal election and the Parliamentary election in this case were not in the minds of the candidates, and in the minds of the voters, substantially one and the same political contest in which the same means were to be resorted to, the same colours to be displayed universally or generally; a contest, in effect, between Tories and Whigs, and not a contest between A and Z.

I pass that by for the moment, but only for the moment, because it must be discussed, and discussed with attention, in order to put the third question, which is quite a distinct question, and one the affirmative of which it is quite as necessary to establish on the part of the petitioners, and which also is partly a question of law, and partly a question of fact. That is the question, whether assuming it to be made out that what was done had reference to the Parliamentary election, and ought to be imputed to an intention to deal with the people according to their politics, and not merely according to their views as to municipal government, was the interference, assuming it to be illegal, and assuming it to be political, an interference by the agent or agents of the sitting Members?

Upon that I may remark, that any person is an agent, or agents, of the sitting Members for this purpose, if he has authority from the sitting Member to conduct the election, or to canvass voters on his behalf. That has been laid down so often, and is, to my mind, so distinctly recognised by the Legislature, as well as propounded by the judges, I mean recognised in the Act by which this tribunal was constituted, that I think it unnecessary again to explain the reasons by which that conclusion was arrived at. The conclusion is that the agent to conduct the election, or to canvass voters, of the Members is an agent under "The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act," with reference to what he does in the course of the canvass; if it be legal he is agent directly authorised, and if it be illegal, and in the course of the canvass for the intended benefit of the candidate, the Member is answerable for the illegal conduct, and must stand by the consequences, not criminally, but, for the reasons already mentioned, to the forfeiture of his seat.

That being so, who was or were, in point of fact, the agents at this election? What were the acts done by any agent at this election, in respect of which judgment ought to be pronounced, either in the affirmative or in the negative? It is in respect of these two questions only that it remains to say anything; and, in order to pronounce my opinion upon them, I must go back a little into the history of the election. I shall abstain altogether from making any remark that may even bear the appearance of a controversial character; but I must refer to the acts of the candidates and their agents, for the purpose of properly determining those relevant questions upon which the judgment is to be founded. The first of those acts with which I have to deal (I need go no earlier into the matter) took place in October. At the time, and long before, it was well known that the Parliamentary election was to come on in the course of last year. There was, it is notorious, it is part of history, great political excitement, and strong opinions were entertained upon one side and upon the other, and especially in this county, and particularly in this borough, with reference to the questions that were about to come before the next Parliament. In the month of October there was anticipated the usual municipal election, which was to take place in the early part of November, and by that time, I think, it had become known when Parliament was to be dissolved. I think Parliament was dissolved on the 11th November. I speak from recollection, it is an historical fact, and I am bound to take notice of it without any special evidence being given upon the subject.

It was anticipated that the dissolution would take place, and that there would be a general election, which, in the ordinary course of events, must shortly follow the municipal election. There can be no doubt, whatever may be the case, or whatever ought to be the case, with reference to the municipal election, whether, as in some places, men may be elected at the municipal election because they are the best men for the town and most liked by their fellow-townsmen, or whether, as in others, there is a sort of give-and-take—a sort of compromise, by which a certain number of one way of thinking, and a certain number of another, are elected—whether that system ever has been resorted to in this borough, or not, is a matter upon which I do not inquire, nor into which I ought to inquire, because it is certain that that was not the system intended to be resorted to with reference to the last municipal election here, with reference to the election of the 2nd November.

The contest, considered by itself, proves to have been a political party contest, although personal influences had something, perhaps, but not a great deal, to do with the matter. I cannot help thinking, upon the evidence, it ought to be concluded that Whig and Tory had a great deal more to do. Those colours appear to have been adopted with reference to the municipal election, as well as with reference to the Parliamentary election; and if the character of the election was to be judged of by the proceedings which took place at it, and by the result—eight Tories to four Whigs—looking very like a parallel to the Parliamentary election, whether that was taken or whether the evidence given on the part of the petitioner and of the respondents, because the evidence of the respondents confirms the evidence of the petitioners in that respect, it is impossible to come to any other conclusion than that the municipal election, like the Parliamentary, was, for the greater part, a party political, and not merely a local or personal contest. With that in mind, reflecting light upon what was done in October, let me refer to the circulars which were issued by the Tory party at this time. The fact of circulars being issued by persons of the same way of thinking as the sitting Members, would by itself operate nothing. No one can bind another, simply because he is of the same politics with him; but this circular of the 12th October, issued at the time, was unquestionably adopted afterwards by Messrs. Hornby and Fielden, the sitting Members; and the association which issued that circular was adopted by them in place of a committee for the management of their election. This circular of the 12th October must be taken as being the act of Messrs. Hornby and Fielden, just as much as if each of them had written a letter to this effect to every “manager, overlooker, and tradesman, and any other person having influence,” in the town of Blackburn. It is a power of attorney, to the extent to which it goes, to every individual in any of those classes, to do that which the circular requests him to do; and that circular does combine the municipal election and the Parliamentary in a remarkable degree, because the object stated is “to secure, in the municipal elections, as well as in the Parliamentary, the success of the candidates who adhere to the Constitution in Church and State,” and so on. The object is to have a political contest, of which the municipal election was to be the preliminary, a sort of skirmish before the great battle of the Parliamentary election. It goes on, “Believing that you know and appreciate the blessings, temporal and religious, secured to this country by the Constitution, which is at the present time so violently threatened by unscrupulous politicians, we venture to urge upon you most strongly the necessity of vigorous personal effort to secure the return, as town councillors, of gentlemen who hold, with respect to national politics, Constitutional principles, and the return to Parliament of our two known and tried representatives, Messrs. W. H. Hornby and Joseph Fielden.”

Now it is, I must say, quite obvious from the terms of that circular, taken with the fact that the two elections form part of one and the same political contest, that they cannot be held by anybody with his eyes open, and bound to declare the truth as he sees it, they cannot justly be declared to be different. There may be a distinction in some respects, and there were distinctions in some respects. I have traced them as well as I could through the evidence, but they are faint distinctions, and do not amount to such a difference as was insisted on upon the part of the respondents.

Taking the character of the transaction itself, and taking the first announcement of these contests, one must come to the conclusion that they were parts of the same system and plan of action.

I have gone through the evidence for the petitioners, with a view to see whether any distinction could be made between the one and the other. I cannot find a single piece of evidence from beginning to end of the petitioner's case, showing that a substantial distinction was made between the municipal and the Parliamentary election. The distinction was made between the people of Conservative or Constitutional opinions, and persons who were designated as a term of reproach by the name of Radicals. We have, “We will have no Radicals here; go to a Radical shop.” In some instances there was, “How could you make such a disturbance, after voting as you did?” That was voting against the master, but still, without reference to the personal interests, as distinguished from the politics of the individual. Throughout the petitioner's case, I find it all put upon political differences, and I find political canvassing spoken to beginning at the

Wensleyfold

Wensleyfold Mill, I have already stated that there is no case in my mind against Riley, beginning with Langtree, taking Mr. Greenwood, who was the employer at that mill, and coming down, I find from time to time a reference to politics as being the governing motive that should actuate the votes at both elections.

Blackburn.

Turning to the evidence on the part of the respondents, which I have also gone through with a view to see whether there had escaped me yesterday any piece of evidence which ought to alter my opinion in this respect, I find that the impression which I received from the evidence when it was given, is strengthened, not removed, by examining the statements, as appearing in the notes. The witnesses for the respondents did not, as it appears to me set up,—if it was intended to set up, certainly it was not successfully attempted—any substantial difference between the municipal and the Parliamentary elections; and in order to show that that is so, I need only refer, amongst others, to the evidence given by Mr. Greenwood, and take that as a sample of the whole. When he comes to canvass for the municipal election, what did they say?—“They said they would vote for the Liberals.” “Did you upon that say anything to them in the way of threat, or otherwise?”—“No, I asked them if they would not split their votes between the two parties, and give one to the Conservative and the other to the Liberal, and they said they would not.” That is speaking with reference to the municipal election. It therefore does; I will not say creep out at every part of the evidence, for I do not think there was any attempt made by the respondent's witnesses to conceal it, though naturally at the Bar it was made the subject of argument and comment, and the burthen was properly put upon the Court to investigate the matter thoroughly, and to say whether there was sufficient evidence for arriving at the conclusion that the municipal election must be treated as part of the same political contest as the Parliamentary election. There was no attempt on the part of the witnesses for the respondents, if there was, I failed to observe that it was successful to conceal that fact. I think both affirmatively and negatively it is quite obvious that from beginning to end, from the morning of Monday, the 2nd November, to the night of Tuesday the 17th November, upon which day I think the polling took place, there was a state of political excitement, beginning with the municipal election, and ending with the Parliamentary, in which the object of those who contested upon the one hand and upon the other, was one and the same, namely, to get in their respective candidates at both elections, on political grounds.

The only remaining question, therefore, is whether the acts which, according to the principle laid down, would amount to undue influence, are acts which are traceable to the agent or agents of Messrs. Hornby and Fielden.

This again divides itself into two heads, first with reference to the agents, and secondly with reference to the acts, and upon both I must refer back to the circular of the 12th October. That must be looked to, I think, as the fountain of authority and agency, such as existed in the election. Of course it would be prodigious to say that it at once made every overlooker in the place an agent of the Tory candidates. That would be quite out of the question, because if it were so it would follow, in strictness of law, that they would be equally answerable for the acts of the overlookers of the opposite way of thinking, or that they would be liable to be unseated for acts done in bad faith by some person who pretended to be an agent of theirs, for the purpose of betraying them by doing acts which might eventually invalidate the election. These exceptions, however, being out of the case, there is no suggestion of any such persons having been agents, nor was the act of any such person relied upon. Such persons being out of the case, it appears to me that the effect of this circular was to make an agent of every person having authority, down to the last grade, that of overlookers over the hands, and to request, and therefore authorise each such to influence the hands who were under him, for the purpose of inducing them to vote for the candidates upon whose behalf this document was issued, and any overlooker, and consequently anybody in that, or any higher grade, who bonâ fide took up the Tory side and who acted upon this circular, and did canvass for the sitting Members, became their agent, and his acts did bind them to the extent, and under the circumstances which I have already explained, in speaking of the first question.

Many remarks have been made upon this circular. I think that the circular has been, in some respects, unjustly criticised on the one hand. On the other hand, it is not a circular which, so far as I ought judicially to pronounce an opinion upon it, I can approve as a wise or politic one.

Reference has been made to that previous circular of the opposite party, by which certain persons were called upon to join the committee, and to use their interest on the part of the other side. I pass that by saying that I think it was different in its terms from this: that it did not refer to persons who were not to be on the committee, and it did not designate any other persons, or the servants of any other persons, as being the proper canvassers or agents to bind the Members. But, assuming that it did; assuming that one side issued an impolitic or illegal circular, or did an illegal act, I must pass away from the subject by saying that no amount of illegality upon the one side could justify a hair's breadth departure from the law upon the other. Wrong does not excuse wrong. If both parties have been misconducting themselves at the election, the Members of neither party can remain in upon petition, and neither can excuse himself because a similar wrong, or worse wrong, was committed on the part of the opponents. The way to deal with people who do wrong is to bring them before the proper courts, and to complain of them there, and to get punishment, if punishment is to follow, meted out by an impartial tribunal; but any other doctrine would lead to retaliation and vengeance probably much worse than the reprehensible conduct which took place at certain mills upon the 3rd and 4th November. Whatever wrong the Whigs did or may have done—I do not say that they did any—it is not the subject of inquiry here,—that would not excuse any wrong on the part of the Tories. I have said that I think this was an unwise and impolitic circular. I say no more, because I think no more ill of it. It is idle to say that the intention of this circular was to call upon employers, for instance, to use unfair means with the hands in their employment. I think it was not intended that the employers should turn off hands, far less was it intended that the lamentable events should take place amongst the working people which did actually take place. But what appears to be unwise and impolitic in the circular is this. I will take one part which I think specially objectionable, at least in a prudential point of view. “It was decided;” who decided it in the first instance is not known, it seems to have been thought a point of honour to keep to this circular afterwards, notwithstanding the objections to it, I pass no remark upon that; I am far from going out of my way to praise or blame it as a piece of chivalry, though I think it unwise. Two gentlemen were called whose names were put to the circular, namely, Mr. Thompson and Mr. Hutchinson; and each of those gentlemen repudiates its authorship. I do not think that the actual authorship can be known by reading the evidence; but, whoever was the author, he says: “It was decided that all millowners,” that may be all very well, I can quite understand a master having, from his personal character, from his benevolence, from his worth in many respects, very strong influence, and of a very legitimate character, over the men working under him; they may think him a wiser man than themselves, and they may think that he knows more, or they may have no particular wish of their own, and know that he would not intentionally do any wrong. There are a variety of ways in which it may be put; but a man may have a fair legitimate influence over those with whom he comes in contact, and it is not because that influence happens to be very powerful because he is their master, that therefore he is to abstain from using it altogether. If one comes to think over the matter for one’s self, especially with the experience of the circumstances, and the temptations presented, and the consequences which may follow from masters interfering with servants, one may say, “Well, I have determined I will never have hand or part in any transaction like influencing people in my employ”; but if I were to say so, it would be a profession of virtue quite superfluous; and it would be wisdom after the event, because it would be only an impression produced upon my mind by the result of what I have seen done by others elsewhere. These are the ill-consequences which have followed from masters overstepping the fair bounds of legitimate influence, and using what really amounts to menace or compulsion. I will say nothing about the millowners, the persons who are the real masters; but when it comes down to managers and overlookers, let any man of common sense just think what he is doing if he issues a manifesto of that description. What is an overlooker? He is removed only one grade above a workman. He receives rather higher wages than the other workmen in the employ; they owe him no allegiance. The relation of master and servant is such that the law does recognise a sort of allegiance, not only of the servant to the master, but of the master to the servant; and they may take one another’s part under circumstances, and to an extent which is not allowed to strangers. Fellow servants do not come within that rule, except so far as good-will may result between man and man, from the fact of their having been familiar with one another in the same employment. But the overlooker, whose wages the men do not earn, to whom they owe no duty at all except to obey his lawful directions, given in the name of the master, to be diligent and to look after the work they are about; the notion of his having any influence over them which he ought to exercise, beyond keeping them to their proper work for their proper wages, I cannot conceive. I cannot conceive it is right that an overlooker should be clothed with the additional importance of being told that he is a fit person to exercise influence over these persons for political purposes, whom he is simply to direct in their employ, who discharges his duty by directing them, and is authorised to dismiss them for misconduct. I think it most unwise. I must speak my mind upon the subject, whether I offend or not, and I am bound to pronounce my belief upon all relevant matters. I think it most unwise and most impolitic to put into the head of a person in the condition of an overlooker or manager either the notion that he is to exercise political influence over the men under his charge. I take leave to doubt whether that will ever be resorted to on deliberation. I am perfectly certain that Mr. Thomson would not have done it if he had had the framing of this circular, and had thought of it. I do not believe that there was any after-thought in the minds of those who framed the circular. I believe that they never anticipated the ill-consequences to result from it; that they were very strong in their own political views, and were very desirous to have as much canvassing on their behalf as they possibly could, because the candidates did not canvass for themselves. I certainly think that they have overleaped the reasonable bounds of influence when they call upon managers, overlookers, or other such person to influence the voters. The inevitable result is to set up an overlooker with a notion of his importance which he ought not to entertain, and of his having influence in a department which is not properly within his functions as overlooker; and I cannot help thinking that, with respect to a considerable part of what took place at the mills, although it would be ungenerous and unjust to allege that this circular directly set those proceedings of the 3rd and 4th November in motion, or that it was intended to do so, yet I think it would be untruthful not to say, because I believe it, that those movements would not have taken place if the overlookers had not been induced to step out of their proper duty to press upon the workmen political matters, instead of minding the business of the mill.

I have said all that I have to say upon that circular. I was going to cite an old saying as to what persons are likely to do when they are put in situations above their capacity or their merits, but I will not do so, lest it should be thought that I made any personal reflection. I will say, that anybody who is set up above his proper station, especially upon an exceptional occasion, and one of political excitement, is very likely to surpass the bounds of prudence and the bounds of law.

Now, I think there is one other remark to be made as connected with that matter. I do not go through the details of what took place upon the 3rd and 4th of November beyond saying—and I must repeat the same word, as it is the word properly applied, and if it appears to be the burthen of my judgment, let it be—that the misconduct of the 3rd and 4th of November was, in my mind, very considerable indeed. It was misconduct partly, according to the evidence, as I shall presently observe, of persons in the situations referred to in the circular of the 12th of October; it was misconduct to a far greater extent directly and immediately of the workmen. At one mill at least it amounted to gross ill-treatment of their fellow workmen, who were expelled; in several it amounted to actual personal violence; in many, not in all, because I do not involve all these mills in the same blame, I have already stated that I do not blame Mr. Hornby, as I think Mr. Riley absolved himself at the Wensleyfold mill, but at many of the mills it amounted to a system, the effect of which was that the place was made too hot to hold great numbers of people who were engaged in lawful work there, and the result was that for some days—I will say three or four days—I will adopt Mr. Thomson's statement, although I think his figures were certainly smaller than I should have arrived at on the evidence, I will take them at the amount he mentioned—I will say three or four days, or it may be more days; say the Thursday, if you will. I think he said that in three or four days matters were smoothed down; that the employers were disgusted either immediately, or upon reflection, although they did not interfere at the time, as I think some of them ought to have done more vigorously with what had taken place, and the body of the people who had been forced to leave were back at the mills. Mr. Thomson excepted a score or so, but he did not put it at any very precise figure, and I cannot help thinking from the evidence a greater number than he mentioned was the result; but a considerable number, at least, after all was said and done, did remain away, and were out of their employment.

Not one single man of all those who used violence upon that occasion has had a hair of his head touched; not one single man, even those who used gross violence upon the 3rd and 4th of November, has been punished. Some of them were proceeded against before the magistrates, and I could not at first understand why the magistrates had not inflicted—I was going to say, summary justice; one ought to be justly angry with what is wrong; one ought to deal with wrongdoers as they deserve. I was afraid at first that the magistrates had made a compromise of a serious matter, when those people appear to have been let go; but it turned out that they were summoned, not under the Corrupt Practices Act, under which they might have been indicted; nor for assaults, which would have been, so to speak, the more natural way of dealing with it, as a matter of police, considering that they were most of them people who, I will not say, knew no better, but still who were not so much to blame as those who did know better. It turned out, in point of fact, that no such compromise was made, and as I have inquired about it, I feel bound to state that the course which the magistrates took was a course which they were bound to take in law. I called attention to the proceedings of the magistrates with a view to passing a reflection upon them, if they had done wrong, but I am bound to say that the magistrates did what in law they were bound to do, under the circumstances; they dismissed the charge, as having been brought under the Combination Act, which Act is rather directed against movements of the men, with reference to the interests of their employers and the trade, than with reference to political objects, although of course the two may sometimes be mixed up. The magistrates would have convicted if the men had been brought before them for assault. In passing a judgment as just as I can upon the conduct of the employers, I should have expected that, if the employers, or rather those under them, had not to a considerable extent committed themselves by pressing upon the men strongly to take a political side, they would have brought such gross misconduct at least, as occurred at one mill, under the notice of the law. That was not done, and not a single man was discharged even at that mill for what he had done. I really ought to be almost ashamed of mentioning the case of James Pemberton, but I do not refer seriously to it; that youth of sixteen, who treated the men who had just been engaged at one of these carryings out, to 10 s. worth of drink, whether it came from his own pocket, or his mother's as suggested, I care not—it is perfectly indifferent. If it had been done by a grown-up person, under the same circumstances, it would have been a matter of serious comment, and no comment could be too severe upon such an encouragement to ill-discipline upon the part of the men; but I think it is clear that Pemberton, being a young man, did not much think of the carryings out, but supposed they might be condoned by what afterwards happened, namely, the men coming back to the mill and going to work quietly. Not having as great respect for the laws as it is to be hoped he will when he grows older, not feeling that a principle had been violated, and that there can be no condonation for that, and rather looking to his uncle's return the day before as a ground of rejoicing than considering what had happened to the workmen who were ill-treated, that is an act to which I ought not to attribute any great significance, considering the youth of James Pemberton. I certainly do not myself feel any anger against him, although the circumstance was an unfortunate one, for that really seems to be the only retribution, either in the way of reward or punishment, which followed upon the proceedings; and the reward, such as it was, and wherever it came from, was all on the part of the wrong-doers; and the punishment, such as it was, and the inconvenience, was all on the part of the people who suffered for sticking to their political opinions. That is the only relevance of the fact, and it is rather a general illustration than intended, and certainly I do not intend it, as an observation upon Pemberton. I am perfectly certain that, at his age, I had done a great many more foolish things myself, and people ought to be very careful how they throw any slur upon a youth just coming into life like him; nor do I; and my principal reason for referring to it again is because I did draw attention to it, and more importance might be attached to my having done so than perhaps the matter deserves, so far as he is concerned. I may have wasted too many words upon it, but I rather wished not to leave any sting which could reasonably be removed.

Now, then, what result is to be drawn from all this, because these are the circumstances? Anybody going over the facts of this case would have been struck by these circumstances in it. The other circumstances, as indicating the political character of the movement, I have already referred to and need not repeat. But adhering to the present question, what conclusion ought common sense to draw from these circumstances? I cannot help thinking that it is a conclusion which I indicated with reference to the overlookers. I cannot believe that the workmen, if let alone, would have so acted at a place in which no single suggestion of misconduct has oozed out with reference to any other mill or person (with the exception of what was imputed, without proof or apparent foundation, to Mr. Spencer, Mr. Briggs, and one other gentleman whose name I forget, in the course of statements made by managers and overlookers to the men, for the purpose of inducing them to change their minds, I cannot remember a single instance that oozed out of any misconduct at these particular mills). What is the proper conclusion to draw? It is that the men at these mills would have been equally well-behaved as the men at the other mills; that there was no special mischief in the temperament of the men, and that there must have been some reason other than mere political feeling for acting as they did; and I cannot avoid coming to the conclusion, as a man of common sense, that they must have done so, as they themselves said they did, because they thought that they had authority, or because they were given to understand that they had authority, by some person or persons in a higher position than themselves. And if that notion was spread amongst the men by the acts, words, or conduct of the overlookers, or of a single overlooker, who acted upon the circular, it was enough to account for what they did, and it is enough to trace their conduct to agency which would bind the sitting Members. That is the general conclusion to be arrived at, I think, with reference to what regards the men themselves.

Now, I have gone through this evidence; I pass over a great deal which it is unnecessary to refer to, because I will deal only with the more important facts, either upon one side or the other, with reference to each question. I do not think it would be useful to occupy any further time in going through the cases in which the men ill-used one another. The result may be shortly summed up that they did so; never, that I can ascertain from the evidence, having done so before to this extent, or anything like it, at any municipal election; that it was a matter exceptional and peculiar to the proceedings of November; that it was done by them after having been actively canvassed by their overlookers and others in authority over them; that it was done by the men in several instances stating that they had authority to do it, and that so they would do it; that although in some of the mills they were actively interfered with, in others very faint resistance was made to them at the time, although in all they were brought to order, and matters were set right with the sacrifice of a score or more hands, to take Mr. Thomson's figures again, who remained without employment when it was all over; and that this took place under circumstances in which the men were most unlikely to have resorted to such proceedings, except some persons in the condition of those referred to in the circular of the 12th of October had connived at, or given countenance to, or stood by consenting to, what was done. I do not think the fact of the men having been brought back at all removes the importance of that state of things. They were brought back, it is true. The public indignation alone, both of the Whigs and the Tories—and the Tories quite as vehemently as the Whigs—the mind of every right-thinking man would be directed against such a proceeding, if it were allowed to continue unchecked; but besides that, I believe that the good feeling of the people, as well as the interest of the employers themselves, and the better reflection of those under them who had countenanced the movement, when they found the mischief of what they had done, was sufficient to restore order; but they were not sufficient to restore the tranquillity of mind and freedom from influence in voting which electors are entitled to. Acts of intimidation took place on the 3rd and 4th of November, which, if done by the Members themselves, or their immediate agents, and unredressed up to the Parliamentary election, would, beyond all question, have amounted to undue influence within the fifth section of "The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854." Those acts, though limited to the 3rd and 4th of November, and though repressed almost as soon as they could be by the good feeling and better sense of the people, people, would still be acts of undue influence to affect the election of the persons by whose agents they were done.

Now, there is another branch of this part of the case, and that relates to what took place at some particular mills, and in respect of these mills interference was alleged by the proprietors, the managers, or the overlookers; in respect of some of them the persons have been called who were charged, and they have denied the use of particular expressions which are imputed to them, but they have not successfully attempted, or indeed I think at all attempted, to do them justice, to deny the misconduct of the 3rd and 4th of November, although they have endeavoured to excuse or palliate it; and with respect to the expressions, those expressions were adduced for the purpose of showing that which I think is abundantly proved without reference to them, namely, the political character of what was done. The mills to which I will especially refer are, first, Coddington's Canal Mill, in respect of which evidence was given by Pye, Kelly, and by Wearden. The proceedings at that mill stand, I think, upon a different footing from those which I have been already discussing. Pye stated that he was canvassed by Mr. Robinson, and that he afterwards saw Mr. Catlow, who was the book-keeper and cashier; I think Mr. Robinson explained that he was only the book-keeper, though he is intrusted with the payment of the men, but he is a person who is entrusted with hundreds of pounds to pay the men; he would be a person in a situation giving him the appearance at least of very considerable influence over the men, and I cannot help thinking that he would be within the term "other person having influence," within the circular of the 12th of October, "and others possessing influence," which must of course be limited to others of the same sort as those who went before; I cannot help thinking that that would include a person who had so important an employment as Catlow had. Pye said: "Catlow sent for me; he asked me if I had made my mind up who to vote for; I said I have no vote for your party; then, he says, there is no more work for me if I would not vote for him"; that is the sort of evidence given with respect to what took place at Coddington's Canal Mill. Probably if that case had stood alone, it would not have been a sufficient case to act upon, it might have been necessary to send for Mr. Catlow, and ascertain more precisely what the particulars were of his conversation with the men, but Catlow is a person in the employment of Mr. Coddington at the Canal Mill, and Catlow is a man who of course might have been called for the respondents to contradict, if he could, what was said of him; and I must believe that Catlow did earnestly press upon Pye, and other men, the wisdom of sacrificing their political opinions, or the likelihood of their going if they did not. What followed shows, I think, that although the proprietors, the managers of that mill, disapproved of the act of Catlow when they found what he had done, and what had been done elsewhere, and they desired to get back the men, yet it furnishes strong evidence that the men are right when they say that Catlow did "bag" them, and "bagged" several more, and did so, assuming to have authority at the time, and under circumstances where it was recognised that he had authority, because I find that these were the men, if my recollection serves me, who, when the conduct of Catlow was discovered, were sent for; in the meantime they had taken out a legal process to recover their fortnight's wages for a wrongful dismissal, and those were the men, if I recollect rightly, who went before the county court for their fortnight's wages, and it was on their behalf that Mr. Ernest Jones was brought down, a gentleman of very strong political opinions, who showed his sincerity by suffering for them in more ways than one, and upon whom I make no political or party remark when I say that the profession to which he belonged sincerely esteemed his straightforwardness and worth in the walk which he chose, and deeply regret the sudden close of his career, at the time when he seemed likely to reap the reward of his professional talent, and his exertions for the party to which he attached himself. Those were the persons in whose behalf Mr. Ernest Jones was brought down, and they recovered their fortnight's wages before the county court judge. Now, that is a case in which parties were discharged by a man in apparent authority, in which they appealed to the law, the proper way for every man to follow who thinks he is injured; not to take the law into his own hands, but to appeal to the proper court to redress him. They did appeal to the proper court, and that court decided that they had been wrongfully discharged—of course by a person with either general or particular authority, otherwise they would not have been discharged at all—and that they were entitled to their fortnight's wages; that stands upon the distinct ground of dismissal of people for their political thoughts.

Well, I do not know that I ought to refer to a case which catches my eye at the moment—the case of Francis Robinson. That was the case of a man who remained out of work because the weavers objected to him on account of his politics. He is sent away with a notice, and therefore that is not so strong a case as the other; still it is a case in which the men are given in to. It is not a strong case in law, but it is confirmatory of what was running in the minds of the men at the time, and showing that politics were the subjects of dispute.

Now, there is one case which is left, and it would be wrong not to make a remark upon it, because it is even more distinct than that of Catlow's, and it belongs to the same class. That is the case of Greenwood's mill. The case of Greenwood's mill was this: Fish, Catterall, and Duxbury, along with Mrs. Duxbury, were discharged, and also, I think, Hayworth was discharged from that mill. He got a message from a person of the name of William Wade. Mr. Greenwood was asked who William Wade was, and he stated that he was an overlooker. He was called a tackler by a witness, but tackler and over-looker, I rather think, are the same. However, he turned out to be not only substantially but literally within the terms of the circular, because he was proved by Mr. Greenwood to be an overlooker. Hayworth says, "What did he say to you?" "He came to me like this:—'Here,' he says, 'I am going of errands; I do not like doing it.' I said, 'What is it?' He said, 'Langtree tells them to tell them, through me, if I do not vote their way, I must not be surprised if I get bagged.'" Here is an overlooker sent by the manager of the mill to state to a voter, both at the municipal and the Parliamentary election, point blank, that if he did not vote their way, he must not be surprised if he got bagged. Well, then, he sees Langtree, and Langtree, he says, states that if he voted the other way, he must not be surprised if he got bagged.

Well, then, there are the other witnesses whose names I have given, who successively stated (the woman who was examined being the wife of one of them), that they voted on the Liberal side; that there was no ground for dismissing them, except that Langtree did send them about their business; and that the only explanations they got were, that they were Radicals, and might go to Radical shops; and with respect to the woman, that Langtree said he did not know what the reason was for dismissing her, and that he would have none of her impudence. These cases are to be taken with Hendle's, who remained in the employment, and did not venture to vote at the Parliamentary election, but went away to avoid doing so, as I conclude.

I agree with what was said by my learned brother Ballantine, that if this case stood alone, that if this could be looked upon as an isolated case, one would cast about for reasons for arriving at a conclusion that what was suggested—other than politics—was the ground for sending these people away, notwithstanding they had been years in the employment. But, taking these with the other cases, it would be blinking against the light to adopt that conclusion. This is one case having its peculiarities, and those peculiarities distinguishing it in an evil way from the others with which it stands in conjunction. It is like the case in which Catlow was spoken of, but stronger; because Greenwood and Langtree—Langtree at least—no wonder he was kept back; no wonder he was not called in the first place, until some pressure was put upon the respondent's counsel; he, being called, gave no satisfactory answer to that case. He suggested excuses which, if they were to operate, would have operated at the time, and which were not given as reasons at the time; and many of the reasons were hardly suggested to the men as they came up; for instance, Ramsbottom, and the story of the blow with the stick, and the ducking to escape it, which all came out suddenly in the evidence of one of the witnesses for the respondents, and was afterwards contradicted by Ramsbottom.

Such is the general outline of the evidence which has been given in this case. It has been met upon the part of the respondents, as I have stated, chiefly by calling the respondents and the principal managers at the mills, who state, as I am sure is the case with respect to most, if not all of them, because I must make at least one exception, that they disapproved of what went on at the time—of course, I am not here dealing with the cases I have got rid of, of Riley, and especially the case of Mr. Hornby, which I think ought not to have been introduced, indeed, into the inquiry at all, because it is very difficult to remove an imputation of the kind when it is made, although there may be nothing whatever in it. But besides this, there are several, perhaps all but one, of the employers whom I should acquit of having personally interfered with, authorised, desired, approved of, or ratified what was done at their mills. It is not likely; it would be the most injudicious thing in the world; and, speaking with reserve, with at least one exception, I must treat this as being a case in which the principal movement came from the men; but in which, on the one hand, I must conclude that the men would never have acted as they did if they had not had some encouragement, at least from the persons who were in a superior position to them at the mills; and with respect to at least two of the mills, and certainly as to one of them, Greenwood's, I must come to the conclusion that a case has been made out in which men were sent away for their political opinions on the eve of a general election, and by a person or persons who did stand in the relation of an agent or agents of the sitting Members. I have arrived at this conclusion, I will own, with very great regret; not regret, that the law should be as I have stated it; the law is so, and the law must be obeyed for the safety of all, and in order that freedom and purity of election may be preserved hereafter. I regret it, not because of any real or substantial doubt remaining in my mind after having carefully investigated the facts which, as it appears to me, have been established in evidence; but I regret it because this is a case in which there has not been any vulgar corruption in the borough; in which there has not been any general or extensive corruption in the borough; in which the misconduct which has taken place, is not to be attributed to the Members or their immediate agents; in which it has been limited to a few people, compared with the large size of the community; but in which those few people, or those amongst them who legally occupy the position which invested them with agency, have contrived by conduct which the law condemns, and says shall void the election, to make the last election for this borough void. I must pronounce it to be such. I must pronounce that the election of November last was null and void, by reason that the sitting Members, not personally, or willingly, or knowingly, but through agents of theirs, for whom the law makes them answerable, have been guilty in the terms of the 5th and 36th sections, by such agents, of undue influence. I must pronounce that no corrupt practice took place at the election with the knowledge or consent of any candidate thereat; and that it does not appear that corrupt practices extensively prevailed, nor that there is any reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed in the Borough of Blackburn.

Now

Blackburn.

Now, there is only one other matter to be decided, and that is as to whether I ought to condemn the Respondents in the cost of these proceedings. In determining that, it was my duty to examine the course which the proceedings have taken; and I found that in these proceedings charges have been made of a very extensive character, both against the borough of Blackburn, and against the sitting Members, especially on Hornby personally, which have wholly failed. Those charges constituted a great portion of the staple of the petition; they were alleged and persisted in up to a late moment, and they were in part only withdrawn, and certainly not withdrawn in a manner that I could have desired when the petition came on. There is no ground whatever for having made them, and taking into consideration all the circumstances under which these unfortunate transactions occurred (unfortunate, because they will plunge this borough again into a political contest, in which I heartily pray that no such scene as occurred at and after the municipal election will be repeated, but that the next Parliamentary election will pass off as the last Parliamentary election was alleged by Mr. Thompson to have done), these circumstances have brought my mind very clearly to the conclusion that the case is an exceptional one with respect to costs, and that I ought not to make any order with respect to costs on either side.

I desire to add that I have been struck with the singularly good conduct of the inhabitants of this populous and important borough during the present inquiry; and I have to return my personal thanks to the mayor for the very great consideration and personal kindness and hospitality with which he has received me.

BODMIN ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Willes, 24th February 1869.

Bodmin.

Mr. Justice Willes.] THE petition prays that it may be determined that Mr. Edward Frederick Leveson Gower was not duly elected or returned, and that his election was void. No scrutiny is prayed. The duty of the court is not to determine whether the majority obtained by Mr. Gower at the election did fairly represent the opinion of the inhabitants and voters of this borough, that he was in their judgment the best person to represent them in Parliament. The question is, assuming that it was the judgment of the majority that he should be the Member for the borough, whether that judgment ought to be set aside by reason of the conduct of a person called William Grose. And that would depend upon whether William Grose was agent of Mr. Gower for the purpose of the election, and if he was, then whether he is shown to have been guilty of bribery or treating at the election.

With respect to whether he was an agent of Mr. Gower, that is partly a question of law, and partly a question of fact. Of course, there are many persons who are employed at an election, and who in one sense are agents of the candidate, but who are not agents in the sense that his election will be considered void by reason of their misconduct. What is, then, the extent of authority which will make a person an agent, so that misconduct to the extent of bribery or treating, or other corrupt practice, will have the effect of unseating the Member, even although he may have been innocent of such corrupt practice himself, and may have been unaware that it was committed, and may even have forbidden it to be committed by the agent?

In discussing that first question, I feel in no respect moved by any supposed hardship of the law, which says unquestionably that if an election be obtained by the bribery or undue influence of an agent, that election shall be void. The result is so, unquestionably, upon principles which have been sufficiently explained, and have been long acted upon, and which I conceive to be clearly expressed, at least sufficiently expressed, by the 36th section of the Corrupt Practices Act of 1854. The only matter that ever made me entertain a doubt upon the construction of that section was the including of treating in the same category with bribery and undue influence. Bribery is dealt with by the 2nd and 3rd sections. The offence of bribery is committed by any person who gives or promises anything to induce another to vote, or to abstain from voting; and, of course, it is committed by a person who accepts a gift or offer, no matter what the form of the gift or benefit may be. The language of the 2nd and 3rd sections is sufficient, I think, to include every case of an unfair attempt to influence by a gift or offer of any advantage. And the offence under that 2nd section may be committed by the Member or by an agent, or by a person who is wholly unconnected with either. The 4th section, on the other hand, dealing with corrupt treating for the purpose of influencing the election, or a vote of a voter at the election, in terms is limited so far as any direct penalty is imposed to the candidate and voter only, as I read it, and therefore it seems at first sight as if it is only the misconduct of the candidate in respect of treating that should have the effect of avoiding an election. When, however, the 36th section is turned to, it is found that whether the candidate himself or his agents be guilty of bribery, treating, or undue influence, the same consequence is to follow. He cannot be elected during the existing Parliament, and he is also rendered incapable of sitting, and the latter words have the effect, not only of preventing him from being elected in futuro to a vacancy during the Parliament, but they react in a proceeding like this upon the election which is in question, and make it the duty of this tribunal to declare the election to be void so soon as it is compelled in the course of its duty to declare the candidate, either by himself or his agent, guilty of either of those practices. The doubt which crossed my mind was, whether reading the section by referring each to each, it ought not to be limited to bribery, treating, or undue influence of a candidate, and bribery or undue influence (not treating) of his agent, but I think to put that limited construction upon it would be to adopt what certainly has not been treated as the fair interpretation of the Act, and has not been the usual interpretation of the Act. I think that the literal interpretation of the 36th section without reference to the difficulty arising out of the 4th, is the proper one to be adopted.

Before I leave the Act, I think I ought to refer to the 23rd section, and put that out of the case. Now, while it appears clear to me that the 36th section does, by reference to the 4th, make corrupt treating by an agent a ground for holding the election to be void, I am equally clear that the 36th section does not so incorporate the 23rd section, as that an act done by either the Member or an agent, in violation of the 23rd section only, shall make the election void, unless that act also falls within the provisions of the 4th section. It should seem to have been usual in former times, and for aught I know it may have been the practice (and no doubt was the practice) at least, up to the year 1854, when the Corrupt Practices Act was passed, without any improper design upon the voters, with a view to profusion, which some might dignify by the name of hospitality, but a practice which I am afraid was resorted to, in some cases, rather for display than with any generous feeling, to give every voter who came up pledged for a candidate, or who had voted for a candidate at the election, refreshment, either by opening a common table at some inn where the voters breakfasted before they went to the poll, or where they had refreshment before they left the town after polling, and before they returned to their homes; and it is clear that such a practice must have prevailed in this, amongst other boroughs, because I find in the case of the Borough of Bodmin, reported in the "1st Power, Rodwell, and Dew's Reports," that the committee, whilst they seated Mr. Wyld, who was returned upon that occasion, I think, with Mr. Lacy, reported to the House that a system was pursued (and that system I have no doubt was general), as soon as a voter had given his vote, of giving him a ticket for 5s. worth of refreshment; and, although the facts are not stated very precisely in the Election Reports, I rather collect that that was the practice on both sides; and there the giving of the 5s. tickets was not traced to the Members or their agents, and, therefore, the question did not arise, as in this case, whether it was to be considered treating sufficient to avoid the election; but I cannot help thinking that that was the sort of practice with which, whether corrupt or not, the Legislature was dealing in the 23rd section of the statute, and also I am inclined to believe, though I cannot precisely cite my warrant for believing it, that where a farmer, for instance, came up from a distance to vote at a county election, it was not uncommon to have such an open table as that to which I have referred, not for the purpose of catching people's votes by the attraction of the meal, but simply as a thing which was then thought reasonable, and was not uncommon.

If to give a voter something to eat upon the day of the polling had been in itself treating, the 23rd section would have been unnecessary, the 4th section dealing with corrupt treating would have been sufficient to dispose of the case; moreover, if it had been intended by the Legislature in making that sort of practice which prevailed here and elsewhere illegal, as no doubt it is now by the 23rd section, also amount to corrupt treating within the meaning of the 4th section, the Legislature would have so declared itself in the 23rd section; has the Legislature so declared itself? The 4th section deals with the case of "a candidate who shall corruptly by himself," and so on, "provide, or cause to be provided," and so on, "any meat, drink," and so on, "for any person in order to be elected," which would refer to general ingratiation, "or for being elected," which seems only to be an echo of the former sentence, "or for the purpose of corruptly influencing that person, or any other person, to give, or refrain from giving, his vote," which would seem to deal with pampering the appetite of some particular person or persons, without any general hospitality in the way of ingratiation. In order that the case should fall within that section it is necessary to prove, not only the fact that meat or drink was given to a voter (I am now dealing with treating), but that it was done with a corrupt design to influence the election, or to obtain a vote or votes.

Now, turning to the 23rd section, which deals with the mere fact of giving refreshments to voters on the day of the poll, that section, after reciting that doubts have arisen as to whether the giving refreshments to voters on the day of nomination or polling be or be not according to law, and that it is expedient that such doubts should be removed, goes on to "declare," it seems a remarkable word to use, because I cannot find that a precise sanction was previously attached, but that is of little consequence here, for it enacts that "the giving, or causing to be given, to any voter on the day of nomination or day of polling, on account of such voter having polled, or being about to poll, any meat, drink, or entertainment in the way of refreshment, or any money or" (now we come to Bodmin in the old times) "ticket to enable such voter to obtain refreshment, shall be deemed" what? not corrupt treating, but "shall be deemed an illegal act." Now, what are are the consequences that follow? A person who is guilty of the offence of corrupt treating under the 4th section is to forfeit 50*l.*; and a voter who shall corruptly accept meat, drink, and so on, so given under the 4th section, shall be incapable of voting at the election, and his vote if given shall be utterly void. That is the consequence under the 4th section. A further consequence under the 36th section, as I have already explained, will be that where such treating takes place that election is void. Under the 23rd section, on the other hand, the only consequence is that the person offending, by which I understand the person who gives the voter the meat upon the days of nomination or polling, whether with a corrupt intention or not, shall forfeit the sum of 40*s.* for each offence, to any person who shall sue for the same, together with the full costs of the suit.

The result, therefore, is that the true question here is, first of all, whether Grose did give the entertainment (I would rather call it refreshment than entertainment) which people did enjoy at his house to voters on account of having polled, or being about to poll. I think I should rather read "having polled," because I do not recollect that any person is stated to have gone to the house and to have proceeded from the house to the poll; whether what Grose did was only letting persons who had polled eat at the house on account of having polled, or whether the house was open with the corrupt intention of catching the Lanivet people as they came in, and inducing them to vote for Gower, upon the ground that they could by doing so obtain admission to Grose's house—I say whether what Grose did was a mere illegality within the 23rd section, supposing it to have been illegal, or whether it was a corrupt illegality so as to come within the 4th section.

There is a third point of view in which the matter might be regarded, but that is only material so far as Grose's liability to penalty is concerned; namely, whether his account of what was done is to be accepted, and the meal which he provided was merely a meal to which he might ask in a tenant or a neighbour without any particular reference to the election at all, except in so far as people were collected together at the election, amongst whom he might select such persons as he wished to meet at his house—and whether you could say that it really was even within the 23rd section, on account of a voter having polled, or being about to poll. But I think that that would only be material for the consideration of a jury in the event of Grose being proceeded against for the penalty; and inasmuch as my impression in this case rather is, taking the whole of the evidence together, that the case did fall within the 23rd section, although naturally I do not wish to pronounce an opinion against a man upon either clause, in a case where he is not personally represented, it is not necessary that I should very much consider the evidence with the view to acquitting Grose altogether. I should rather like to hear counsel on his behalf before I positively pronounced the opinion that he was subject to any penalty.

I must, however, decide in this case, whether the 4th section has been violated or not. Now, assuming that the feast was given with the view of influencing the election, "corruptly given," which I should have thought was the same thing as "with the view of influencing the election," by attracting poor people coming up from Lanivet, and making them vote otherwise than they would have done, under the impression or expectation that they were to have a dinner at Grose's; assuming that to be made out, there was corrupt treating, and if Grose was an agent the election is void, without reference to the question of bribery.

But there is the question of bribery still to be considered, because, quite apart from the proper inference to be drawn from the mere fact that there was that meal at Grose's at which persons who had voted for Mr. Gower, after they had so voted, got refreshment under circumstances in which it would be, to say the least, incongruous, that Wyld's voters should present themselves though some did so and were not refused; assuming that one ought not from that mere fact to conclude more than that the 23rd section was violated, and that one ought not, under the circumstances, to conclude that the 4th section was violated, there would still remain to be considered the question whether, over and above the facts to be considered with reference to the 4th and 23rd sections, there was not a previous promise made by Grose to one or more persons (one would be quite enough), that if he came in and voted for Gower he should have a dinner at Grose's. I quite agree with the law as laid down by Mr. Rodwell in his elaborate reply on the part of the petitioner, that if that were made out, quite apart from the question of corrupt treating, there would be a bribe within the 1st clause of the 2nd section, by reason of Grose offering valuable consideration to the voter in order to induce the voter to vote, or to refrain from voting, which, with reference to procuring food to be consumed in futuro, would be bribery; whereas the mere giving of food to be consumed on the spot is looked upon certainly in a more lenient way, and is dealt with separately in the manner which I have already described by the 4th section. It is somewhat remarkable with reference to this distinction between bribery and treating, that it has existed from very early times; and that even with respect to that form of bribery which has always been considered the most odious, the bribery of a person who holds a judicial place, express provisions have been made distinguishing treating from bribery. And, without going back to old books, I may mention what is within my own knowledge, that when I took the oath of a judge some 14 years ago, one of the terms of that oath was (and, unless it has been altered by the recent Acts, I suppose judges take the same oaths at the present day), you shall not take any gift from any man who may have plea pending before you, unless it be meat or drink, and that of small value. That is not a mere form chanted by the person who takes that oath, which has existed and been handed down from very ancient times; it is as much as to express that the law will trust even a person who may have to decide upon the lives and properties of others to take, but only in the form of refreshment, which is to be consumed at the moment and not pocketed or reserved for future enjoyment, small quantities of meat and drink. Moreover, it is an illustration of that saying which is quite familiar to lawyers, that the law deals with substance and not with shadows. The law allows those trivial matters which occur from time to time, and cannot be prevented, which really do no mischief except in the minds of the suspicious and the prejudiced, to go on as usual. It allows those who are engaged in a public duty to do that which is ordinary and usual in life, and cannot be brought to a standstill in the way of eating and drinking, with an express declaration that unless there be something more suspicious, no inference is to be drawn against a person who simply eats or drinks in the way of moderate refreshment. Well, now, I am quite conscious that that which might present attractions to one man which he could not resist, may, to another, appear possible to avoid. A hungry creature will go into the trap for a bait at which the well-fed one will turn up his nose with disdain. But it must be obvious (I have said enough, and I meant no more in what I said than to introduce what really is at the bottom of the decision in all these cases), that the judge must satisfy his mind whether that which was done was really done in so unusual and suspicious a way that he ought to impute to the person who has done it a criminal intention in doing it; or whether the circumstances are such that it may fairly be imputed to the man's, I will not say, caprice, because if a man tells me "I am capricious," I tell him "you have not given a sufficient explanation of what you did,"—but to a man's generosity or his profusion, or his desire to express his goodwill to those who honestly help his cause without resorting to the illegal means of attracting voters by means of an appeal to their appetites.

I conceive, therefore, that this really is, after all, a mere question of fact upon the whole of the evidence; and I must consider what impression the whole of the evidence has made upon my mind, to see upon this part of the case whether I ought to impute to Grose corrupt treating within the 4th section; whether I ought to believe the evidence so as to act upon it; that if there was no case of corrupt treating apart from the previous promise, there nevertheless was the previous promise, because that, however small the benefit, if conditional upon voting or abstaining from voting, would be a bribe.

I mentioned, however, that it was also necessary to consider upon the evidence whether Grose was an agent. Now, I cannot say that I think there is any very great difficulty in the law upon that; I should have thought the meaning of the 36th section is this, that if, supposing bribery, treating, or undue influence to have been legal acts, it would have been within the scope of the employment of the person who commits either of them to do that in advancing the views of the candidate in the capacity in which the agent is employed; then his committing such acts, notwithstanding that they are illegal by the statute, shall bind the Member to the extent, not of making him subject to penalties, but for the public benefit of having the election at which such practices took place by an agent, declared void; upon that the law, as it has been laid down, appears to me, I own, to be reconcilable to anybody's common sense. All I say now is, that the agent must be an agent employed by the Member to canvass; that is not necessarily to canvass generally, but to canvass a particular voter or voters in respect of whom the act was done. Of course, it might be extended, on the one hand, to a person engaged in the general business of the election, who, of necessity, would have the power implied of doing the minor act of getting votes; on the other hand, it might be limited to the case of a person who was employed to canvass a particular voter or particular voters only, and then that person would be one whose authority, being limited to such voter or voters, his illegal act in respect of others could not affect the Member, because he would be only an agent in the particular limited capacity. Again, there might be put, proceeding still in the same direction, cases in which a person, although nominally and popularly a canvasser, would really be no agent at all; you might put the case, which I believe is not uncommon, and which I could conceive might take place very easily in a county or other large constituency, without authority, properly speaking, to canvass at all; a person who, though called a canvasser nominally, was in substance not a man whose influence was relied upon, but was rather, upon the facts, a mere messenger sent round to know how the voters in the district meant to give their votes—a person sent round rather for information for his employer than with a view to his exercising any influence, either personal or by his powers of persuasion, upon the persons whom he was sent to ask how they meant to vote. And I can conceive that it would be very unjust with reference to the latter class of persons, unless he were really proved to be an agent by other evidence, to make the Member liable for what he did, to hold, in fact, that he was an agent at all.

In dealing with this part of the case, I should like to refer to a section in the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, which, I think, is not without its significance; and it may be interesting, inasmuch as this matter appears naturally to have attracted so very much attention. It is the 44th section; it is the section which imposes upon the Member the additional penalty of forfeiting his election in the event of his employing any person who has been previously found guilty of any corrupt practice by any competent tribunal. The expression there used is a man engaged at the election "as a canvasser or agent for the management of the election." One had not at first noticed that particularly, but it seems curiously to chime in with the rule adopted by the judges who have had to deal with these matters.

Now with respect to Grose, supposing it were lawful to bribe, and supposing that he had said to one of the Lanivet people, "I will give you a 5 l. note if you will come in and vote vote for Gower," assuming Grose, for instance, to have been an agent, and that that were a lawful act, what would Mr. Gower have had to complain of? Nothing whatsoever; he would have had a man who was so ardent in his cause that he not only canvassed a voter, but he backed his canvass by a sum paid out of his own pocket for the purpose of advancing Mr. Gower's cause. And so with respect to the treating, and so with respect to the undue influence; I am far from thinking that it is at all unjust, on the ground that those acts are beyond what has been called the legal scope of the authority of an agent to impose any consequence upon a Member when they happen to be illegal, and I have no doubt at all in reading the 36th section in the manner I have already explained. I am afraid this is rather a long introduction upon the question of law, but it is so important that persons should not mistake the grounds of decision in these cases, that I have endeavoured to be full and clear upon the subject.

Now, first of all, was Grose an agent? My impression is that there is evidence of Grose being an agent, but that, I think, is rather evidence from Grose's own statements than from the rest of the case. I entirely believe Mr. Gower when he says that he never meant him to be an agent, that he was rather thrusting himself upon him, and also I have no observation to make upon the evidence of Collins. Grose was twice canvassing with Mr. Gower, he certainly was brought in as knowing and, I presume, having an influence over some of the Lanivet people; he had a list given him by Collins, although he obtained it from Collins by great pressure, and, moreover, he was engaged during the day of the election in bringing people up to the poll. On the other hand, there is the fact that he had no canvass book, which would go a long way in the opposite direction, considering that those who were intended to be regular agents had canvass books. And there is the certain fact, as I think, that if he was an agent his agency was confined to Lanivet; but I pass that by without further dwelling upon it.

I rather think, taking the whole of the evidence together, that I should have arrived at the conclusion, if necessary, that if Grose played false with respect to those Lanivet people, although he never was intended to be an agent in the sense in which that word is popularly used, yet so far as he canvassed the Lanivet people he might fairly have been taken to have done so with authority, by reason of Mr. Gower not forbidding him to canvass any further, and Collins letting him have a list, his being selected as the person to influence, so to speak (I mean fairly influence), Lanivet, and his activity on the day of the polling. I think Mr. Rodwell is right in saying that these facts would amount to evidence of agency (I say "evidence of agency" carefully), and I think that if you could show of a person in the position of Grose, any substantial case of doing illegal acts in advancing Mr. Gower's return, a case would be made out upon which Grose would have avoided the election, in so far as the question of agency is concerned.

Now, I must pass on to the rest of the case, and here, as Mr. Rodwell said, I have a very difficult and in some respects a painful question (although I do not feel the same pain as he sought to impress me I ought to feel in deciding it), that is the question, what was the real character of the transaction at Grose's, was it an illegal one, and if so, was it illegal within the sense of either the 2nd or the 4th section? I say, I do not feel this so painful a duty as Mr. Rodwell said it was, because I by no means feel it necessary (I do not think I should shrink from the duty for one moment if it did become necessary) to pronounce either that Grose or that the numerous persons who were called as witnesses, and who more or less varied in their testimony from that of Grose, were guilty of wilful perjury. I must remember the circumstances of which these people are speaking, and I must remember their conflicting interests and desires in the matter, and I must remember to adopt the figure well used by Mr. Rodwell in reply, as comparing the view which he presented to the view which was presented by my brother Ballantine, in stating the case for the respondent, that these people were looking at the facts each through a different glass and a different coloured medium, and I think that in this case the media were of several different colours, because, when the evidence of contradiction comes to be compared, it appears to me that there are cases in which Grose is at variance with two people, each of which two people gives an account not reconcilable with that which is given by the other, but almost as irreconcilable, to my mind, with that which is given by the other as with that which is given by Grose; and I must also remember that there are classes of cases to which, I think, I must now append these election cases, in which people, looking at that which took place from different points of view, with different degrees of attention, with different degrees of absorption by other business from that which is on hand at the time, bring away entirely different impressions of the same transaction, and do so honestly. They recite these different impressions in the way of a connected story in a court of justice, they contradict one another, and in those cases very often, they being persons of equal worth, it is necessary for a jury to say, not that this person has perjured himself or that person has perjured himself, but sometimes simply, "We believe the one," or "We believe the other," according to the probabilities of the case, and especially, I think, with reference to those probabilities which are to be found on an inspection of what some persons have called the "real evidence" of the case, that is, the evidence which has been given with respect to things the character of which could not be misrepresented or greatly exaggerated without intention, and as to which it is very often found that the witnesses the most contradictory will agree, whereas their evidence, in so far as it is matter of impression or opinion, or coloured by their expectations or their desires, has been quite in conflict. I speak here especially of the sort of entertainment that was provided to begin with. About that there can be no doubt; I must deal with it presently.

Bodmin.

But there is another sort of conclusion, and it is one at which I am very much more disposed to arrive in this case, namely, that neither class of witnesses has given a very precise or exact account of the transaction; that also very often happens, because people's memories are warped (of course they will be warped) by prejudice, and some people will remember one part of the case, and will exaggerate it a little, especially in a matter of intention, as this is, according to their views of what they think the person they are speaking of intended; while another man, again, will very much underrate it, because he is conscious that he had not the guilty intention which is imputed to him, and he fancies he has conducted himself rather better in the matter than he really did.

However, these are mere general remarks; I rather address them to myself than use them as reasons for the judgment at which I have arrived. My conclusion is, that this evidence must be strictly examined for the purpose of seeing how far either of the views presented, that there was a corrupt intention, or a previous promise, should be adopted; and, in the end, the judge can only say, "I adopt the one side," or "I adopt the other."

Now, I must first, as I indicated in the course of stating the law, consider whether this transaction, standing without the evidence of the alleged previous promises to persons that they should enjoy a dinner if they voted for Mr. Gower, could be construed as within the corrupt treating clause. With respect to that, certainly there are two circumstances which ought to be regarded: first of all, the amount, the quantity, and kind of food and drink which were provided, and I think I might say especially the latter. In order to determine the quantity, of course you must compare it with the persons who were to be corruptly dealt with, if the intention was to corruptly deal with anybody. Viewing this as a case of treating, the question is, whether it was a corrupt treating of the voters of Lanivet. That was why I could not help asking, at the end of the case, how many voters came up from Lanivet, and also how many voted for the one side, and how many for the other. I found that there were the two pieces of beef, off part of which Grose had his dinner upon the Sunday, and off the other piece of which he had his dinner on the Monday (which were originally 20 lbs.); a leg of mutton of, I think, 8 lbs. or 9 lbs.; one witness said six loaves of bread, the end of a barrel of cider, some butter, a quarter of a pound of tea, and certain trifles which would go in the eating of the meat, and there was also some cheese sent for in the course of the day; I think about 2 lbs. of cheese; these formed the meats and drink. The persons to be operated upon were voters of Lanivet 169, or, taking those who voted, 147; 91 of whom voted for Mr. Gower, and 56 of whom voted for Mr. Wyld.

Now, it is necessary to see first, whether there was such a provision made at Grose's, as would amount to keeping open house for the voters from Lanivet who came in and voted for Mr. Gower; secondly, I think we must consider who actually came to the repast, which is another part of the real evidence of the case. The persons who actually came to the repast are variously stated; I do not think I have more than 30; I will take it as under 30. I believe that if I were to take the evidence on the part of the petitioners as it came from the mouths of the witnesses before the watchers were called, I should say that there were about 30, a great portion of whom were women or children who were connected with voters. If I took the evidence of the watchers, and added that, I should conclude that there were between 20 and 30 voters, and that there was a proportion also of women and children who came in with the voters. I cannot make out that any person who voted at the election, went to Grose's house before he actually voted. I think that is not immaterial; people coming in after a walk from Lanivet, especially towards the dinner hour, and who were likely to be at all influenced by food and drink, would, some of them at least one would think, have dropped in at Grose's to see what the fare was likely to be, before going to the poll. I cannot find that anybody went there before he went to the poll; I cannot find that there was anybody at the poll (as was pointed out on the part of the respondent) to show people to Grose's after they had voted. The information of what was going on at Grose's appears to have spread in the afternoon, and not unnaturally, since Grose's was, I think, nearly opposite the house of the agent for Mr. Wyld, and one of the witnesses called, if I do not mistake, was a servant from that house; the people in that house would have seen some persons going into Grose's, some of whom were voters, and then the news would have spread to Mr. Wyld's people, and the watchers would have been sent, and the crowd that came in and scrambled for what was left and carried off the bones, would very naturally have been attracted to the place, and even the boys of Bodmin would become, as they were, so indignant as to apply an epithet to Mr. Gower, which he certainly did not in the least merit, whatever be the fate of the petition.

That is the way in which, taking what I call the real evidence of the transaction, the announcement of the repast appears to have been made. It seems a little remarkable, if that so-called feast is to be dealt with as corrupt treating, and was intended to attract the Lanivet voters, and to entrap them into voting, contrary to their previous intentions, for Mr. Gower, that there should have been, first of all, no announcement of the place given at the poll; and, secondly, that the matter should have been carried on in such a manner that it must have become known. A good deal of additional light is, I think, thrown upon it by the circumstance that several of the witnesses who were called (as I shall point out presently) to prove what took place, stated, not that they were invited by Grose, but that they went themselves, because they had been informed by some other person that there was an entertainment going on. I speak especially of those who voted for Mr.

Wyld,

Wyld, and who were called towards the end of the case. I also speak of the watchers; they appear to have been attracted to the spot by general rumour, and not in consequence of anything they heard from any one who was invited, as far as I can judge, by Grose. This, again, is another piece, as it seems to me, of real evidence.

So much for the affirmative evidence: there is some in the negative. One of the watchers put down the names of a number of persons whom he saw going into the house. I think 20 was stated to be the number that was put down altogether. The names of those persons we have on this card; some one or two of those people were called, but none of the rest of them were called, though all their names were known. Every one of these people's names was known, because here is the card in the possession of the petitioners. Therefore it was competent to the petitioners, if those persons really had been invited by Grose, to have called every one of them, and to have proved in the case of each one that he was invited by Grose, either upon the condition of voting so as to amount to a bribe, or upon the occasion of the election so as to show that the eating and drinking were eating and drinking to catch Wyld's people for Gower, and so as to be corrupt within the meaning of the 4th section. I simply remark that, with the exception of, I think, three of these people, none were called. I think Philp was called, he was one of them; Hawley was called, and there was one other, I think, who was called--

Mr. Rodwell.] Goldsworthy.

Mr. Justice Willes.] Yes, Goldsworthy. With that exception, nobody was called out of the whole number. Therefore I certainly should not conclude that it was necessary to impute to Grose, apart from the alleged previous promises, a corrupt intention within the 4th section, and I should have thought that an innocent explanation might easily be given of the character suggested by the evidence of those witnesses who spoke of his having said that he was going to give some dinner to his tenants; by his own evidence with respect to his asking Mrs. Hancock, because she happened to be an old servant of his, and his asking Philp, because he happened to be a cripple, and by Philp's own account of the transaction between them, he being a man connected with Lanivet, and the occasion being one on which a great number of persons coming from Lanivet would be collected together, of giving voters, certainly those connected with voters, meat and drink on account of their having polled, so as to fall within the 23rd section, but not with the corrupt intention of influencing their votes within the 4th section. I must say that that would have been very clearly my view of the matter upon the 4th section.

It is necessary, however, to consider the evidence somewhat more minutely with reference to what would come within the 2nd section, because if it is proved that any person was promised a dinner if he would come and vote for Mr. Gower, or stay away from voting for Mr. Wyld (no matter whether his vote was effectually influenced or not, that would be perfectly immaterial), that act would be corrupt in itself; it would be an undue interference with the election, and, if Grose be held an agent, it would avoid the election within the 36th section. Now, I have thought it necessary to examine the evidence, especially of the witnesses to promises, as closely as I can, and it is necessary here to criticise language. I must criticise language for the purpose of ascertaining whether an offer or a promise was made, the effect of which was, not "If you happen to come up and vote, call in, and you shall have a bit of dinner," but the effect of which was, "Come up, vote for Mr. Gower, and if you do you shall have some dinner as a reward for your voting." The former would express an intention to do what would fall within the 23rd section, subjecting Mr. Grose to penalties; the latter would be a bribe which would defeat the election. Was the latter the effect of what was done?

I have had now so many of these cases, that I have begun almost to make a formula, and I must say that this is the first case with which I have had to deal in which the evidence of bribery within the 2nd section rested upon cases of alleged promise only. At this election there does not appear to have been one single farthing spent, or suspected to be spent, in corrupting the mind of any voter, and it is most creditable to the people of Bodmin, that no such suspicion has lit upon them. I say this, not merely by way of compliment to them, although they ought to cherish the recollection of it, and those who succeed to the places of the voters at the last election (although I hope most of them will survive to vote again) ought to endeavour to follow so good an example. There is not a single instance of that having been done. Apart from this case of Grose's, there is no evidence of treating; there is a negative of it, because the only publican who appears to have been pointed at as possibly being a medium of treating, with his wife, on being called, effectually negated the suggestion that anything of the kind had taken place. Here, then, is the single black speck in the election. Is it so black as it is represented by the witnesses on the part of the petition? I will take those witnesses in order; I must not go through the whole of them; that, I think, would be wrong, but I must take a specimen of those witnesses for the purpose of showing what my view of their evidence is, and the way in which it has acted upon my mind.

With respect to the first witness George, I must observe that he was a man who had worked for Grose, and however distinctly he speaks to a promise, which would have been within the 2nd section if it had been established, and I could believe him as to the precise words which were used, I find that his memory was so defective that he could not fix any particular time for the promise having been made at all. He seems to have simply come to the conclusion in his own mind that he was intended by Grose to be dealt with in the way of corruption, and to have a dinner if he voted. I think it very likely that George did hear of it, either directly or indirectly, through those to whom Grose did mention (as I am sure he did mention probably more than he now either remembers or chooses to recollect, whichever is the true view of his evidence), that he intended to treat, I do not say corruptly treat, such humble friends as came up from Lanivet to vote at the election; he admitted as much in part of his evidence, for he said that he told Mrs. Bate that if any poor people came from Lanivet who wanted anything to eat they might have it—a direction, however, which is consistent with an innocent view of his conduct. I say, I think it very likely that, either directly or indirectly, George did hear of some such direction. But certainly, balancing George and Grose, I cannot arrive at the conclusion that there was a corrupt promise under the 2nd section; looking at the surrounding circumstances, as I must do, also to some of which I have referred, I have a strong impression upon my mind as to the character of the election, and the intention of those who were engaged in it, so far as I can at all judge, not having perhaps heard the whole of the case on both sides on that point. Now, George adds that he did not see him again; he said he was a labourer of Grose's, and he had been very kind to him, and there I leave it.

The next person who was called was Mrs. George; I cannot recollect that she added anything to his evidence, but I think she detracted somewhat from it in that part of her evidence where she stated that she spoke to Grose; and being asked, "Did you hear any talk about the dinner?" she answered, "Well, I might have heard it in a sort of way from people." (Q.) "Who did you hear talk of it?"—(A.) "I heard that Mrs. Monk was at the dinner, and Mr. Hawley, and all that, but I was not there at the dinner, and did not know anything about it." Now, if George had had this distinct promise of a dinner in the event of his voting for Gower, is it likely that his wife would have been in that state of mind, and know nothing whatever, as it appears, about it, except what she knew from scattered talk after the transaction was over? I think that goes a long way to show how dangerous, how slippery, as I think Mr. Justice Blackburn expressed it at Stalybridge, the evidence of these promises of benefit in futuro, is to stand upon where there is no proof whatever of any actual bribery or corrupt purpose.

The next witness was Henry Burrows, and Henry Burrows' evidence seems to me to be very important with respect to the dinner, because two people were called to prove that an inducement was held out, indirectly, to Burrows, to vote upon the footing of having a dinner if he voted for Mr. Gower. Now, compare the evidence of those two people. Here are husband and wife; his account of the matter is, "Mr. Grose said, 'I am very glad we have succeeded; we have been here several times, and never had a chance of seeing you before.' Mr. Gower and Mr. Grose asked me whether I would support him, and I said 'No.'" Now, Mr. Gower is stated to have been present by him, so that there are two witnesses here in contradiction, and Grose at least has the satisfaction of being contradicted in company with the Member, Mr. Gower. Then Burrows goes on, "And he said, if I would vote for Mr. Gower"—what?—"he would get me liberty to pull heath in Lady Molesworth's wood." That seems to be his account of the inducement that was held out to him. Then he is asked, "Was anything said to you, at any time, about dinner?"—(A.) Well, they told my wife and daughter of it; no, he said nothing to me about any dinner." If Grose at that time had formed the design of catching people by promises of a dinner, yet although he was capable of offering a bribe of another kind in the presence of Mr. Gower, according to this man, he did not offer a bribe in the form of a dinner.

Now, when Mrs. Burrows came, she was the person who said "He promised to take us in the carriage, and give us a nice dinner." Here I must contrast the evidence of the one with the other, and I think in doing so I have a very strong proof of the wisdom of the remark of my Brother Blackburn as to evidence of this description.

The next witness who was called was Richard Marshall; Richard Marshall was called to prove a similar case, I daresay; of course the counsel for the petitioners did not put him into the box without some good reason, and that reason must have been that he was expected to prove something. Having read over his evidence, I find that he proves, so far as I can make out, nothing.

Mr. Rodwell.] He was the wrong man; there was another Richard Marshall.

Mr. Justice Willes.] There were so many wrong; Marshall seems to be an unfortunate name, because I recollect there were afterwards three Marshalls called, all of whom were women, and some of them turned out to be the wrong people. It looks as if there had been a vast deal of general conversation about this matter, and the petitioners have been proceeding upon information which they thought they could prove by evidence in a court of justice, and which turns out, after all, to be nothing more than gossip.

The next is one which, I think, it is very important to attend to also (it made a very strong impression upon me at the time), again as showing the danger of this sort of evidence where there is nothing substantial; no vulgar bribery, as it may be called, suggested in the case. The next witness was Walter Pearce; Walter Pearce gives rather a singular account of the matter; he gave, I think, three accounts. Walter Pearce was a person who appears to have been on unfriendly terms with Grose, and Grose denies that he invited him at all, and states why. Now, Walter Pearce, like George and Burrows, the persons whose names I have previously referred to, did not vote for Mr. Gower; but they having voted for Mr. Wyld, he appears to have voted for neither; he was a person who did not vote at all; he was a person whom Grose was at variance with. What account does he give of the matter? He says, "He asked me who I was going to vote for. I said I did not know I should vote for anyone. He said, 'You had better vote for Mr. Gower.' I said, 'I do not think I shall come here at all.' He said, 'I will provide you with some dinner, if you come in.' That is all he said to me." I need hardly observe that that is no proof at all of a conditional promise addressed to a person who was a farmer in the same condition of life as Grose, that I should have thought was incapable of any construction imputing guilt to Grose; the circumstances repel such a construction. Pearce's evidence goes on thus:—Q. "What did you say?"—A. "I said I should not come in for the sake of a dinner." Q. "Just repeat the words that Grose used?"—A. "He said, 'If you will come in and vote for Mr. Gower, I will provide you with some dinner.' I believe I said, 'I do not think I shall come in here at my own expense.' I believe I said that first, and then he said, 'I will provide you with some dinner.'" Then comes this question; the question seems rather to put the "if" upon him again. "If" is the question.—A. "If I would come in and vote for Mr. Gower; that is all Mr. Grose said to me." It occurred to me that he did give various accounts of the transaction, and I thought it necessary at the end to get him to give, if he could, a connected one, so I asked him, "You told one gentleman that he used the words, 'If you will vote for Mr. Gower, I will give you a dinner'?"—A. "Yes." Q. "You told the other, 'if you come in I will provide you with some dinner,' and that he did not use the words, 'if you will vote for Gower'?"—A. "Yes, I think he said 'Come in and vote for Mr. Gower, and I will give you a dinner'; that was the exact words, and that was all he said to me about it." Q. "Did he use the word 'if'?"—A. "He said, 'I will give you some dinner.'" Q. "Did he say anything about 'if'?"—A. "No." Q. "Now turn back in your mind, and tell me in your own way the words which you say he used."—A. "I said, 'I did not think I should come in at all; I should be otherwise out in the country, and I did not think I should come in to vote for anyone at all'; and I did not come in; that is all I said to Mr. Grose." Q. "Now tell us what he said to you?"—A. "He said, 'You must come in and vote'; that is all he said after that." Q. "What about the dinner?"—A. "He said to me like this: 'If you will come in and vote for Mr. Gower, I will give you dinner.'"

Therefore, he varies over and over, and over again, as to whether the word "if" was used or not; and the proper conclusion upon such evidence, with Grose's contradiction, as it appears to me, is that very probably Grose did tell him that there would be dinner if he came in. For Grose to have said that in the presence of a man who declared himself to be of Wyld's party, and not of Gower's, would have been incongruous; but to conclude that Grose entered into a compact with Pearce, or made him an offer conditional upon his coming in and voting for Mr. Gower, is a very different conclusion. I think the sum and substance of it is, "I wish you would come in and vote for Gower; if you come in and drop in upon me, I mean to have some eating and drinking at my house, and you may as well take a little if you come in." I think the true construction of that would be, "I mean to give meat and drink to voters, so as to come within the 23rd section;" not "I mean to corrupt your mind by offering you a dinner in consideration of your voting." I think it was done as accessory to and in the course of canvassing, but it was not proposed as an inducement. Then there is a variety of other witnesses who ought to be referred to. The next witness, I think, was William Trebilcock, who proved nothing whatsoever, and he was one of the witnesses who proved nothing. The next witness was George Inch. He was the man who had his little boy with him, leading him about, because he had suffered from illness before. I do not give that at all as a reason why his evidence should not be attended to. I think his evidence is important in another point of view, because what he says Mr. Grose stated to him was, "Take and vote for Gower, and I will write to Mr. Gower, and you shall be rewarded for it." Nothing at all was said to him about any dinner. It is pretty clear (and the learned counsel for the petition had too much experience and too much sagacity to think of saying the contrary), that an expression of that kind could not be relied upon as a real offer of a reward on condition of giving the vote. "Take and vote for Mr. Gower, and I will write to Mr. Gower, and you shall be rewarded for it." I do not think the evidence of this witness can be put out of the case as testing the probability of Grose's getting up a dinner in order to use it as a species of bribery; because there was no reason why, if he did, he should not have made point blank the offer of a dinner to him, as he is said to have done to the other witnesses as a condition of voting.

Then there is Mrs. Hancock, who I thought rather protested too much; I could not help rather suspecting her when she proclaimed her indignation at the suggestion of her husband's turning his coat for a dinner; quite right if it was honest indignation, but I rather suspected the vehemence of it at the time, and there appeared to be some reason for that suspicion, because she was the person who was obliged to confess that she had been before other tribunals, as the result of which she had been in prison.

Then there is James Hancock, who is her husband, and whose evidence, certainly, upon this subject is material; I do not like taking it from my own note, though it struck me at the time; I will refer to the shorthand writer's notes, and see whether I rightly heard him; he first spoke of having seen Mr. Grose and Mr. Gower, when he was not asked to dinner. The question was put to him, "Was nothing said to you by anybody about some dinner?"—A. "No, no one; not to me, but I have heard several things." Therefore, Grose, as regards him, had an opportunity of making him a promise direct, and of committing an act of bribery; but what he is said to have done, is to have told his wife, and then the man being called (a voter for Mr. Wyld) says, that Grose did not make any such offer to him, and he is then asked a question, which was objected to at the time, and which I ruled to be admissible, namely, whether he had heard anything about it from his wife. "Before you came up to vote, did your wife make any communication to you of something which Grose had told her, if so, let us have it?" "I think that my wife told me that Mr. Grose had said, that if I would come in the next morning, that is, the day before the election, he would give me dinner; that is all I can say about it, but I never had any dinner, and have never seen Mr. Grose, but there was nothing said about voting either side, that I heard."

Therefore, when the story of this man, to whom, through his wife, a corrupt promise was to be communicated, comes to be sifted, it turns out that no such promise was made to him at all, and he only thinks that he heard something of it from his wife before he went up to vote. If anyone doubts the character of the surface, I think this is sufficient to exhibit it, and to show that any person, supposing that he could walk steadily to a conclusion of bribery upon such evidence, would be a very rash and mistaken judge.

Then comes Goldsworthy, and Goldsworthy is a person who really struck me (I do not know whether I was right or wrong) as being bewildered; if he was not bewildered, he misconducted himself; upon the explanation of his rector, I come to the conclusion that he was a man perfectly bewildered, and his evidence does not appear to add much to the matter; if it is to be taken into account, it comes to Grose's telling Richard Hancock that he should have some refreshment, but not to a condition being imposed; then came Hancock, who gave the account of the transaction, that there was to be a bit of dinner as usual with the rest of Grose's tenants, which points to an innocent construction of Grose's act, dealing with it under the 4th, or corrupt treating section, though to a guilty view of it under the 23rd section, not avoiding the election.

Then comes the evidence of Elizabeth Hancock, who had been in the service of Mr. Grose. He admitted that he did mention to her that there was to be a bit of dinner. Then comes Thomas, who proved nothing.

Then comes Philp, who was a cripple, and who said that Mr. Grose did say he might go in, and who did go in and sit down at Grose's after voting for Mr. Gower. What is the amount of refreshment that that man received? That man received a little bread-and-butter and a drink of cider. Here again, one cannot help seeing, is one of the real pieces of evidence that came out so naturally that one could not doubt it. Philp was one of the people to be corrupted by Grose's conduct, and he comes in and is told, for kindness, he being a cripple, he may go in and sit down; he sits down, and has what I have referred to. He is one of the persons in respect of whom the chief actors in the transaction of the election had what I will call, without disrespect to either of them, a conflict this morning over their respective canvass books. Said Mr. Gower, "He promised me;" said Mr. Wyld, "No, he promised me, as well as many another man whom you have got as promising you." It is possible that some promised them both; but, with respect to Philp, he speaks for himself, and says, "I promised Gower, if I voted, not to vote against him." He said, "I have known Grose 40 or 50 years; and I had not promised to vote for Mr. Wyld." That is a small circumstance, but still one must endeavour, in a case in which there is a great deal of confusion, to get hold of as many matters as one can which appear to be material; and I do not think that that is immaterial. I think it was quite material in the opening to show that Mr. Wyld's just expectations, if there were any, had been disappointed. That had not been done in the course of the Petitioner's case; and, on the other hand, it was proved by the Respondent that he had just expectations. Certainly, so far as I have any means of testing the correctness of Mr. Gower's anticipations and Mr. Wyld's anticipations respectively, it should seem that Gower's were more accurate, at least they were in this case of Philp.

Then I have Marshall, who had some meat and drink; he had not been promised; he went in. Henry Ellery also went in; it was not suggested that he was promised; he got some information of what was going on. Others appear to have gone in also.

I believe that I have gone through the evidence of the witnesses that I meant to refer to, with the exception of the witness Joseph Hambley, and I must say that I agree with what was said on the part of the Respondent, that Joseph Hambley's evidence did in a remarkable way show how people will work up their minds to believe that others have done corrupt acts simply because they think that they are capable of them, and are induced to put an evil construction upon conduct which, considered by itself without the colouring of prejudice, really does not present any particular wickedness at all. They are induced, I daresay, by honest suspicion and honest prejudice, if there can be such, as I think there can, to believe—and then they come forward and allege as positive what is only their own belief and opinion of the transaction, whereas the belief and opinion which are to decide must be the belief and opinion of a person who is supposed to be capable of forming an impartial judgment.

This witness upon being pressed, actually said that he believed he was being dishonestly dealt by, and having had every opportunity of explaining why he came to that conclusion, he was obliged to admit, in the end, that the only reason why he said Grose was acting dishonestly towards him, was because he pressed him so sore, and exhibited so much anxiety that he should vote.

The

The conclusion which I should arrive at, therefore, is this; that taking the fact that so few persons out of the number whose names were known, and whose addresses were known, could be found to prove that bribery was intended by a conditional promise by Grose; taking into account that so few of those have been called, and the exceedingly untrustworthy character of their testimony in respect of its accuracy, without expressing an opinion as to all upon its honesty because it is unnecessary to do so, I am quite satisfied that I should be straining proof to an extent wholly unjustifiable, and certainly far beyond anything that I conscientiously believe in the matter, if I came to the conclusion that there was such an offer or promise as would amount to bribery within the 2nd section. And considering the circumstances of Grose, which have turned out, so far as his appearance would lead me to judge, to have been quite different from those which the learned counsel was instructed to state, and from his instructions stated in his opening speech, in the absence of any cross-examination as to that, concluding that he was a person who was quite able to give such a repast as he did in an innocent way, or at least so as to come within the 23rd section, without any imputation of corruption, looking at the exceedingly frugal character of the meat and drink which were provided, and at their exceeding disproportion to the number of persons whom, if the case is considered under the corrupt treating section, it would be necessary to consider that he intended to attract, if he did intend to entrap them in an illegal manner; and without referring to other circumstances which I have pointed out in the course of the case, I am equally unable to come to the conclusion that there was corrupt treating by Grose within the meaning of the 4th section.

That being so, inasmuch as the other alleged acts of corruption, especially intimidation, crumbled away in the course of the case, and were properly admitted to have failed in proof in the able reply with which I had the advantage of being assisted,—treating them, therefore, rather as showing the exaggerated character of the case, upon the whole, than as forming any ground for believing that part of it which was in the result relied upon, I must pronounce that no corrupt practice has been proved to avoid the election; and I must conclude by determining that Edward Frederick Leveson Gower, the Member whose return is complained of by the petition, was duly elected and returned. I must further determine that no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by any candidate at the election; and, further and lastly, that upon the evidence before me it does not appear that corrupt practices had prevailed, nor that there is any reason to believe that they have extensively prevailed at the last election for the Borough of Bodmin. I must add, because I am bound to dispose of the whole matter, and I have no doubt I should be applied to to dispose of it if I did not dispose of it myself, that I am further of opinion that this being a case of what I believe to have been as thoroughly creditable an election as any that well could take place, notwithstanding this jar by the conduct, discreet or indiscreet, of Mr. Grose, being as thoroughly pure an election as can well be expected to take place, so long as human beings are human beings; the case ought not to be considered as forming an exception to the general rule, and that the Petitioner having failed ought to pay the costs of the Respondent.

BRADFORD ELECTION.—(No. 1.)

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Baron Martin, 1869.

Bradford.
(No. 1.)

Mr. Baron Martin.] THIS is a petition presented by four gentlemen, who allege that Henry William Ripley was, by himself and others, guilty of bribery, treating, and undue influence; and that by so doing he was incapacitated to be elected a Member of Parliament, and that his election was void. I am of opinion that he was incapacitated to be elected, and that his election is void, upon the ground that he was guilty of treating; and I can arrive at that conclusion upon the evidence of the witnesses who have been called on his behalf. If I had to decide this case upon the evidence of Kitchenman, upon the evidence of Samuel Abel, and upon the evidence of his wife, I should come to the same conclusion. I am quite satisfied that upon the evidence of those three witnesses, adduced by the Respondent himself, his election was void; and that he was upon their evidence guilty of treating within the meaning of this Act of Parliament. This proceeding is under the authority of an Act passed in the last year, and I think it exceedingly desirable that all persons should understand what is the real meaning of it. An Act of Parliament is to be read according to the natural meaning of its language, and it is not to be read

Bradford.

according to the customs of the boroughs of Yorkshire, or what may have taken place at elections in those boroughs, according to the statement of the learned counsel. It is to be read according to the words which are contained in it, reading them in their ordinary and natural meaning; and persons must, whether it be difficult or not to carry out an election under the control of the Act of Parliament, submit to it. If they will carry on elections in defiance of the Act of Parliament, they must take the consequences; and it is not because it may be difficult to carry on an election in a town like Bradford, following the law, that therefore the law is to be superseded and set aside. The law must be obeyed, and, as I meant to say at a future stage of my judgment, in my opinion, Mr. Ripley might just as well have taken the 7,211 l., which sum is returned as his expenses, and thrown it down the nearest coal pit, as to have spent it in the manner he has done. It is utterly useless; and no election under the present law could stand after such an expenditure. The Act of Parliament, to which I have referred, enacts a punishment for corrupt practices, where it is found by the report of a Judge that bribery has been committed with the knowledge or consent of the candidate. That is the section which the learned Counsel for the Petitioners has thought proper to abandon as regards Mr. Ripley; and on behalf of Mr. Ripley, I will say that the learned counsel did right; for, in my opinion, there is no evidence sufficient to satisfy me that Mr. Ripley has committed an offence against this clause of the Act. The effect of the clause is this, that if the candidate himself commit or consent to bribery, he is incapacitated from being elected; from that moment his status as a candidate is gone; it is as much gone as if he were an alien and could not be elected at all. Every vote given for him, were they the whole votes of the borough, would not carry his election, because the law says that the man who is guilty of bribery is, ipso facto, disqualified from being a candidate, and cannot be elected; and this section imposes upon such a candidate very serious disabilities. He cannot be registered as a voter, or stand at any election in the kingdom; he is incapable of holding any office under the Municipal Corporation Act; he is incapable of holding any judicial office, or of being appointed or acting as a justice of the peace; and he is further incapable of sitting in Parliament for a period of seven years. That is the consequence of a candidate himself committing bribery to the extent of one single voter. That is the law, and it is not to be altered or set aside by stating that it is a hard law, or one difficult to be followed, and that it has not been followed in this country hitherto. The section upon which the present petition is founded is the 42nd, which refers to another section in a former Act of Parliament, and those two sections taken together, substantially enact that if a candidate, other than by direct agency, shall, by the act of a person for whom he is responsible, be guilty of bribery, treating, or undue influence, he is incapacitated to be elected; and my judgment is that it has been clearly established that Mr. Ripley was, by his agents, guilty of treating within the meaning of those Acts of Parliament, and that their operation necessarily is to disqualify him for election. That is the matter upon which I propose to rest my judgment; and it will be very short, for the whole of the material evidence in this case lies in a narrow compass. If the evidence upon the petition had been confined to a few keepers of public-houses, by calling Kitcheman and Samuel Abel and his wife, the whole case might have been concluded in a few hours. Now, what is the evidence of this treating, and I will take the evidence for this purpose from the witnesses of the Respondent himself? It has been proved that there were opened in this town, by persons for whom it is admitted Mr. Ripley was responsible, 158 public-houses; that is the beginning of it. I am now speaking from a statement in writing, which was handed to me by one of the learned Counsel for the Respondent, Mr. Littler, and the statement is, that in 43 houses there were no refreshments supplied, so that, deducting those, there were 115 public-houses opened in the town in which refreshments were supplied. The learned Counsel for the Respondent has stated that these refreshments were supplied to people who had done work, but the evidence is directly the contrary; the evidence is that voters were admitted to those committee-rooms; that the farce was gone through of putting down their names as committee-men, and that their names being so put down, refreshments were furnished to them, whether they were voters or non-voters, or messengers; that is the evidence in the case. Kitcheman says, "I spoke to the landlord or landlords, and I told them that reasonable refreshments were to be furnished to the committees, but that I hoped they would take care that no excessive expense was gone to." That is his statement of it, and so far from his proving that these refreshments were furnished to persons who were supposed to have done work, it is directly the contrary, for his directions were that the refreshments were to be furnished generally to the committees. What does Samuel Abel say? He states that there was a committee held at his house, and that all the people there were to get anything in reason without paying for it; that is his account of the matter, and the evidence given by his wife this morning was exactly to the same effect. She told a story with respect to a sum of 2 l. which was given on the day of the election, and which she stated came out of her own pocket, to which, however, I attach no importance; it is, therefore, proved by the witnesses that at these public-houses refreshments were given, and that refreshments were to be afforded to the persons who came there, and they were afforded both to voters and to non-voters, and to any persons who were admitted to the room, with the caution that they should not be excessive, but reasonable; that is the evidence given by the witnesses called called by the Respondent. What does the Act of Parliament say? It is a long clause, and I have no doubt that it was prepared with a view to these matters being discussed before a Committee of the House of Commons, and if the present tribunal had existed, this clause would not have been framed in the way in which it is, and that it was put into this shape in order to meet in words almost every case that could occur. It enacts, "That every candidate at an election who shall corruptly give or be accessory to the giving, or shall pay any expenses incurred for any meat, drink, entertainment, or provision, in order to be elected, shall be deemed guilty of the offence of treating;" now, suppose I were to hold that Mr. Ripley did not, by those persons who are admitted to have been his agents, corruptly give; viz., "a thing wilfully done and known to be against the law," I really do not know what would be said by any person if I were to come to the conclusion that those public-houses were not wilfully and in order to influence the election opened for the purpose of persons going there and obtaining meat and drink, which was not to be paid for by them but by the candidate; I should be wasting words in attempting further to explain it, for it is as plain a case as can be, and to anyone who understands the meaning of language, that section to which I have referred has been contravened by Mr. Ripley's conduct and the acts of those persons whom he employed, as it could have been. That is the ground upon which I rest my judgment; I do not mean to go into the imaginary cases which Mr. Price has referred to, but I have no doubt that if there was a candidate who came to a town, and he, as the case was put, called his friends and supporters together to discuss the matter of an election, and he paid for their refreshments, that would not be corrupt treating; that has no semblance to what has taken place in this case; what is that compared with public-houses being thrown open to any man to come there and get beer, tobacco, and anything he liked to drink? In my opinion, this case falls as clearly within the Act of Parliament as a case can fall, and it is upon that ground that I shall certify to the Speaker of the House of Commons that Mr. Ripley was not duly elected, but that his election was void by reason of his having been guilty of treating. But I should do wrong if I did not call attention to another matter which has occurred in the course of these proceedings. There is an Act of Parliament, the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 29, an Act that was passed in the year 1863, for the purpose of endeavouring to prevent corrupt practices in the election of Members, and it enacts in the plainest language that within two months after the election a detailed statement of the election expenses incurred by the candidate shall be furnished to the returning officer, and delivered to him with the bills and vouchers relating thereto. Now, what has been done in this case? In defiance of that Act of Parliament, a return has been sent in with the knowledge that it was in defiance of that Act, and Mr. Little in his evidence admitted that he did so, but states that he did it because his agent in London had told him that that was the way to do it. Is it possible to conceive that a gentleman can stand up and say that no conclusion ought to be drawn against his client, when the managing agent of that client acts directly and knowingly in defiance of the Act of Parliament? I should say that, if the counsel for the Petitioners had rested his case simply upon that, and had put in the account, and proved that no bills or vouchers had been delivered to the Mayor of Bradford, I should have called upon the Respondent to prove the legality of every payment that was contained in that account; my impression is that that alone would have made a prima facie case against any person; especially when I call attention to the amounts contained in the paper. I should be prepared to draw the strongest inference against any candidate who had so conducted himself, and had acted directly in defiance of an Act of Parliament which was passed for the express purpose of endeavouring to obtain purity of election. What is the document that has been handed in? I have read what the Act of Parliament requires to be done, and I have spoken already about treating. I will now read what the items are which were sent in on the part of Mr. Ripley, and I find that there is put down for "Committee-rooms and expenses, 1,997 l. 18 s. 3 d." This is one item, and I will take the analysis which was given to me by the learned Counsel for the Respondent, and it is this:—He stated that it was 1,900 l. and odd, but I see that it was returned at 1,997 l. 18 s. 3 d. Of this he said that the sum of 737 l. 8 s. 6 d. was for the rent of rooms, and that for refreshments exclusively there was a sum of 113 l., and that the balance of the account was for miscellaneous items. Now here is an election where, as I have said, there were upwards of 115 public-houses in which refreshments were given in the manner I have stated, and the payments for them amounted to 1,997 l. 18 s. 3 d.; and can it be supposed that any election can stand after such an expenditure? Then, what is the next item? "For messengers, clerks, and canvassers, 1,973 l. 11 s. 4 d." But who are those canvassers? It appears that there are a number of Irish voters in this town, and it was fair that all proper influence should be used to persuade them that Mr. Ripley was the more proper person to be elected a Member of Parliament. Then here is an account of the people who were called canvassers; and in the first place there is an account of Joseph Gibson's expenditure, and in the list that he handed in I find the names of Brannan, Powell, Geary, Freeman, and others. There are some other names which seem to be rather English names; the others are all Irish. That is his list, and it appears that 10 l. 15 s. was paid to them. Then comes another list containing the names of Laggan, O'Donnell, Heeley, Midgley, Welch, Dirkin, McGowan, Handy, McDonald, Donaghan, Gallagha, and Terry. I again

Bradford.
(No. 1.)

select the Irish names, and it appears that the payments made to those men were 5 s., 10 s., and 1 l., as the case might be. Then there comes another list of William Banks', at the "Beckett Arms" and the "Prince of Wales," and if I had to decide this case on bribery, can any person suppose that my eyes would be closed to this, and that I could not see that it was a mere pretence and cloak for bribery? I have not the slightest doubt in my own mind that the whole of the canvassing that was carried on was a mere pretence for giving those persons money to use their exertions in influencing the Irish voters. I need not decide upon that, but I have no doubt that the whole of that was a mere cloak and pretence. As I have already stated, the amount of the entire expenditure was put down 7,211 l. 16 s. 7 d., and I certainly have a very strong impression that no election will justify any such expenditure, and that that alone would make a case sufficient to call for an explanation as to how such a large sum of money had been spent. I have very little more to say upon this matter; but I think I am called upon to make an observation or two. I have not the slightest doubt that there are many respectable people in this borough who hold different opinions upon politics, and that they honestly hold them, and they have a perfect right to express them; but I really do beseech them to join themselves together for the purpose of putting down such an iniquitous system as that which has prevailed. Why the respectable persons in this borough should allow themselves to be dictated to by such a class of persons as we have had here, or why they should submit to have the election turned by means of votes obtained as it was proposed to obtain them here, I cannot understand. I therefore would ask you, as honest and respectable men, to unite in putting down such a system, and to determine that you will not support any candidate who opens public-houses in the manner in which they have been opened here; that you will not support any man who will countenance such a system, and that you will use every endeavour to put a stop to it. I have made these observations with a view to your own advantage. I came here not expecting to hear anything of the kind. I had been told that in boroughs like Bradford, which is one of the most thriving towns in the kingdom, and which obtained the franchise in 1832, the elections were conducted in an honest and fair and lawful manner, and that there was no bribery in them, and I really believed it. I arrived in this town not having the slightest conception of that which has been proved to have been done. I therefore do trust and hope that the honest people in this borough will join together; that they will sink their little differences upon political matters, and that they will one and all endeavour to put a stop to this system, which is not merely utterly illegal and contrary to law, but I should say tends to debase the borough and, to some extent, the kingdom itself. I have said this much with respect to a very great number of persons, who I believe are by far the majority of the voters, persons who are desirous to do their duty fairly and honestly, to exercise their franchise conscientiously, and return a fit man to Parliament; a man who understands the trade of the town, who is able to give his time to his duties to promote the prosperity of the borough, and to carry out the views of his fellow-townsmen, respected by all parties. There are gentlemen, belonging to this town, who would well fill the office of Member of Parliament, with credit to themselves, and with advantage to their constituents; but I would ask, what is the use of an expenditure of 7,200 l.? An election carried out with such an expenditure, spent as it was here, has no more chance of being upheld than it would have if the candidate were to stand in the middle of the street inviting every person to come and receive 5 l. for his vote. It is really throwing it away. I may say that I never did, in the course of my experience, arrive at a more clear conclusion than I have, that Mr. Ripley, by his agents, has contravened that section of the Act to which I have referred. It will therefore be my duty to declare him not duly elected, and to report that to the Speaker of the House of Commons. With respect to the other matters upon which I must report, the first is, whether any corrupt practices have been proved to have been committed with the knowledge and consent of the candidate. That is the report which I am called upon to make under the 43rd section of the Act, and upon that I shall report that no such corrupt practices have been proved before me to have been committed within the knowledge of Mr. Ripley. Then as to the names of the persons who have been proved to have been guilty of any corrupt practices, several have been proved to be so guilty, but I shall return only the names of those who have been guilty, upon their own evidence. The third matter is, whether there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have prevailed to a great extent in this borough. I think they have existed, but there is no reason to believe that they prevailed extensively during the election. I believe that there was treating going on to a very considerable extent, but, as far as one can learn, it was confined very much to one part of the town. I do not think that it was of a character which would justify me, understanding the Act of Parliament as I do, in reporting to that effect. The only other observation which I have to make, is with regard to the evidence which appears to be rather contradictory, such as Kitchenman's, and the four people who were called first, Bowen and the others; I doubt very much whether those people intended, any of them, to give a false account of the matter. Kitchenman gave an account, as it struck his mind, and I believe the others did the same. I think that the contradiction is more apparent than real. I must say, too, that there is no evidence of any gross intoxication or gross drunkenness existing during the election, but what was done was that the committee-rooms were opened, and that every person who was supposed to be a voter, and who went there, was allowed to partake, at the expense of

Mr.

Mr. Ripley, of any refreshment that was required. That is the history of that matter. I shall therefore not report that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices prevailed extensively in this borough.

BRADFORD ELECTION.—(No. 2.)

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Baron Martin, 2 February 1869.

Bradford.
(No. 2.)

Mr. Baron Martin.] THIS is a petition presented by two gentlemen, Mr. Storey and Mr. Garnett, which prays that it may be determined that Mr. Forster was not duly elected or returned at the election which took place last November. I have no doubt that the petition is one which has been taken from a form kept at the office from which it proceeded; and it charges all manner of possible offences against the candidate which would affect his seat. The first 11 allegations are founded upon the first head of the 2nd section of the statute 17th & 18th of Victoria, chapter 102. The 12th is founded upon the 4th section. In my opinion, this case depends upon that section, and upon that alone, and the question will be whether or not it is proved to my satisfaction that Mr. Forster has violated the provisions of the 4th section. The residue is directed to undue influence, of which there is no evidence. With regard to bribery, there is no pretence for imputing it. The evidence upon that point was perfectly contemptible. The evidence was that a man, or two men, went to canvass at the house of a person who had been eight weeks out of work. His wife was there, and there were three children. The wife was the woman who was called yesterday, as wretched a looking woman as need be. The husband, at the time when these men called, had been out of work, and on their leaving his place, one of them gave a child 2s. 6d. That is the whole story; and that is supposed to be bribery, because a person gave to the child of a woman whose husband had been out of work for eight weeks 2s. 6d., that I should hold a kind act done to a family in distress and poverty, to be an attempt to bribe a man who voted for the other side, would be ridiculous. The next head of bribery was that of a man who had gone to live in Leeds, and the history of that transaction was this: a friend of his, living in the same street that he did in Bradford, went over the Sunday before the election to Leeds, and asked him to come and vote for Forster and Miall. He came by a third-class train, and paid 2s. for, I suppose, a return ticket; the man gave him 2s. 6d., thinking he came second class, and that is supposed to be bribery. The third case was that of a woman who went, about half-past seven o'clock, to the house of a man lying in his bed, for the purpose of calling him up. She said she understood he was behindhand in his rent, and she saw him afterwards with some money in his hand, and that is supposed to prove bribery on the part of Mr. Forster or some person acting on his behalf. I need not say that such evidence is beneath contempt, and ought never to have been brought forward. The case therefore resolves itself into whether there has been an act or acts done within the meaning of the 4th section. The law is that voters should exercise their franchise freely; that is the expression to be found in the law books, and the meaning of "freely" is that a man upon whom the Legislature has conferred the elective franchise, should exercise his own judgment, and should arrive at a conclusion which of the candidates he honestly believes is the best person to represent the borough, and give his vote for him. If it could be, it ought to be given from the man's own judgment, and no influence whatever ought to be brought to bear upon him. The policy and the theory of the law is, that a man upon whom the elective franchise is conferred should judge for himself which is the best and preferable candidate, and give his vote accordingly. But influences are brought to bear upon men which cannot be prevented. There are some influences which are called due influences, and other influences which are called undue influences, and the law has endeavoured to punish the use of undue influences. Amongst these influences there are what are called bribery, treating, and oppression, that is, an improper and undue pressure put upon a man. But if pressure is put upon a man, or a bribe is administered to him, no matter by whom, or treating is given to a man, no matter by whom, for the purpose of affecting his vote, the effect is to annihilate the man's vote, because he gives his vote upon an influence which, the law says, deprives him of free action; he becomes a man incompetent to give a vote, because he has not that freedom of will and of mind which the law contemplates he ought to have for the purpose of voting. But that affects the man alone, it does not affect the candidate; it has merely the effect of extinguishing the vote, and if there was a scrutiny for the purpose of ascertaining who had the majority of lawful votes, that man's vote ought to be struck off the poll, but that is all. But it has been long held, before these Acts of Parliament passed at all, that by the common law of the land, that is, law not created by the enactments of Acts of Parliament, bribery, undue influence, and undue pressure, vitiate an election. So that if it had been proved that there existed in this town generally bribery to a large extent, and that it came from unknown quarters, that no one could tell where it had come from, but that people were bribed generally and indiscriminately; or if it could be proved that there was treating in all directions on purpose to influence voters, that houses were thrown open where people could get drink without paying for it, by the common law such election would be void, because it would be carried on contrary to the principle of the law. It is said in this case, and truly, that there was no such bribery or treating as at common law would affect the election as to the bribery, or rather the treating; for there is not in this case, nor was there in the other, any substantial proof of bribery, properly so called, that is, giving a bribe in money or money's worth. As I have already stated, there is no evidence of such general treating or general corruption, as would lead me, or lead anyone, to decide that the election was void by common law; therefore the result is that, for the purpose of unseating Mr. Forster and declaring his election void, it is essential for the Petitioners to bring him within the enactment of the Act of Parliament, which says that if a person commits the acts which are there called treating, that that shall affect his seat, and deprive him of the status of a candidate. It is for the Petitioners to prove that Mr. Forster was guilty of acting contrary to the 4th section of this Act, otherwise his seat cannot be affected; it may be that votes were given to him which, upon a scrutiny, would be struck off; it may be that the 23rd section of the Act of Parliament has been violated, but there is nothing in that 23rd section to affect the seat or the status of the candidate, and he can only be affected by the 4th section. I am clearly of opinion that the argument addressed to me by Mr. Price as to the 23rd section, is unavailing. It may prove that a penalty was incurred by what was done in giving refreshments upon the polling day, contrary to the 23rd section, but that has no relation to the 4th section, except in so far as the same act is evidence that may be used to establish his proposition, and show that something was done by Mr. Forster which contravenes the 4th section; therefore the question comes to this: Has that been proved to have been done? The evidence in this case resolves itself into two periods; it resolves itself into what was done before the election, that is, before the polling day, and what was done on the polling day, and the evidence is perfectly distinct upon these matters. Mr. Price has stated that this case is analogous to the case against Mr. Ripley; but in reality there is not the slightest analogy between them; there is an analogy in name, but it is only in name; in substance and reality there is none. The cases are quite distinct, as distinct as they can be. The case against Mr. Ripley was, that he had opened public-houses in the sense in which that is commonly understood, that they were public-houses selected by him or by his agents; that rooms were allotted in these houses where people went every night if they liked; that a messenger or some person was put at the door, for the purpose of preventing improper persons going there, but the people who went nightly to these public-houses went there and obtained drink, and the only limit which was put upon the drink was that it was to be given to them in reason, and that it was not to be given in excess. I have referred to the evidence this morning of Kitcheman, who was the active agent in the election for Mr. Ripley, and who stated that he was the person who opened these public-houses, and that his direction was to afford refreshment to persons who applied for it, but to afford it in reason, and not in excess. That is what I call opening a public-house; that is the meaning which has always been attached to the expression, a sort of open-house for voters to go to, and there be supplied with drink at the expense of the candidate at the will, or you may say at the discretion, of the landlord or landlady; that is the meaning of opening a public-house in the sense in which that word is used with reference to an election. But what resemblance has that case to the present? None. You have had a number of gentlemen called before you, amongst them Mr. Wade, upon whom no imputation could rest; and there were a number of other gentlemen called, every one of the chairmen of the different committees in the different wards, upon whom no imputation is cast. There was no cross-examination of them, and they swore that the selection of the public-houses in regard to Mr. Forster and Mr. Miall's election, was as different as night from day, compared with the case of Mr. Ripley, and that what was done was that they went to these places and agreed that they should have the use of the rooms on the nights when they went there, not every night, but merely that they should have these rooms upon the nights of the general meetings, when they went there to address the persons who attended. They paid them so much a night for the use of the rooms, but that is not the same thing as opening a public-house; one and all of these men swore that there was no drinking going on while they held their meetings. I see no reason to impute to the witnesses who have been called, that they came here wilfully to forswear themselves. It is not what persons may have done, or may possibly have supposed was done, for they may have supposed that these public-houses on behalf of Mr. Miall and Mr. Forster were of the same character and the same description as those that were opened on behalf of Mr. Ripley; I say it is not because they may have supposed that, but what they really were is to guide me. If I believe the evidence of the gentlemen who were called yesterday, Mr. Wade and the others, which I do believe, it was an entirely different character of thing altogether; it was the hiring of a room for the purpose of using it once a week, Bradford.

Bradford.
(No. 2.)

(No. 2.)

a week, or once a fortnight, as it might be, but during the remainder of the time, that is at the times when it was not so occupied, it was to be used like any other room in a public-house, open to the public. When persons saw in the window, or upon the walls, the names of Forster and Miall, they may have supposed that the houses were of the same character as those that were used in the case of Mr. Ripley; but, if I believe the evidence of those gentlemen, who have been called, which it is not pretended I ought not to believe, the character of the public-houses, as opened and occupied by Messrs. Forster and Miall, was as different from that of the public-houses which were opened by Mr. Ripley, as it is possible one thing can be from another; the only resemblance is that they were public-houses. Therefore, believing the evidence of the gentlemen who were called yesterday, I can see clearly that this was not an opening of a public-house in the sense in which the opening of a public-house at an election, which was proved to exist in Mr. Ripley's case, that is, providing a room where voters and other persons could go, where drink was supplied, and where the supply was free, with a view thereby to influence voters. Then I have to inquire whether it is proved that what Mr. Forster has done has forfeited his seat. I should be excessively grieved if I felt myself compelled to declare his election void, because, from his evidence, and the evidence of Mr. Wade, and the evidence of the other gentlemen who have been called, I am satisfied that, as far as they were concerned, this was as honest an election as ever was carried on. Mr. Forster has sworn that he intended it to be so, and that he gave directions that it should be so; that after he became a candidate he went abroad, and that upon his return he was determined that the thing should not rest merely upon directions, but that he himself would personally investigate what was going on for the purpose of preventing anything being done that was wrong or unlawful. It was said that he was a man who in Parliament advocated and supported this Act under which I am now sitting. I cannot say that I feel myself under any particular obligation to him for so doing, for it is perfectly well known that it was against the wish of all the judges, who unanimously protested against it, and that it was imposed upon them as much against their will as any duty could possibly be. But when the Act was passed, it was their duty to obey it. The objections to it which were held by the judges were embodied in a letter written by the Chief Justice to the then Lord Chancellor, and I believed then, and I believe now, that those objections were such as ought to have had weight with the Legislature. My own personal objection to it is that I am called upon to do what I am now compelled to do, that is, to denude myself of my real office, and instead of sitting as a common-law judge to decide matters of law, and leaving the decision of matters of fact to juries, I am compelled to sit here to decide upon a pure matter of fact, as if I myself were a jury. It is a duty which I think ought not to have been imposed upon a judge, and for the simplest possible reason: there is no one, whether he be a lawyer or not, who knows anything of mankind who does not know that different men take different views with regard to facts; and I am confident that there are many men, and many men quite as competent as I am, who might take a different view of the facts which have been proved in this case from what I take. I believe that that will of necessity occur. Well, it may be asked, taking the view I do, why do I sit here? It is in a measure my own voluntary act, for when the Act was passed, it was alleged that the judges were not all bound to undertake the duty, that three additional judges were appointed, and they accepted the appointment with the knowledge of what they had to undertake, and that therefore it was no hardship upon them. The judges considered what ought to be done, and they were unanimously of opinion that the Legislature having passed this Act, it was the duty of the three senior judges to undertake the duty, and that it was not because it was an unpleasant duty that they should cast it upon the three judges newly appointed. This has placed me here to decide, not upon a matter of law, but to sit as a jurymen to decide upon matters of fact. Another matter connected with these inquiries is this, that I think it would be worth the while of the three judges who are engaged in trying these election petitions to consider whether or not, upon a question of fact, they would not simply say, "Such is my opinion," and so end it. But in the cases that have occurred, and this I believe is the fifth, the judges have gone at considerable length into their reasons why they have arrived at a certain conclusion of fact upon the evidence given. We are sitting as, I have already said, in the position of jurymen, and jurymen sit to hear evidence; they hear the summing up of the judge, who prevents any illegal evidence being laid before them, and they are then left to give their verdict for the plaintiff or the defendant, or guilty or not guilty, and there the matter ends; you do not interrogate a jury as to why they arrive at a certain conclusion. I doubt very much whether it will conduce to the public interests if the three judges who are now called upon to decide matters of fact should go into their reasons why they come to a certain conclusion which will be more or less satisfactory according as persons may look at it in different lights. As I have already said, different persons look at facts in different ways, and I believe you never will get uniformity of opinion upon them. As I have already said, this case depends upon the 4th section of the Act of Parliament; I have also already said that the case of bribery has failed. Bribery is a thing quite different from treating, and I have observed that both Mr. Justice Willes and Mr. Justice Blackburn have taken occasion in the judgments they have pronounced—Mr. Justice Willes in three cases, and Mr. Justice Blackburn in one—to state their view of the distinction which exists between the two. Bribery is the giving of money or money's worth, and to any man in a respectable condition of life, nothing could be more offensive than an offer of money for his vote. I am sorry, however, to say that that is not the case with respect to other classes of voters; and we have seen them come into the witness-box, and state that they had received some small sums, without exhibiting any feeling of shame about it. They did not appear to feel that they had done anything wrong, and they took it as readily as they would have taken money for a day's wages; they had no shame about it, and I dare say they would tell their fellow-workmen that they had got it, and rather pride themselves upon having obtained it than otherwise. The 2nd section of the Act of Parliament deals with bribery, and bribery is, as ordinarily understood, the giving of money; and the enactment is this: "Every person who shall give any money to a voter to induce the voter to vote is declared to commit an offence." There is nothing there said about "corruptly;" it is simply the giving of money to induce a voter to vote, and that is declared to be an offence; and if a candidate does it, or if a person for whom he is responsible does it, he loses his status as a candidate and cannot be elected. The law fixes upon the act of giving money to a man to vote; every man must know that it is an unlawful and wrong thing to give it, and every man who receives it must know, at least if he be a man in a certain condition of life, that he is doing a dishonourable and a dishonest act in being bribed; there the Act stops, and there is nothing about "corruptly" in it; it does not apply to the mind of the man who offers, or to him who takes; it condescends upon the fact of giving money to a man to vote. That is the meaning of the Act, as is shown beyond all doubt by the next two lines, which say, "or shall corruptly do any such act on account of such voter having voted." The section draws a distinction between them, and it says that if you give money to a man to vote before an election, that is ipsa facto bribing, and as a consequence disqualifies a candidate from being elected; but if the money is given after a man has voted you must show that it was done corruptly. What is the exact meaning of the word "corruptly"? It is difficult to say, but I am satisfied that it means a thing done with an evil mind and intention, and unless there be an evil mind or an evil intention accompanying the act, it is not corruptly done. "Corruptly" means an act done by a man knowing that he is doing what is wrong, and doing it with an evil object. I have called attention to the 2nd section of this Act of Parliament in order to explain what, in my view, is the true meaning of it. The man does not live who entertains a higher opinion of Mr. Justice Willes than I do; I believe him to be one of the ablest lawyers that ever sat upon the bench; but in what has been referred to, he was speaking of giving money; and what he had directly in his mind was bribing in the sense I have described. He had not in his consideration at all the 4th section, which is to be read as a written document, a meaning to be given to every word of it; and the meaning is that which the terms naturally and fairly import. Every person who is called upon to construe the Act, is to read it in its natural and ordinary sense, and in the way that any man of good education would read it. It is one of the first rules in the construction of Acts of Parliament, which are an embodiment in writing of the wills of the House of Commons, the House of Lords, and the Queen, that you are to give to the words their ordinary, common, and natural meaning; and here are the words upon which I am to put a construction:—"Every candidate who shall 'corruptly,' by himself, or by any person, give, or be accessory to the giving, or shall pay, wholly or in part, any expense incurred for meat or drink, in order to be elected or for being elected, shall be deemed guilty of treating." The question I have to consider is whether Mr. Forster did corruptly give, or pay expenses incurred for meat or drink, in order to be elected. In the first place I have the positive oath of Mr. Forster that he did nothing of the kind, but as far as he possibly could, he tried to avoid it. I have also the oaths of eight persons who were the chairmen of his committees, and they swear that Mr. Wade having communicated to them—I am now speaking of what occurred before the polling-day certain instructions, they acted honestly and bonâ fide upon them, endeavouring to avoid doing anything that was wrong, knowing that it would avoid the election. They one and all swear that they adhered most strictly to the instructions given to them, and there was no cross-examination; it was not insinuated by the learned counsel, who appeared in support of the petition, that any doubt could be thrown upon the word of any of those gentlemen. They stated most positively that they knew of nothing that was wrong, and if anything wrong was done, it was done unknown to them. I certainly do think that it would be an unfortunate thing if a man who came forward to stand honestly for the purpose of being elected Member of Parliament for his native town, who selected as respectable people as apparently could be found in it, and was most scrupulously desirous of doing nothing whatever that was illegal, should nevertheless have his seat affected by means of an act done by some third person doing what he had directly forbidden to be done. The only act that has any weight upon my mind is the case of Lockwood Stephenson yesterday; all the others amount to nothing. There were some persons who got beer given to them, and I have no doubt that many of them told the truth. I have no doubt that there were enthusiastic partisans of Forster and Miall, who were desirous of getting votes, who saw people in public-houses who were voters as they thought, and they did give them or treat them with some beer, for the purpose, so far as they were concerned, of inducing those persons to vote. Now, the giving of that beer, and the taking of it, might possibly affect the votes of the persons who were so treated, but there is not a particle of evidence, except in the case of Lockwood Stephenson, to connect Mr. Forster, or to connect any one of the persons for whom he was responsible, with it. It appears that a man went to canvass a person having no directions given to him about it, but being a warm partisan, proposed to a man to vote for Mr. Forster. He stated that he had doubts in his mind, and would rather vote for Mr. Ripley than the other. The man said, "I will satisfy you that Mr. Forster is the best man to vote for; come to this public-house, and let us talk about the matter." They went, and he called for two glasses of beer, paid 4*d.* for it, and gave it to the man. Now, that is not treating in the sense of this Act of Parliament; there is nothing corrupt in it. It was a natural thing to do, and it has no resemblance whatever to that "corrupt" treating which is within the meaning of the Act; the real case, and the only case, which at all bears upon the question before me is the case of Lockwood Stephenson and Mrs. Hill. Mrs. Hill, as the learned counsel said truly, gave her evidence with very great honesty; and, in point of fact, she and Stephenson concur. Stephenson said, "We must do the best we can, we must give them a sup of something;" and she gave it to the people who came in. That was her account of the matter, and I am satisfied that the woman was telling the truth. Stephenson's account is this; it does not appear what position he was in beyond this, that he was a partisan and a good wisher of Mr. Forster's, and desired to advocate his cause.

Bradford.
(No. 2.)

Mr. Price.] He was a vice-chairman, my Lord.

Mr. Baron Martin.] He stated that he was an active partisan, and he was so described by several people; that upon the Friday before the election he went to Mrs. Hill's house, which I understand is in a low part of the town where Irish people live, and that a number of people came into the house, and said to him that the other side were treating and giving away beer largely, and complained that they could not get any. To use his own words, he said, "Those people are going off like sheep." "Give them some beer and keep them quiet." Now, I have not the slightest doubt that it is the real thing that occurred; was that a "corrupt" act by him, and supposing that an action had been brought against him for a penalty of 50*l.* by reason of that act, would that have been considered a corrupt act? I doubt it; I have already said, I doubt whether it would bring Lockwood Stephenson himself within the meaning of the 4th section, and I am not prepared by reason of it to declare that Mr. Forster, who has been perfectly honest throughout, and desired that nothing should be done that was illegal or wrong, has thereby forfeited his seat. If I were a jurymen I would not find a man guilty upon such evidence; if I had to say guilty or not guilty, I should say "Not guilty." The next question that I have to consider is, whether what was done upon the polling-day, and which is altogether a different matter, falls within the meaning of the 4th section. I do not think it does. What was done upon the polling-day was this: a number of persons who were supporters of Mr. Forster had formed themselves into committees to carry his election, and in this particular ward there were about 1,400 persons who voted for Mr. Ripley, 1,300 and odd who voted for Mr. Forster, and 1,200 and odd for Mr. Miall, and there were 60 refreshments provided and supplied by means of the tickets of which we have heard. Mr. Wade was called, and it is admitted on all hands that he is a man of respectability, and that he would not in this case, nor in any other, state anything but what he believed to be true. His account of the matter is, that he had given great consideration to the question, and that he knew these persons would be occupied in the election, which, as he truly said, was more like eight separate elections, and he treated each ward separately. He knew that persons would be required at the committee rooms during the whole of the time to carry on the necessary business of the election, and he told us that he and Mr. Little, who was engaged on the other side, had gentlemen attending to the poll for the purpose of checking the polling—they are called check clerks. The poll clerks had to take down the votes, and the check clerks had to check them and ascertain that they were correct. He stated that he and Mr. Little went to the town clerk, a gentleman not likely to do anything wrong, and Mr. Little and he agreed that the town clerk should provide refreshments for the clerks, and that they would afterwards repay the expense so incurred; both sides concur in saying that that was a necessary thing to be done. The men were obliged to be there during the whole day, and no man could reasonably be expected to sit from eight in the morning until four in the afternoon without getting some refreshment of some kind or other; but all sides agree that it was an innocent act, and an act of which no person can complain. Now, what was really done? According to the evidence, which I will take as it stands, it was doing precisely in the committee-rooms the same thing as was agreed to be done at the polling booths by both parties, that refreshments should be given to the men who required them to enable them to carry on the work of the election, and witness after witness swore that those refreshments were given to nobody else; that care was taken to give them to no persons except those who were actually engaged in labour. The question is whether or not that falls within the section of this Act to which I have referred; I am of opinion that it does not. That which is provided against is that the candidate shall not "corruptly" give any meat or drink "in order to be elected;" and I think that, to put a proper construction upon this act, the meaning must be given to the word "corruptly" which I have indicated, viz., a thing done with an evil mind; there must be some evil motive in it, and it must be done "in order to be elected." But those are negatived. In the first place it was not given "in order to be elected," because all these men were voters, and it was known how they would vote. They were there because they were voters who had declared their intention to support Mr. Forster. It is therefore idle to suppose that the meat and the drink were given to induce them to vote ; their intentions were known ; their minds were made up.

I therefore think that there is an absence of anything to satisfy me that it was done "corruptly," and, in my judgment, the doing of what was done, believing it to have been bonâ fide and honestly done, does not come within the meaning of the 4th section. I think that both objections to Mr. Forster's election fail, and it will be my duty to declare his election a valid one, and so to report to the Speaker of the House of Commons. The costs will follow the event.

BRIDGWATER ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Blackburn, 26 February 1869.

Bridgwater.

Mr. Justice Blackburn.] THERE are one or two smaller matters which, not expecting this course, I have not quite determined, but upon the important part of the inquiry I can express my determination at once.

The law requires that when an inquiry upon an election petition has been heard, the judge should in the first instance determine whether or not the two Members were duly returned and elected. As to that, the law is very clear, and it has long been clearly established, that where there is bribery or corruption, the seat obtained by the bribery or corruption cannot be supported. I believe the law to be, though I do not think it has been distinctly settled, that if the bribery or corruption was to such an extensive degree (though it was not shown to be in any way connected with the agents or persons belonging to the Members) as to show that it was not a fair and open election, but a corrupt election, or if it was shown that corrupt practices of any sort, however small, were committed by an agent of the sitting Member, the seat is vacated ; and it has been established that it is not at all necessary and essential that the agent should have been acting with the knowledge or consent, or with the request, of the Member ; if he abuses his authority, and commits corruption, it equally vacates the seat as if the corrupt practices had been committed by the express direction and authority of the Member. It has never yet been distinctly and precisely defined what degree of evidence is required to establish such a relation between the sitting Member and the person who had been guilty of corruption, as should constitute agency. I do not pretend to be able to define it, certainly ; no one yet has been able to go further than to say, as to some cases, that enough has been established to make the seat vacant, and in some other cases, enough has not been established to make the seat vacant ; this case is on the right side of the line, and that is on the wrong side of the line ; but the line itself has never yet been definitely drawn, and I profess myself to be unable accurately to draw the line. But, in the present case, certainly, I believe quite sufficient primâ facie evidence has been given to call for an answer ; enough primâ facie evidence has been given to show that those who have been shown to be guilty of corrupt practices here were agents of the Members, and no doubt counsel were perfectly well advised when they advised their clients that that primâ facie case of which evidence had been given, could not be rebutted or overset, and, consequently, that the seat was lost.

But the Legislature requires me to go further. Where any charge is made on a petition that any corrupt practices have been committed at an election, the judge has to return, first, whether any corrupt practice has or has not been proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge and consent of any candidate at such election, and the nature of such corrupt practice. Now, upon that there was no evidence whatever produced before me to show that either of the sitting Members in any way had a personal knowledge of, or consented to, the corrupt practices. There was no evidence that could have justified such a finding, and as both the Members have been called to deny that there was such a thing of which there has been no evidence, I need not say that I have great pleasure in certifying that there was no corrupt practice proved to have been committed by, or with the knowledge and consent of, any candidate at such election.

Then the Legislature requires me to go further, and to state the names of all persons, if any, proved at the trial to have been guilty of corrupt practices. Before I state precisely the names of those persons, I shall require to look over my notes, and consider the the evidence which has been given with respect to the cases of those persons. It is likely that with respect to some of those persons I may be inclined to think that no case at all has been made with respect to them; and, with regard to others of them, perhaps, I should rather hesitate and doubt, and say the cases were not proved, rather than that the men were innocent. But there are some with respect to whom I have no doubt at all, and particularly there can be no doubt that, upon the evidence as it stands, Henry Chapman Bussell was shown to have been guilty of bribery.

With respect to the case of the man Palmer, though he received the money, I do not think he can be properly said to have been guilty of bribery, because he never took the money with the intention to influence his vote.

With respect to Captain Crocker, who, by his own confession was guilty of bribery, I must return his name as having been guilty of corrupt practices; but, as he spoke the whole truth, he is entitled to apply for a certificate of indemnity, which will relieve him from all possible penalties. But with respect to Henry Chapman Bussell, who has not come forward and spoken the truth, I must, according to the Act of Parliament now in force, return his name to the House of Commons, in order that it may be laid before the Attorney General to consider whether the evidence is sufficient to support a prosecution. As he has chosen to leave the country, and not to come forward and obtain a certificate, he will be liable to that prosecution; and, I presume, unless he chooses to be an outlaw for life, he will be prosecuted when he does return. I mention all this, because it is very desirable that subordinate agents and others should be aware that, as the law now stands, they do not baffle justice by leaving the country and refusing to come and give their evidence; there will be clearly a case as against him.

As to Andrew Allan, I must look carefully at the evidence, in order to see whether I should report his name as having been proved to have been guilty of corrupt practices.

I think, as at present advised, that I shall report the name of James Hayward, the captain who was at Swansea, who positively swore that he was not bribed. I think, on the evidence, I should come to the conclusion that he was; I believe he was seeking to get paid for his vote; he was chaffering for it, and offering it for sale, and having professed to be going to vote for the Tories, on his way to the poll he spoke to Bussell, and then went and voted on the other side. I will consider the evidence, but at present I am inclined to think that I must return his name as having been bribed, though in doing so, if I do come to that conclusion, I must make the direct assertion that I believe him to be not only guilty of bribery but also guilty of perjury. There are several others with respect to whose cases I must look into the evidence before I say whether I shall report them to have been guilty of corrupt practices.

Now, I come to another very important matter. The third thing which I am called upon to report is, whether corrupt practices have, or whether there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have, extensively prevailed at the election to which the Petition relates. The object of that return is to guide the House of Commons in considering whether or no the place where the election took place is so corrupt that an inquiry should take place with a view to arriving at a conclusion whether the franchise should be continued or not; and, upon that, which is a very important subject of inquiry, we have had sufficient evidence. If there were any ground to think the case had not been complete upon that, I should not have allowed the inquiry to stop now. Upon that I am sorry to say I must come to the conclusion that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed. The evidence has satisfied me of this, that a very considerable proportion of the voters in this borough were, during the day of the election, making inquiries in the phrases which have been used, "Whether anything was going?" "What stuff was going?" and phrases of that sort. The evidence also satisfied me that a considerable number of people, some of whom no doubt would have been made out to be agents of the sitting Members, others of whom probably would not, did repeatedly hold it forth, and the belief got amongst the people, that if anything was going, those who voted first should be paid as well as those who voted later, and received payment. If a single case of such a promise as that, a qualified promise, that if others get bribes you shall get one, proved against an agent of the sitting Member, would vacate the seat as much as if the bribe were actually handed over (which, however, I am not at present considering); treating such promises as corrupt practices, I believe from the evidence there certainly was reason to believe that they did extensively prevail at the last election. We find the consequence, and the result of the prevalence of this belief, in the state of the poll. Somewhere about one o'clock Mr. Westropp and Mr. Gray were in a large majority; the majority for Mr. Westropp being 148, and for Mr. Gray, 129. Immediately after that time bribes were given, which were proved to have been given by Bussell; and no doubt as soon as ever there was any payment at all, it became generally known that "money was going." And then we find, as soon as that became known, very few votes indeed were polled for Mr. Westropp and Mr. Gray. At one o'clock, the highest number of votes on the Conservative side, namely, those recorded for Mr. Westropp, was 607, and at the close of the poll he had no more than 681. From one o'clock, therefore, to the close of the poll, there were only 74 votes polled for Mr. Westropp. On the Liberal side, the highest number of votes recorded at one o'clock (namely, those for Mr. Kinglake), was 465, and at the close of the poll it reached 731; consequently, there were 270 votes polled for Mr. Kinglake between one and four. It is impossible to resist the conclusion I draw, that the previous promises and holding forth that if anything was going all should be treated alike, and the actual bribery, which probably did not extend to a very large sum in gold that was parted with, but actual bribery in making that contingent promise at once absolute and unconditional, resulted in this, that a very considerable number (perhaps not all) of those 260 voters, who polled after one o'clock, were influenced by corrupt reasons.

Taking that view of the matter, the conclusion I come to is, that I must report to the House that, in my opinion, corrupt practices have prevailed, and that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed in the borough at the last election. What the House of Commons may do upon that, it will be for the House to consider.

I need hardly say that in a case like this, where the Petitioners have succeeded, the ordinary rule is that the Petitioners have costs; and as there is no reason to depart from the ordinary rule, of course the Petitioners must have costs.

CHELTENHAM ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Baron Martin, 10 February 1869.

Cheltenham.

Mr. Baron Martin.] THIS is a Petition of Mr. Gardner, which prays that the election of Mr. Samuelson shall be declared void, and that upon three grounds: The first is that he was, by his agents and others on his behalf, guilty of bribery, and that is founded upon the 43rd section of the Act of Parliament, under which I sit, which renders a candidate who is guilty of bribery incapable of sitting in Parliament, and subjects him to very severe disabilities. The second is that he was guilty of treating. There has been no evidence whatever given of any treating at this election by any party; and in passing from that I must say that it is most creditable to the classes of this town who have been lately admitted to be voters, that such a thing did not exist. I have tried two petitions previously to this, and it is scarcely possible to conceive the extent of treating and drinking which took place. Men came up to vote so drunk that they could scarcely speak, and sometimes they did not know the name of the candidate for whom they were about to vote. It was proved that there were upwards of 100 public-houses thrown open, I mean thrown open in the sense that persons who went there got drink free of charge at the discretion of the landlord or landlady, and the only check upon it was that the landlord was desired to give it in reason, and not give it in excess. I must say that it is highly creditable to the lower class of voters of this town that they did not require, during a canvass which continued for nearly six months, to receive beer with respect to their votes.

The next head of objection to Mr. Samuelson's return is that he was guilty of undue influence under the 5th section of this Act, and if I were to declare his election void by reason of this third head of objection I should impose upon him the penalty of being incapable of being returned for this town during the present Parliament. My own impression is that the evidence does not fall within this section, which is directed, like the bribery and treating section, more to unduly influencing a voter or voters; individual voter, or voters, and not to general rioting or violence; that is my impression. And if it were necessary for me to decide the case with reference to this 5th section alone, I would reserve it for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas. But I am clearly of opinion that the violence which has been given in evidence does not come up to that which would be necessary for the purpose of rendering this election void. I intimated so during Monday, and I have continued of the same opinion still; and when I come to call attention to the evidence it will be perfectly clear that the evidence is insufficient for the purpose. There are no individual voter or voters mentioned or alluded to who were prevented from voting. There is not a voter who voted for Mr. Gardner who has been called to prove that the slightest impediment was thrown in the way of his voting. There was no person in this town called to show that any force or violence or restraint was inflicted upon him, or offered to him with regard to his vote. The evidence takes quite a different character, and if it affected this return it seems to me that it would affect it by reason of the common law, which, of itself, renders an election carried by violence or force or intimidation void, because the freedom of election is violated, and persons are prevented from freely exercising their franchise and giving their votes. It seems to me that that the evidence in this case is directed towards that, and does not apply to that which, as it seems to me, the 5th section of this statute is directed.

In the book which I hold in my hand, which is a book of authority, it is very clearly laid down, which common sense indeed would point out, that for the purpose of making violence or intimidation operate to defeat an election, it must be that species of violence and intimidation which would operate upon voters, men of ordinary courage and nerve, such as you ordinarily find men to be; and that the force and violence and intimidation which avoid an election, are those which would induce men of ordinary nerve and courage to abstain from exercising their right. Unless the force or violence or intimidation amounts to that, it is not sufficient to avoid an election. And that is not merely the law as laid down in the book before me, but it is quite conformable with common sense; and it is not because riots and violence, and assaults, and beatings may take place that that is to avoid an election, except it be of such a character as to render those persons who are to exercise the franchise reasonably unable, or reasonably unwilling to exercise their right.

Let us see what is the species of violence which has taken place in this town, and which was sworn to first by William Cookey. Brown I do not think spoke to any actual violence, but it may be that he did. Those are two people who, I should think, are as great ruffians as are to be found in this kingdom. I think Cookey's account of himself was such as would render any person sitting judicially desirous to require confirmation of his evidence, if such could be obtained. No one could expect that any man, whether he was a judge or a jurymen, would believe such a man as that, except his evidence was confirmed where it was capable of confirmation. His account of himself is, that he was a pugilist, and that upon the Friday before the election he was applied to by a man, who was named, to come over here, along with a number of others—eight of them—for the purpose of influencing this election, and that he came; and he speaks, so far as I am aware, of two acts of violence. He states that, upon the Sunday night, he, at the instigation of Mr. Boodle, who was an attorney here, went with two others to a place where a man called Field was. According to his account, Field was represented to be a briber, and he states that he, at the instigation of Boodle, and assisted by two other men, beat this man Field. But this man was no voter at all; he is not called, and we have only the evidence of Cookey as to what happened. It may be that Cookey exaggerated what took place on that occasion, and my own impression is that he did, because I think that if Field had sustained any real injury he would have been called as a witness; we should have seen him, and we should have heard what he had to say for himself. But what had that to do with this election? This man was said to be a detective, who was brought down by Mr. Gardner for the purpose of detecting persons on the other side who were supposed to be guilty of bribing, and the beating of this man had no more to do with the election than the beating of a man in Birmingham, or anywhere else. It was the beating of a detective, who was brought down here for the purpose of this election. It had nothing to do with, and had no bearing whatever upon the election itself. He states that the other violence which he used was, that, having received his directions at the committee-room of Mr. Samuelson, he, upon the day of the election, being desired to go and persuade the Blue voters to vote Yellow, when they would not be persuaded, pushed them and jostled them, and touched them upon their hats with a stick which he had in his hand. That is his account of the violence. With regard to that, I say I do not believe Cookey. I do not believe such a thing occurred. If it did occur, there must have been hundreds of voters who knew it, and who could have proved it. They were voters for Mr. Gardner, and, therefore, would be inclined to come forward and give evidence in his favour. If there was a word of truth in it, there must have been hundreds of persons to come forward to confirm it. But not a single human being is called. There is not a voter of this town called to show that he was influenced in the slightest degree by any violence, or any riot which occurred in it. Although, as I have said, there must be hundreds within half a mile of this place, not an individual is called to prove it, and it is left to depend upon the evidence of a hired gladiator.

But, further than that, there is a direct contradiction of this man's statement, and that is the evidence of the chief constable of this town, for he tells you that the election was an extremely quiet election; that it was quieter than any former one which had taken place since he had been in this town. I do not believe, and I cannot believe, that if this violence had been shown towards those voters as they were going to the poll, Mr. Christian would not have been called upon for the purpose of preventing it. Nothing of the kind occurred. Mr. Christian's attention was not called to any violence of any sort, and upon that part of this case I disbelieve Cookey. I believe his evidence to be false.

With respect to the other man, Brown, his evidence is not very material. However, he stands in the same position as Cookey. But let me here observe that it is impossible that any man can more strongly disapprove than I do of the bringing over of these people from Birmingham. It is not merely a wrong act, but it is the most foolish act a man could possibly commit. It was said by Mr. Chesshyre that it was done in consequence of the other side having resorted to the same system; and I have no doubt that the other side would say that what they did was in consequence of Mr. Chesshyre resorting to it. But no matter who resorted first to it, it was an excessively wrong and improper thing, and if there was evidence in this case that this election was affected by that general violence and force to which I have alluded, the circumstance that hired pugilists were brought from a neighbouring town for the purpose of aiding in the election would be a very strong element indeed in proving that such violence did exist; and I cannot conceive a stronger topic or a stronger element for the consideration of a judge than the circumstance of such vagabonds being brought here. But whilst I say that it is a wrong thing, let me further say that it is the most foolish thing that a man can possibly do. The folly of it is greater than the wickedness. Just look at those ruffians. They come here, and they are paid the sum of 59*l*. This man Cookey says, probably falsely, that Boodle, the person who had hired them from Birmingham, had promised to give him 5*l*. if he would beat Field, and thereupon the day after the election he writes to Boodle to send him the balance of this 5*l*., he having only had 1*l*., as he says. But upon Boodle saying, "No, there was no such thing," he turns round and says, "I will go and betray you to the other side if you do not give me the 4*l*." He goes over to the other side, and, I dare say, tells them a heap of falsehoods to aid to set aside the election of the man by whom he was paid to come here. I trust that if ever an election takes place again in this town, or anywhere else, people will avoid doing such a wrong and such a foolish thing.

I have now stated the evidence with respect to Cookey. There were three other cases of violence. One was with regard to Joseph Reeve. It was at Watkins's house where he says he was struck by a man called Early, and that a young man called Staples was with him. Whether they followed him or pursued him to Watkins's house, I do not know, but it is clear that it was nothing more than beating a man who had given them some offence, and it had nothing to do with the election, and had no effect upon it, and there was not a voter in Cheltenham who was influenced by it.

The next person to whom violence was used was Mr. Packwood. He was an attorney acting for Mr. Gardner; and at about two or three o'clock in the morning he was out. He was going to some voter's house he said, and thereupon a number of men seized and took him to one of the committee-rooms of Mr. Samuelson, where somebody that was there released him, and he went away. As to any influence upon Mr. Packwood, I cannot think that it alarmed Mr. Packwood himself to any extent, but it certainly had no effect upon the election.

George Henderson's was the third case. He was the man that was ill treated at the "Compasses" Inn. He was not a voter, but he was there, and some people came and struck him. There was a fourth man, there was a voter, "Old Harris," who had been in the street surrounded, or in company with some persons who possibly were supporters of Mr. Samuelson, and he says that he took the arm of this man and led him away, when he was joined by a butcher, and that a shout was set up, "They are carrying off Harris." That thereupon a number of men pursued them, got Harris from them and took him away, and one of them struck him a blow upon the hat which injured his head, and caused a lump upon it which he said was as large as an egg.

That is the whole of the evidence of violence that has taken place. It is quite obvious to any person that to set aside an election upon the ground of such violence as this would be ridiculous and absurd. If it was to be so, very few elections would stand. I am clearly of opinion that it is not sufficient for the purpose.

I should only further observe that in the event of it being thought fit to rely upon evidence of this sort for the purpose of affecting an election, I would recommend another paragraph to be put into the Petition, and that the objection to the election should be "general violence being used towards voters." My impression, as I have already said, is, that this violence which has been proved does not come within the 5th section of the Act of Parliament.

The next question is the bribery question, and is the only remaining one. Now, with respect to bribery, the ordinary meaning of bribery is giving money, and I entirely concur with what has fallen from my two brother Judges that bribery with money stands upon a different footing from other matters included in the Act of Parliament, the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, and I am now to decide whether or not there has been any case of bribery proved which affects the election of Mr. Samuelson.

In the first place, I have the evidence of Mr. Samuelson himself, and he swears that he (or his father rather) supplied a certain sum of money, amounting to nearly 2,500*l*., being about the same sum as has been spent on previous elections here,—and he swears that to his knowledge there was no act of bribery, or corrupt practice of any sort or kind; that he gave directions that it should not be so; and he pledges his oath that nothing of the kind was done with his concurrence or with his knowledge, and if it was done at all it was done contrary to his direction. We have had Mr. Chesshyre here, who was the principal agent, his agent indeed with regard to this matter, and Mr. Chesshyre confirms him to the fullest extent; and he swears that he had the control of this money; that he received the cheques, which you have heard of; that before the election he received 1,200*l*., and afterwards 500*l*. more. And he also swears that he had determined that no corrupt practice should take place; that he gave directions to that effect to every one, and that he had carried them out.

This is the evidence of those two gentlemen; and from the cross-examination of Mr. Huddleston, so far as Mr. Samuelson was concerned, there was no attempt made to show that it was not an honest statement, and that it was his sincere desire that this election should be conducted honestly and purely. Nor did I understand that he cast any imputation upon the veracity of Mr. Chesshyre. I know nothing of Mr. Chesshyre. I never heard his name to my knowledge until the commencement of this trial on Monday last. But, as far as I could understand the cross-examination of Mr. Huddleston, he cast no imputation upon the honesty and integrity of Mr. Chesshyre, but treated him as a witness of truth. I have, therefore, the principal manager of the election, and I have the candidate himself, who swear that neither directly nor indirectly did they countenance any species of corrupt practice; that, on the contrary, they gave directions in every way to avoid it; and that they did, to the utmost of their power, prevent it. I need scarcely say that it would be a very unfortunate thing if Mr. Samuelson should be deprived of his seat by reason of the acts of any of those persons whose names have been mentioned; but no doubt, if it be proved that any act has been done which the Act of Parliament declares shall deprive him of his seat, that effect must be given to it. But it would be an unfortunate thing, as I have said, if a man who meant to behave honestly, and to conduct the election purely, lost his seat by reason of the conduct of some person with whom he was not immediately or directly connected.

But I believe that the evidence establishes that there was no bribery, certainly not to any extent. It is stated, in a judgment of my brother Blackburn's, that the giving of money is a thing which can be proved, and if money is proved to be given, you must search it out: but he states that where the evidence as to bribery consists merely of offers or of proposals to bribe, the evidence required should be stronger than that with respect to bribery itself. Now, in the whole of the evidence on behalf of the Petitioner, it is only proved that money to the extent of 2*s.* 6*d.* was actually given to any person. This was to the man Cox, and the money was 1*s.* before the election, 6*d.* upon the night of the polling, and 1*s.* the morning afterwards.

The only evidence adduced of actual payment is of that 2*s.* 6*d.*, for all the others were merely offers. There were only three cases with regard to money. There was the 5*l.* note to Gardiner; there was this 2*s.* 6*d.* to Cox, and there was the offer of 10*l.* which was said to have been made by Mr. Smith to Belcher, which Mr. Huddleston abandoned. Indeed, he could not have done otherwise, for it is perfectly idle to suppose that Mr. Smith, an attorney, who knows perfectly well that his giving a bribe would utterly defeat his purpose, should have committed such an indiscreet thing as to make a real offer to Belcher to give him 10*l.* for his vote. Mr. Smith has sworn most positively that he did not, and I believe him, and I do not believe that any such act took place as that which was sworn to by Belcher or his wife.

I am satisfied that very little bribery, if any, took place in this town. People who accept bribes are like those prize-fighters; they take the money, and many of them think, too many I am afraid, that it is no great crime; and I believe they do not very frequently conceal it among their acquaintances, and persons with whom they live and associate. But I have it proved here that 50*l.* was offered by Mr. Price to the man Jenkyns, with respect to his evidence. Mr. Price is the foreman or manager of Mr. Gardner's brewery. I have it proved that Price had engaged to pay Jenkyns 50*l.* if he gave evidence the effect of which would unseat Mr. Samuelson. The man was called, and I suspect that he is a man of bad character, and somewhat the same description of person in Cheltenham as the witnesses, Cookey and Brown, are at Birmingham; for Mr. Chesshyre stated yesterday that he came to him last Saturday, and that, knowing who the man was, and what he was, he would have no communication with him, except in the presence of a third person. So that it seems to me that Jenkyns is a man who has not a very good reputation; and, therefore, if the matter rested upon the evidence of Jenkyns alone, I should not form a conclusion hostile to any man upon it. But the evidence does not rest upon his testimony; it rests upon a written document signed by Price. He produced, yesterday, this document:—"Thomas Jenkyns has deposited with me an agreement, dated the 4th December 1868, as security for 5*l.*—J. Price." There is a document, signed by Price, which states that there was deposited with him an agreement bearing date the 4th of December 1868, and that 5*l.* was then paid to this man. That agreement was called for, and I have no doubt that it is as much under the control of Mr. Gardner, or his attorney, as any document that they have in their pocket; but it is not produced, and Price is not called. The witness, Jenkyns, swears that what was contained in that document he could not read; but what he believes was contained in it, and what was told him by word of mouth, was, that he would be paid 50*l.* if he gave evidence and Mr. Samuelson was unseated. Therefore it is plain and clear that every exertion that could be made, with a view of obtaining a witness for the purpose of proving bribery, has been adopted by Mr. Price.

But the matter does not rest here, for you have the evidence of Cosnett. Cosnett was a man who had been a clerk employed at this election; and he states that he met a Mr. Stroud and a Mr. Garrison at his sister's; that Mr. Garrison or Mr. Stroud there showed him money to the amount of 100*l.*; that he put 10*l.* into the sister's hands, to hold, and that he told him that that should belong to him if he would get up evidence for this Petition; that for this money he was wanted to find out who paid the travelling expenses of three men from Swansea; and that the 10*l.* was placed in his sister's hands, of which afterwards 9*l.* was returned, and 1*l.* given to her for the trouble she had had. I will not say positively, but my impression is, that one of those gentlemen was an attorney; but neither he nor Mr. Garrison is called to contradict the circumstance; and if it really happened, there was an offer of 100*l.* made to Cosnett, with the view of his obtaining evidence in support of this Petition. What is the inference that I draw? I have said already that persons who are bribed are generally persons of an inferior class of life, and that they are like those prizefighters from Birmingham, very easily to be bought again. If they are bought to vote, they are doing what any person in any respectable line of life knows to be a bad and dishonourable thing; but buying, for the purpose of giving evidence, buying for the purpose of coming and telling the truth if they have been bribed, is a very different thing. And when I find money to the extent of 50*l.* and 100*l.* being offered to two persons, with regard to evidence on this Petition, I cannot but believe that if there had been people bribed to any considerable extent with money, they would have been found ready to come forward and accept sums far less than 50*l.* or 100*l.* for giving their evidence. And as there is not a single person called for that purpose, the inference I draw is that bribery, if it existed at all, existed to a very small extent indeed. That is the reason why I am satisfied that money to a very trifling extent, if any, was paid in bribing at this election. As I have said, the only money attempted to be proved to be given, was the 1*s.*, and the 1*s.* and the 6*d.* given to Cox.

As I am upon that subject, I should now say that being satisfied that this was meant to be a really honest and pure election, before I unseated Mr. Samuelson I should require to be satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt, that the Act of Parliament was contravened. I will take Cox first, because I have been alluding to him. His story is, that he got 1*s.* from Baughan upon one day, and 1*s.* upon another, and 6*d.* upon a third. But, in the first place, Baughan is no agent at all, and no one pretended that he was; and to say that Mr. Samuelson's election should be put in jeopardy by reason of the act of a man with regard to whom there was no privity proved, either with himself or with Mr. Chesshyre, his agent, would be absurd. But I do not believe Cox; I did not believe him when he was giving his evidence. I thought he was telling an untruth at the time. Baughan explains the matter. It was no more given him as a bribe than a penny given to a beggar in the street would be a bribe. Dix is called, who seems to be an exceedingly respectable man; and Baughan tells you, and Dix also, that Baughan having been challenged with bribing Cox, he, in the presence of Dix, challenged him with it, and he said that there was nothing of the sort. I believe that the evidence of that man was given here with the knowledge that he had said that it was no bribe, and that he went into that witness box to swear what he knew to be false. It was his consciousness that he had conducted himself in the way that he had to Baughan and Dix, which caused him to give his evidence in the manner in which he did. At the time I was satisfied, from his demeanour, that he was not telling the truth, but Baughan and Dix's evidence puts it beyond all doubt, that the money was given to him, not with regard to his vote, that it had nothing whatever to do with it.

The next case is with regard to Humphreys. That is a case of employment to influence a vote, and I am of opinion, that when the alleged bribing is an offer of employment, which is within the second head of the 2nd section of this Act of Parliament, it ought to be made out beyond all doubt, because when two people are talking of a thing which is not carried out, it may be that they honestly give their evidence, but that one person understands what is said by another differently from what he intends it; and there is no evidence which is more unsatisfactory than when two persons come to state what occurred in a conversation which was never carried out to anything. Mr. Lenthall stated what is very reasonable. He says, "Humphreys I knew; he was a man who, according to his own account, had been out of work from June; he had a wife and several children; all he got to support him was some occasional work, and he was in very great distress; and his rent was behind to a man called Wilks." But with regard to employment, he swears most positively that he never agreed to get him employment. What he did say with respect to employment, that he did not with regard to the man's vote, but out of pity for the unfortunate position in which he and his family were. And when a man goes to a house where he finds great distress, where he finds a man, with a wife and children, who has been out of work for four or five months, and when he knows the landlord, who is pressing for the rent, he might say, without anything wrong in the motive, that he would try to get that man some employment? I should say that it would be a conclusion, beyond all reason, if I were to hold that Mr. Samuelson's election is to be jeopardised by what took place between Mr. Lenthall and Humphreys. I say it would be a most harsh conclusion for any one to draw; I do not believe that any jury in the kingdom would find that there was an offer of employment within the meaning of this Act of Parliament.

The next case that I will take, and, indeed, I have mentioned it already, is that of Belcher. That was the case where Mr. Smith is supposed to have made an offer of 10*l.* It is contrary to all probability that an attorney would do a thing which he knew would defeat the position of the gentleman on whose behalf he was acting; and he most positively swears that he did nothing of the kind; and I believe him.

The next case is Portlock's case: that again is a case of employment; and there again Mr. Jessop, the attorney, was concerned, and he tells you what occurred. The two give an account of it. Portlock says, and his wife says, that the mention of two or three sovereigns came from Mr. Jessop. Mr. Jessop swears that it did not; that the sovereigns were mentioned by them. Portlock said, in his evidence on Monday, that he did say something something about his not being able to vote if he got employment; and Mr. Jessop swore that what he said was, that if he got the employment which was spoken of he could not vote; and that, so far from getting him to vote for Mr. Samuelson, it was upon the distinct statement to him that if he accepted this employment he could not vote at all. That, again, is a case of promised employment, which, as I have already said, I think ought to be proved beyond all reasonable doubt, in order to set aside the election.

With respect to Clevely, I do not exactly understand how that case is put. There is no doubt that fictitious employment, with the view of paying money, would operate as bribery; and I suppose that it is put as if the colourable employment of the little boy who was called yesterday, and the paying of 11s. to him, was a corruption, I suppose, of Clevely. I do not know how otherwise it could be put; but, if so, I think there was nothing of the kind. It would be the most forced construction, even supposing Halliwell had any authority to do it, or that Austin had any authority to do it, of which he had none, to hold that the election would be affected by reason of what happened with respect to this man. There is no reason to suppose that any persons who were responsible for this election, that is to say, Mr. Samuelson and Mr. Chesshyre, had anything at all to do with this. Indeed, it is not pretended that Mr. Samuelson had, and Mr. Chesshyre, in the most distinct possible manner, declared that he knew nothing of it, and heard nothing of it, and authorised nothing of it. And I think it is plain (indeed, there is no evidence to the contrary) that Austin had not any authority to do it.

With regard to Clark, the fly driver, I do not see what that case is at all. I do not understand it. He was a fly driver; I suppose that flys must be employed during an election, and I dare say that sometimes more is paid than ordinary during that time. But it is not proved, from anything that fell from Mr. Chesshyre, that he was aware that more was charged, or that more was paid, than was usual. Indeed, it appears rather the contrary, because he recollected that 1*l.* was charged when the fly was not wanted the entire day, and he struck off 10*s.* With regard to Clark, the fly driver, I see nothing to bring his case within the Act of Parliament at all.

That disposes of all the cases except Gardiner's; and with respect to Gardiner's case, my own impression is that Ryder was not admitted by my brother Sargood to be an agent. But I will take it that he was. With regard to that transaction, supposing him to be an agent, I do not think, although it was a foolish act taking out and exhibiting that 5*l.* note, that I ought to set aside Mr. Samuelson's election because of it. It was at the most an offer to bribe. I do not suppose that Gardiner meant to tell any untruth with regard to this matter, but, if I believe the evidence of Ryder, and Smith, and Phipps, Ryder went in knowing that Gardiner was going to vote for Mr. Gardner, and they went in, as two of them expressed, "for a chaff"; and if that be true, and if Ryder knew that he was going to vote for Mr. Gardner, and believed it, I think that the true solution of it is that there was not a real intention to bribe, but that it was exhibiting the 5*l.* note "by way of a chaff," whilst there was no real intention in the mind of Ryder to bribe. That I believe is a reasonable and fair inference to be drawn from what took place. It was a transaction which is very much to be regretted; it was a transaction which has had the effect, I will not say of putting Mr. Samuelson's seat in jeopardy, but it was a thing which people ought to avoid. But I have to deal with the transaction itself, and looking at the whole of it, and especially looking at what afterwards took place with the two women, my belief is that that was the true character of the transaction, and that there was no real intention of an offer in order to induce Gardiner to vote for Mr. Samuelson. This took place about nine o'clock in the morning, and I understood yesterday, but I have no doubt wrongly, that the women had been seen immediately afterwards, and that Ryder and the others had gone from Gardiner's house to the women; but that turns out not to be correct, and that the interview with the women took place between 12 and one o'clock in the day. I am satisfied that all those three people, Ryder, Smith and Phipps, knew that Gardiner had then voted, for he was putting on his coat to vote when they called; and, according to the evidence of the two women, he went in Mr. Marshall's carriage to vote about the time they said. And, assuming that the note was taken out and exhibited to them, what possible object could Ryder have had in exhibiting the 5*l.* note, or in showing it to the women, for the purpose of bribing when he knew at the time that Gardiner, their father, had voted? I should be sorry to impute to those women that they purposely told a false tale, or that Gardiner did either, but the circumstance which has been proved of the 5*l.* note being taken out of Ryder's pocket before the women, confirms me that it was not a real intention and object to bribe by Ryder. And I cannot believe, and do not believe, that if Ryder or any other man had intentionally desired to bribe Gardiner, he would have gone in company with two other people for the purpose of doing it. That is not the way in which bribery is committed. When bribery is effected it is done by one person, and quietly, in private. It would be, in my judgment, a preposterous conclusion to arrive at that Ryder meant to bribe Gardiner, taking Smith and Phipps with him to witness what was done. If he had really an intention to bribe, he would have gone alone. I am not at all insensible to the discrepancy between Ryder's and Smith's evidence; that Ryder spoke of taking out a 5*l.* note accidentally with another paper containing other things. According to Smith's account he held it up in his hand; according to Gardiner's account he held it out open to him. I do not believe that any of those people meant to commit perjury in the matter, but nevertheless it is a transaction that ought not to be repeated, for if established it would have affected the seat of Mr. Samuelson, assuming Ryder to be his agent. It is the true construction of this Act of Parliament, that if an act be done by an agent, that is, an agent for whom he is responsible, it will affect the seat of the candidate, although he himself may be entirely innocent of it.

I have gone through those cases of bribery, and I have only to call attention to what has been relied upon as to cases coming within the 49th section of the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, and that is with respect to the payment of rates. It has been proved that some person or persons did pay the rates of a number of voters. Five or six were called who proved that those rates were paid for them, and if it had been proved that Mr. Samuelson, or any person for whom he was responsible, had paid those rates, he would then have been guilty of bribery within the meaning of this 49th section. But, as I stated yesterday, there is not a particle of evidence that this payment of rates was done by Mr. Samuelson, and had the case rested upon that, and had there been no other evidence in the cause, I should have stopped my brother Sargood, upon the ground that there is no evidence that the person who paid those rates was Mr. Samuelson, or any person for whom he is responsible. The only evidence relied upon is, that in an envelope, which enclosed a receipt for Cooper's rates, there was enclosed a green card. Here is the envelope before me, and there is upon it the post-mark of the 23rd of September. That card has been very clearly traced. It seems that persons inimical to Mr. Samuelson got into the rooms where meetings were held, and it was desired to exclude them; and upon the 16th of September there was an order given to a gentleman who was called, a stationer in the town, to have cards prepared for the purpose of being given to persons to obtain admission to those rooms. His statement is that the order was received upon the 16th of September, and that for some days it was overlooked; and he is satisfied that the cards themselves were not delivered until a week or rather more than a week after the order was given. The order is contained in his book on the 16th of September, and a week from that would be the 23rd. The card is produced; it contains the name of the voter, John Baughan, upon it, with "T. R.," Ryder's initials, upon the back of it. Baughan certainly could not have received this before it issued from the stationer, and he tells you that he received it, and put it into his pocket, but what became of it he does not know; that he had no occasion to use it, because he was well known; that he was known to be an active supporter of Mr. Samuelson, and that he was admitted to the rooms where those meetings were held without the production of a ticket at all; but that he did get it, and according to the evidence he would get it about the 22nd or 23rd of September, and he cannot tell you what became of it. It would be an odd thing that, within a week after the order was given, there should be enclosed to this man, for no reason that I know, this green card, that was issued for a certain purpose. But I will give no opinion upon it, because I desire, as far as I can, to avoid casting suspicion upon the evidence of anybody. I think it is an extraordinary thing, but to say that this card is evidence that those rates were paid by Mr. Samuelson is quite ridiculous, and there is no foundation for it. And without entering into what is the meaning of the Act of Parliament, I am clearly of opinion that there is no evidence whatever to show that Mr. Samuelson had anything to do with the payment of those rates. And I may further say, that if there had been evidence of who paid the rates, or by whom they were paid, I should expect that further evidence would be necessary for the purpose of bringing it within this section. The money was paid obviously for the purpose of enabling the voters to be registered; it was sent to them for that purpose. But, in order to make the payment of a rate for the purpose of enabling voters to be registered affect the election, you must prove that it was done corruptly; that it was done thereby to influence their votes, which in my judgment means to induce them to vote for the person on whose behalf the payment was made. That is my idea of the true meaning of this Act of Parliament, and as I am of opinion that there is no evidence that Mr. Samuelson was the person paying those rates, that part of the case entirely fails.

I am, therefore, of opinion that Mr. Samuelson was duly elected and returned; that he was not guilty of bribery or treating, or any undue influence in respect of those matters that are alleged. I believe that on the part of Mr. Samuelson this was an honest and pure election. I have not the slightest reason to believe that bribery was practised by him at all in regard to it. I shall make such a certificate to the Speaker, and add that which the statute requires me to add, that neither of the candidates have been guilty of bribery, and that there is no reason to suppose from any evidence adduced before me that bribery or corrupt practices existed in this town; and I should be sorry if any act had been done by an indiscreet agent which would have had the effect of depriving Mr. Samuelson of what I conceive to be a seat fairly and honestly won. The costs will follow the event.

COVENTRY ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Willes, 20 February 1869.

Coventry.

Mr. Justice Willes.] THIS is a Petition presented by several gentlemen who were voters at the last election for this city, praying that the return of Henry William Eaton and Alexander Staveley Hill, as Members to serve in Parliament for the city, should be declared to be null and void, and the various grounds are stated in the Petition, and amongst others one is stated specially, in the 4th clause of the Petition, in the following terms:—"An alleged corrupt payment by Mr. Hill to procure his election and return to Parliament, and the same by Mr. Eaton to procure Mr. Hill's return." It is stated that "Mr. Hill did corruptly pay certain sums of money for and on account of procuring his election and return to Parliament." That statement is the first of the two in the 4th clause, which then proceeds to say that the said Henry William Eaton did corruptly pay certain sums of money for and on account of procuring the election and return, not of himself, but of the said Alexander Staveley Hill to Parliament. The Petition besides alleges various acts of bribery, and it alleges corrupt treating by the Members.

I think the corrupt treating must be considered out of the question—not because the charge is not a serious one; not because if it be made out that there was an appeal to people's appetites to procure the election of the Members from their love of eating and drinking, instead of from their free-will in the exercise of a choice of Members to represent them in Parliament, the election ought not to be void; and not because it is not a just and wise and a reasonable and beneficial law, in order to secure purity of election, that the candidates should be responsible for the acts of their agents, whom they have put in their place, as well as for their own acts, but because the treating which has been proved has been treating of a sort quite consistent with a total absence of corrupt or unfair design on the part, either of the Members, or of any person who represented them. As an instance may be taken that supper, at which I should conclude that the meat was supplied by Mr. Kilbey, and that the drink was paid for by contributions amongst those who were present, some giving more and some less, each, probably, according to his capacity, and which turned out to be a supper some time before the election, having reference to it, no doubt, but only because it was a supper held in celebration of the efforts of the Tory party at the registration; it was a supper at which Tories supped, and it was a supper at which Tories paid. It was a banquet, or entertainment, in pursuance of the old habit of the race from the earliest times of which we have any account, to meet and feast over any occasion upon which a labour in which they have been engaged, has been brought to what they consider a successful end. Eating and drinking are to go on, notwithstanding an election coming, in the ordinary and usual course. When that eating and drinking takes the form of enticing people for the purpose of inducing them to change their minds, and to vote for the party to which they do not belong, then it becomes corrupt, and is forbidden by the statute. Until that arrives, the mere fact of eating and drinking, even with the connection which this supper had with politics, is not sufficient to make out treating. Indeed, it was quite right of Mr. Leigh, when he found the sort of evidence that was being given, and that it was quite consistent with no wrong motives on the part of those men, whoever they were, who paid for the eating and drinking to which his evidence pointed, to say, as he did at last, that he could not make out a case of criminal treating within the statute. No such case has been made out.

Then the Petition also alleges, as I have stated, bribery; and with respect to bribery, as well as with respect to treating, I shall ever hold it to be a wise and beneficial rule, I may say, certainly in my view, quite apart from "The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act of 1854," a wise and beneficial rule of constitutional law, that, for the purpose of securing purity and freedom of election, candidates shall be answerable for the acts of their agents, as well as for their own acts, and that a person can no more claim to be a Member of Parliament for a place as the result of an election, in which his agent has been guilty of bribery, than a person can fairly claim a prize if the person whom he employs to ride his horse, or to steer his vessel, has been guilty of foul play in the course of his employment.

The questions, therefore, with which it is necessary to deal are, first of all, whether, in point of law, the treaty, as it has been called, entered into between Mr. Eaton and Mr. Hill, by the letters of the 14th and 15th of October of last year, was a treaty which proves the 4th allegation in the Petition, and which does of itself amount to that special sort of bribery which is provided for by the 3rd clause of the 2nd section of "The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act of 1854," in the first place; and next, whether the Petitioners have succeeded in establishing any of the cases, either of actual completed bribery, by the giving of money or goods, in order to corrupt the minds of voters, or by promising benefits to such voters, with a view to induce them to vote for Mr. Eaton and Mr. Hill, or to abstain from voting against them.

The first question is one, undoubtedly, of much novelty. It is one which has been present to my mind now for some considerable time; ever since the letters were put in. It may be, and I cannot conceal from my mind that it is, one of difficulty, the decision of which imposes upon the judge who sits here, and who is bound to decide it, as it appears to me, upon the spur of the occasion, it being one involving a question of fact, as well as a question of law, of very great responsibility, and I need not say very great anxiety. But in this, as in so many points which arise, both novel and difficult, in these inquiries, it has pleased the Legislature to say, after mature inquiry, and I have no doubt with greater wisdom than that of those who desired that the House of Commons should retain its ancient jurisdiction, that the matters, however important they may be, arising here shall be entrusted to the decision of a single judge, and although there is a power by which the judge may abstain from pronouncing an immediate decision, under the 11th section of "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868," by reserving a question for the Court of Common Pleas, I feel the greatest difficulty as to the form in which a question of this kind can be reserved, and I entertain so strong a distrust of the working of the section enabling me to reserve points for the opinion of that court, when they involve, as it appears to me this question does involve, a question of fact as well as a question of law, that I believe it is better I should assume the responsibility of at once stating what my own opinion is upon it, than to reserve it at the risk, which I feel is a serious one, of its turning out in the end that the court decline to pronounce an opinion upon the question, not being one of pure law, whereby the parties may be again immersed in expensive litigation, and an inquiry may have to be renewed here—renewed because I had abstained from pronouncing an opinion at the time at which alone, if I do pronounce one, I am to pronounce it, namely, "at the conclusion of the trial," which time has arrived.

On this question, therefore, it is necessary first to decide, and in order to decide it, I must shortly refer to the facts by which it is introduced to notice. It appears that Mr. Hill had been defeated in a contest with Mr. Carter, in, I think, March in last year. Mr. Carter and Mr. Eaton, or to put them in the proper order (I mean the proper order of seniority as they then stood), Mr. Eaton and Mr. Carter, were the Members for the city. Mr. Hill, having paid the expenses of his contest, was called upon after a certain period had gone by to pay the further sum of 800*l.* in respect of expenses which to my mind present all the appearance of having been expenses illegitimately incurred in the contest of March 1868. They were expenses which Mr. Hill considered himself bound in honour to pay, and I sit here as a judge of law, and not of honour; and I therefore make no remark on that statement, I simply pass it over by saying that that was Mr. Hill's reason, and I fully believe him when he gave that reason, for paying the expenses; whether I may agree with him or not in thinking that it was incumbent upon him in point of honour to pay expenses which, if his view of them is correct, were improperly incurred by people who indulged in extravagance at his expense, in the sense that they hoped that when the election was over he would repay them what they never ought to have expended, upon the supposed principle of honour upon which in July 1868 he did pay those expenses. Therefore, certainly the consideration of this part of the case leads to the conclusion that the contest in March 1868 was accompanied by that which has endangered the return of Members elsewhere, and which no doubt would have endangered, if it had not defeated, Mr. Hill's return, supposing he had been returned at the election in the spring of 1868, because the expenditure of such a sum as that in an illegitimate way of course requires strict explanation; it requires explanation at the hands, not only of Mr. Hill, who, I have no doubt, could have completely explained his part of the transaction, but of every agent concerned in that election. I mention this circumstance, not irrelevantly, because it has had considerable effect on my mind in two points of view; but at present I am only dealing with it in reference to the allegation in the 4th clause of the Petition; I have no doubt that when this Petition was filed, the view of the Petitioners was that which has been pointed out by the counsel for the Respondents. I have no doubt that the intention of that 4th clause was to assail the return of Messrs. Eaton and Hill upon the ground that there had been the payment of 800*l.* for expenses illegitimately incurred in respect of the election of March 1868, for the purpose of stopping the mouths of those who claimed to have the 800*l.* due to them, and of influencing the election of November by so stopping their mouths; and I have equally little doubt that if that had been proved (speaking of course with all the reserve with which one ought to speak in expressing an opinion on a point of law, which, though called for, is given as a passing comment without hearing argument), the payment of such a sum as that by way of illegitimate expenses to people who no doubt were voters of the borough, and had the means of influencing voters of the borough, with a view to stop their mouths, and to induce them either to assist Mr. Eaton and Mr. Hill at the election of November 1868, or to induce them not to oppose because of their unlawful claims having been satisfied, would have made the election of Messrs. Eaton and Hill void. Upon that question I do not entertain a doubt, and

I should

I should feel bound to express my opinion even if I did entertain a doubt, because it is relevant to the subject; I think that was the view that was intended to be taken by the Petitioners. In that point of view the Petition has failed, because it turns out that in fact the payment into the Coventry Union Bank, at which the account was opened for the election expenses of November, was not a payment, either by Mr. Hill or by Mr. Eaton, for the purpose of satisfying the claim of 800*l.* directly to the publicans, or whoever they were who had run up the bills, nor for the purpose, as suggested, of repaying some person who for Mr. Hill's credit had himself paid, or had raised the sum at the bank in respect to which he had become security. It is quite clear to my mind now that that was not so. There was an account open at the bank; there was a sum of 1,100*l.* paid in, 500*l.* in the first instance by Mr. Eaton, and 600*l.* afterwards by, I say shortly Mr. Hill, through his friend Mr. Gray, which 600*l.* was immediately repaid to Mr. Gray by Mr. Eaton, making, in fact, the payment of 1,100*l.* into the bank, which I think took place on or about the 27th of October, a payment in substance made by Mr. Eaton alone, the payment of 600*l.* by Mr. Gray, as representing Mr. Hill, being a payment only made to give the appearance that Mr. Hill was bearing his share of the expenses of the contest which was then going on with reference to the election of November, and that to prevent observations that might have been made if the 1,100*l.* had all been paid in by Mr. Eaton; I think that is the true construction of the evidence as to the payment into the bank. Of course that looked strange, coupled with the fact, without the date, of the 800*l.* having been paid. When, however, Mr. Hill was called he gave an explanation, the truth of which has not been disputed, and cannot for a moment be questioned, and which shows that the manipulation of the 1,100*l.* had no connection with the payment of the 800*l.*, because it appears that Mr. Hill, though he did not pay the 800*l.* at first, did not do so because of a reason which prevented him from attending to business, which appears to have been quite satisfactory to the learned counsel on both sides, and I have no doubt was a reason which ought to have been entirely satisfactory to them. He appears to have intended from the beginning to pay that 800*l.*, and he did pay it in July 1868. At that time he had no intention of standing for the city again. He does not appear to have had any intention of entering into Parliament at a future period, either for this city or for any other place, certainly not for this city; and looking at the correspondence in the month of October following, taking that in connection with the evidence of Messrs. Eaton and Hill, the just result to arrive at as to the period at which Mr. Hill changed his mind as to not standing again, and made up his mind to come forward as he ultimately did at the election in November, at which he was returned, is, that it was some time in the month of October, some three months therefore after he had paid the sum of 800*l.* Putting those facts together, the result is obvious, I need not say, I think, because the result is obvious to anybody who examines the facts, that the payment of 800*l.* in July 1868 was made by Mr. Hill himself out of his own pocket, without any communication with Mr. Eaton, and without any intention upon his part of again standing for the city, and that what took place between Mr. Eaton and Mr. Hill, expressed by the letters of the 14th and 15th of October, to which I must next refer, had nothing to do with the payment of the 800*l.*

For these reasons, as I have said, that which I have no doubt was in the mind of the Petitioners, when the 4th clause was inserted in the Petition, does seem to have entirely failed of proof, and to have been negatived.

It has, however, been argued by the learned counsel for the Petitioners (who has conducted this case with an ability and with a spirit worthy of the best days of advocacy), and he was entitled to do so, that notwithstanding the intention, so to speak, of the 4th clause of the Petition has been frustrated, yet that evidence has come out in the course of the case of the Respondents themselves which sustains the averment in another and a different sense, and that argument he founds upon what has been called the treaty, which I must next consider. That treaty in sum and substance is, that Mr. Eaton endeavoured to induce Mr. Hill to come forward; he was anxious that he should stand with him. Mr. Hill did not wish to come forward, and he appears not to have consented to come forward until Mr. Eaton consented to bear the expenses of the approaching contest, both his own and Mr. Hill's, and in the letter which constituted that agreement there was inserted a clause which is nothing more than would have been implied, from the fact of those gentlemen joining forces, and agreeing to contest the city in the same interest,—that they should be faithful to one another. It was not a case in which they were to stand independent of one another; it was a case in which each made the other his agent, and the agents of the other his agents, and in which they agreed to stand by one another; an agreement which they carried into effect by stating, as they did on their canvass, that they respectively did not wish for a vote for one which was not given to the other. Very few votes appear to have been given for one which were not given for the other. The numbers ran 3,781 for Mr. Eaton, and 3,761 (a difference of only 20) for Mr. Hill. No such agreement, in so far as the pecuniary part of the transaction is concerned, existed between the opposing candidates, and their numbers appear to have run 3,594 and 3,576 respectively—a difference of only 18.

Now, is that agreement in itself illegal, as a matter of law? It is insisted that it is in itself illegal, under the terms of the 3rd clause of the 2nd section of the 17 & 18 Vict., c. 102, "The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854," by which it is enacted that "every person who shall directly or indirectly, by himself, or by any other person on his behalf, make any gift, loan, offer, promise, procurement, or agreement as aforesaid, to or for any person, in order to induce such person to procure, or endeavour to procure, the return of any person to serve in Parliament," shall be guilty of bribery. Therefore anything, great or small, which is given to procure a vote, would be a bribe, and if given to another to purchase his influence at the election, it unquestionably also would be a bribe, and would avoid the election. It would be bribery in the case of the person who gave, and in the case of the person who received, the benefit; and if Mr. Eaton had agreed to give Mr. Hill 5*l.*, I might say a farthing in point of law, if he agreed to give him anything, if only a peppercorn, for the purpose of purchasing any influence which Mr. Hill had with the electors of Coventry, and of advancing Mr. Eaton's interest as a candidate at the election, it would have been bribery, and it would have avoided the election. The question is, whether an agreement by one candidate to pay the expenses of another, is or not a bribe.

Before referring to the facts, I must conclude the statement of the law, because at the conclusion of the 2nd section, there is this proviso, which it appears to me has a distinct bearing upon the question:—"Provided always that the aforesaid enactment shall not extend, or be construed to extend, to any money paid or agreed to be paid, for or on account of any legal expenses, bonâ fide incurred at or concerning any election." I am quite sure, and it ought to be thoroughly understood, that that relates to the expenses of the candidate; that it does not relate to the expense of any other person, and (as I shall have occasion to observe by-and-by) it does not relate to the expenses of voters. To pay the expenses of voters, on condition of their voting or abstaining from voting, is unquestionably bribery. But the candidate may pay his own expenses, and the candidate may, paying his own expenses, employ voters, and although, since "The Representation of the People Act, 1867," section 11, which forbids voters who are employed for money to vote at an election (and which was no doubt intended, though unfortunately it has not prevailed, to prevent the arising of questions which were so often agitated, and continue to be agitated, as to the colourable employment of voters, giving them work, and making payments to them exceeding the value of the work, or pretending to employ them to do work, and then giving them money for not having done it)—although since that section voters who have received employment cannot lawfully vote, it must not be supposed that I entertain a doubt, that under the 38th section of "The Corrupt Practices Act, 1854," the voter would still be a person who claims to have a vote, though it would be a misdemeanor to give it, and though it would be liable to be struck off on a scrutiny. To avoid mistake as to what I am about to say as to the effect of that proviso at the end of the 2nd section, I may say that the effect of that proviso has been very much considered in those cases where that course has been pursued, which appears to have been adopted in this city; that is to say, the city or borough is divided into districts, and committees are formed amongst the voters themselves of selected persons, to go about and traverse their portions of the district, and in some of those cases, as I believe was the case here, though the matter was not gone into, I presume it was the case here, because no opposing case has been brought to my notice, in some of the cases where the system has been resorted to, the committee and canvassers have not been paid for their services; in others, the canvassers have been paid for their services. And unquestionably, if the 3rd clause of the 2nd section, to which I have referred, was to be taken in its literal terms, the payment to canvassers under such circumstances, being a payment in order to induce them to procure votes by means of their canvass, would fall within the terms "in order to induce such person to procure," "or endeavour to procure," (which would be still more applicable to the employment of canvassers,) "the return of any person to serve in Parliament, or" the clause goes on, "the vote of any voter at any election."

Now, here is a test supplied of the meaning of the 3rd clause. Was it intended to do away with every payment made by a candidate in the course of his election, to a person who might happen to be a voter, for his work, in the way of taking round advertising boards, of acting as a messenger with the state of the poll, or of keeping the poll booths clear, so as to enable voters to get up to the poll, or such like practices which have been resorted to without objection, where the employment of the voters in those various services was not colourable, and that even before "The Representation of the People Act, 1867," section 11, to which I have already referred. But to come more nearly to this case; it affords a test of whether the 3rd clause was intended to prevent every payment to a person who was to assist the Member in obtaining the election, and in procuring votes at the election. I shall not refer to any of the cases in which the first question has come before Election Committees; they are quite familiar to those who have paid any attention to the subject; and inasmuch as I have had occasion to cite them elsewhere, in judgments which are before the House of Commons, I do not think it necessary to refer to them again. But with respect to the latter class of cases, that of canvassers employed to procure the votes of voters within the literal terms of the 3rd clause of the 2nd section, I must take leave to refer to the Lambeth case, which is reported in "Woolferstan and Dew's Reports," and is a case to which I attach considerable importance, because the matter was there very much considered, and it was considered under the chairmanship of Mr. Ingham, the Member for South Shields, a gentleman of known good sense, and of much legal experience; and it was held, that the system (which was adopted in this city) of dividing the borough into wards, and forming committees among the voters, and employing them to send out canvassers was not objectionable, notwithstanding that there was a payment made to the canvassers for their services in canvassing. It is hardly necessary to point out how exceedingly dangerous the adoption of that system is, both in respect of the payment of canvassers, and also in respect of that which has been held lawful, namely, the supply of fair refreshment to canvassers who have not been paid whilst engaged actually and not colourably, upon work, and, in like manner, refreshments provided to committee-men. It is proper, whenever this system is referred to as not being unlawful in itself, to say that it exposes Members to very great danger, and that whenever it is merely colourable it would void the election. I refer to these cases for the purpose of showing that it is not every payment for the purpose of procuring a vote that can be held to be within the 3rd clause of the 2nd section. I do not treat the cases of canvassers as presenting any close analogy to the case of a colleague in a contest for a city. Of course even the most distant comparison would be a comparison of great things with small, but it is necessary first to ascertain the construction of the clause, to ascertain whether it is to be taken in its literal sense, and, if not, to determine what is its proper application to the case in hand. Its proper application to the case in hand, as it appears to me, is this, that the payment to be made under the 3rd section must be a payment for the purchase of influence; it must be a payment made under the circumstances referred to by Mr. James in his reply, a payment to some person who has influence in a place in order to purchase that influence; it must be a payment, or gift, or loan of something valuable to him in consideration of his lending his influence or his countenance in the election. As it appears to me, it is not an offence within the 3rd clause for a candidate to bring forward another person to stand as his colleague, he himself being (I will use at once the word that comes into my mind) a monied man and a party man, a man who does not care to spare his money in the interest of his party, who desires to have some person to stand with him in order to advance the interest of his party, and who is satisfied to pay the legitimate expenses of the election of himself and of the other candidate whom he desires to bring forward with such a view. You must show an intention to do that which is against the law, before you bring the case within any of those highly penal clauses of "The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854." And forming the best judgment I can, and confessing with an almost painful feeling, my insufficiency to decide off-hand any grave constitutional question, even after the anxious deliberation which I have bestowed upon this, I must pronounce my opinion, as I entertain it, that to bring forward another candidate under such circumstances, without a view to purchase his influence, with the intention of serving a man's party, and because he does not mind spending his money upon the legitimate expenses of the election of himself and of the other candidate, with the view only to serve his party, and not with the view to purchase influence for himself, does not fall within that 3rd clause to which reference has been made.

Now I have endeavoured to give my opinion upon the law, as it is my duty to do, and I wish I possessed greater power of expressing it clearly, in order that it may be criticised, and if wrong overruled, and if injurious set right by future legislation; and that is the opinion at which I have arrived upon the question of law.

It is obvious, therefore, that the only question remaining with reference to the effect of the treaty upon the return of the Members in this case is one of fact, namely, whether the compact which was entered into in October, between Mr. Eaton and Mr. Hill, was a compact having for its object to purchase Mr. Hill's influence in the city, because if it was I agree, even without the authority of the case to which Mr. James referred, upon which if I had considered it a question of authority, though I have entire trust in the accuracy of Mr. James, quite as much as if I had examined the matter for myself, still, in the discharge of my duty, I should have thought it necessary to send for the authority referred to by Mr. James, and to examine it before I acted upon it; but quite apart from any authority, I can conceive that "Legal expenses, bonâ fide incurred, at or concerning any election," in the proviso to the 2nd section, would not include the expenses of another candidate at that election, if they were paid for the purpose of purchasing influence. The question of fact, therefore, remains whether the payment was made for the purpose of purchasing influence. This makes it necessary that I should consider the position of Mr. Hill with reference to the city. It has not been suggested, that I can recollect, or find in the evidence of either of the Members, that Mr. Hill was a person who had any local connection in the way of birth or inhabitancy, or property in the city. I do not think it was suggested that he had any influence to purchase in respect of any of those local causes; he had nothing to sell in that respect, and, therefore, no one ought to charge upon Mr. Eaton, apart from his mercantile experience, the intention of buying of Mr. Hill that which Mr. Hill had not to sell. Mr. Hill had stood at a former election for the city; he had stood against Mr. Carter, and he had been defeated by a majority of 288. He had been defeated by a considerable majority of the old constituency; he had been defeated under circumstances which more or less disheartened him, and which determined him not to come forward again. He had paid the 800*l.* under the circumstances already explained, not with a view to coming forward again. If he had done that, if it could be fairly charged against him, that he had paid illegitimate expenses with a view to coming forward again and being returned, a very different construction might have been placed upon, and a very different credit lent to, his statement that he paid the 800*l.* worth of bills of illegitimate expenses as a matter of honour. But referring again to the correspondence of October, and taking the statement of Mr. Hill, as everybody seemed disposed to do, and as I am prepared to do, and do, the payment of 800*l.* was not a purchase of influence on his part, and, therefore, you have to consider whether Mr. Eaton in October did what he did, and Mr. Hill assisted him in doing what he did, in purchasing Mr. Hill's influence, or the assistance which his influence would enable him to lend. It is difficult to distinguish between influence and assistance at this part of the inquiry under the circumstances to which I have referred, apart from Mr. Hill's unsuccessful contest for the city, apart from his unsuccessful contest in March, and apart from his payment of the 800*l.* of bills, which has been already, I think, sufficiently eliminated from the proper elements of decision as to the intention of these gentlemen. The inquiry—Was it a purchase of Mr. Hill's influence? Was it a purchase for Mr. Eaton's individual advantage in the contest? Was the agreement entered into by Mr. Eaton with the selfish view of aiding himself by that influence? or was what he did fairly to be explained by a desire to serve his party, without regard to any influence of Mr. Hill?—ought, as it appears to me, to be answered under these circumstances, and upon these facts, in favour of the purity of intention of Mr. Eaton. I must conclude that I express no opinion whatsoever, and I desire to express none, upon the propriety of such an arrangement, but it must be quite obvious to anybody who will cast his mind back upon the history of Parliament—I speak not of the history of Parliament in a party-political point of view—I have abstained, and shall abstain, with all my might, from any observations having such an aspect whilst I sit in this place; but looking back at the history of Parliament as part of the history of the country, I think it must be obvious, even without referring to books which are not of authority in courts of law, that many persons of brilliant abilities, and who have been of very great service to the country, have been unable to pay their own expenses, and have been brought in at the expense of others, and that is so notorious that it confirms the opinion that I form upon the true construction of the 3rd clause of the 2nd section of “The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854,” taken by itself. I come to the conclusion that the fair payment of the expenses of a Member if he will stand, does not of itself constitute an illegality under the provisions of the Act to which I have referred: it constitutes a case calling for, and which has here received, a full inquiry. There never was a case more thoroughly discussed at the Bar, or more ably. I know that it has received full justice at the hands of the Bar, and it has received at mine such deliberation as I have been able to bestow upon it, and a decision conveyed in terms as distinct as I am able to pronounce myself in.

It now becomes necessary to discuss the remaining causes for which the Petitioners claim that the election should be declared void; and here the duty which is to be discharged is one of an exceedingly anxious and painful character—rather anxious and painful, I think, than difficult; because, with respect to the greater number of the cases which have been brought forward, they do not admit of being decided upon gloss or construction of the evidence; it will be necessary to state flatly, with respect to more than one of them, whether I believe witnesses who have positively sworn in the affirmative, or witnesses who have positively sworn in the negative.

In the first place, however, I think that it would be proper, before coming to those cases to which that remark more properly applies, to discuss the cases in which it will be necessary to put a construction on the evidence, and to apply the law—cases as to which, in the result, balancing the evidence upon the one side and upon the other, I entertain but little doubt as to the facts, and can entertain none at all as to the law; indeed, as to that, no doubt has been suggested.

I shall first deal with the Leicester case; and, with respect to that, the law may be shortly stated thus:—Before the case of Cooper against Slade (6 House of Lords Cases, 746), which was decided in the year 1858, a doubt existed as to whether, under the law as it then stood, the travelling expenses of out-voters might be paid—I speak now of out-voters who have a right to vote by reason of their residence continuing—whether the travelling expenses of out-voters might or might not be paid, and whether the promise to an out-voter to pay him if he came up and gave his vote for a particular Member, or to pay him his expenses of going back to his place of residence, if it happened to be in the place of polling, in order that he should not vote, whether the payment of expenses in any form—whether in the former, which has been called a mild form of bribery, or in the latter, which would be a point-blank piece of bribery—was illegal, and illegal by reason of its being a promise of money within the 1st clause of the 2nd section of “The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854,” a promise to give money, “in order to induce any voter to vote or refrain from voting”; and the result was, it was decided in that case of Cooper against Slade, that such a promise is illegal—a promise to a voter, whether he be really entitled to vote or not, who happens to be out of the place at the time of the election, a promise to pay him even his bare expenses if he will come up and vote for a particular candidate, was decided by the House of Lords to be illegal in the case of Cooper against Slade. That led to a discussion as to whether or not it was just that a Member should be debarred from the payment of the bare travelling expenses of the voters, and it was insisted that there was nothing unjust in it; that the voter ought to be enabled to vote, and as he gained nothing by the payment of his travelling expenses, they ought to be allowed to be promised him, and paid him. That was answered by an argument which has prevailed, and which expresses the law—that the danger of allowing promises or payments of travelling expenses to voters voters being made a colour and cloak, and of paying them more than they are entitled to in respect of such travelling expenses, is so great, that they shall and they do continue to be forbidden by the law. And in the August of the year in which the decision in Cooper v. Slade was given, it was enacted by the Legislature, by a section of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 87, which must be taken as distinctly recognising the decision in the case I have referred to, "that it shall be lawful for any candidate or his agent to provide conveyance for any voter for the purpose of polling at an election, and not otherwise; but it shall not be lawful to pay any money, or give any valuable consideration to a voter, for or in respect of his travelling expenses, for such purpose." Therefore, it is lawful, under that Act, for the candidate to give a voter a lift in his carriage to the poll, but it is not lawful for the candidate or his agent to promise a voter his travelling expenses if he will come up and poll, or to pay him his expenses afterwards, if that payment is made corruptly, within the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act, as to payments after the vote in respect of having voted. So stood the law until the passing of the Representation of the People Act of 1867, which by the 36th section enacts that "it shall not be lawful for any candidate, or any one on his behalf, at any election for any borough," except certain boroughs, which are excepted because the constituencies are scattered (being more like counties than boroughs, amongst which the city of Coventry is not included), "to pay any money on account of the conveyance of any voter to the poll, either to the voter himself, or to any other person; and if any such candidate, or any person on his behalf, shall pay any money on account of such conveyance," then the payment is to be considered illegal; not that the payment is to be considered to avoid the election, if made to a third person not a voter, and not to induce a voter to vote—though such a consequence would follow if the promise were made to a voter—but that it shall be unlawful to pay any money on account of conveyance, either to the voter, or any other person.

It has appeared to be necessary to recite these sections, in order that the law should not be misunderstood; or rather, if I be mistaken, that there may be the means of exposing any mistake which I shall have made, and of preventing the recurrence of like mistakes for the future by proper legislation—an object which I have had in view in many of the statements which I have thought it my duty to make in the course of these inquiries, the more especially as there is no court of appeal from the decisions which are here pronounced.

So far with respect to the law as to persons who have a right to vote, though they happen not to be in the place of election at the time of the election.

There is, however, another head of law which I must dispose of, and upon which I must refer to the sections in point, before proceeding to the consideration of the question of fact. I shall shortly refer to the Reform Act of 1832, section 27, with respect to ordinary voters in boroughs, and section 32, with respect to freemen in boroughs; both those classes being included in the number of those persons whose cases come under consideration. It is provided by that Act, that in order to be placed upon the register a person must have been resident upon the 31st of July, and for the six months preceding. Then there are subsequent enactments, which I may dispose of with this statement, that a provision is made by which lists are to be framed of persons so entitled to vote, and by which those lists are to be revised by competent persons, with reference to the qualification, including that of residence during the six months ending the 31st of July in each year; provision is made especially by the Act of 6th of the Queen, chapter 18, and other Acts, to which I need not refer here. The duty of the person who revises, with respect to the residence is discharged and fully satisfied by inquiring as to the right up to the 31st of July, and, with reference to the continuance of the right of the voter at a subsequent period, a question which was formerly put as to whether the qualification continues, is not now put, in consequence of an enactment which I only thus notice in passing.

Then, by the 79th section of the 6th Vict. c. 18, it is enacted, that "no person shall be entitled to vote at any future election for a Member, unless he shall, ever since the 31st of July in the year in which his name was inserted in the register, have resided, and at the time of voting shall continue to reside, within the city, &c." Therefore, it is clear that with respect to persons who have ceased to reside after the 31st of July, they are not entitled to vote at the election. I have stated elsewhere my opinion with reference to such a person voting, and I repeat it (my opinion has not yet been pronounced with reference to any other case within the 79th section), that a man who ceases to reside, that is, has given up connection with this city, for instance, and gone off and taken up his residence elsewhere, leaving behind him no wife, or household gods in this city, for which he intends to return, who cannot fairly be said to retain a residence in this city, but has entirely removed his residence elsewhere beyond the city, and the statutory seven miles which are considered as part of it for the purpose of residence; I say that that person, knowing the law, and coming here to vote, even if there were no remedy, which I think there is, in the event of his doing that which by law he is not entitled to do, has done an act which is unjustifiable in point of fairness and honesty. If he does not know the law, or if he is in doubt about the fact, I should say nothing about his honesty; but if he does know the law, and does know the fact, I say that that man, in voting, does an act which cannot be maintained in point of honesty, as it certainly cannot in point of law. There is a provision in the 98th section of that Act, with reference to persons to whom objection has been taken before the Revising Barrister, upon whose case the Revising Barrister has pronounced; if no objection has been taken, and he has pronounced no express decision, the committee, or the judge sitting here, cannot, even on a scrutiny, go into the question of qualification. If an objection could not have been made before the Revising Barrister, then, in respect of such an objection arising afterwards, it appears to me that it comes clearly within the expression "legal incapacity at the time of his voting," which might be inquired into by an Election Committee, and which may now be inquired into by a judge; and such was the decision in the Cambridge case, reported in "Woolferstan and Dew," page 45. It is proper, however, to mention, indeed it would be quite uncandid not to mention, that the very same committee, singularly enough, at page 50, appear, according to the Report, to have had before them the case of a person who had not resided during the six months ending upon the 31st of July, and with respect to such a person, inasmuch as the committee said an objection might have been taken before the Revising Barrister, and was not taken, they declined to go into the case of his not being resident after the 31st of July, upon a ground which seems to me, I own, of a good deal of subtlety, namely, that there was no cessation of residence after the 31st of July, but that the cessation of residence was at a period at which it might have been inquired into by the Revising Barrister. I shall always speak, I hope, with the greatest respect, and quite a sincere one, of the decisions of Election Committees, and especially after a laborious study of the reports of as many of them as I can find in the books, the mass of which, both as to practice and as to decision, though I cannot say so of all, certainly is characterised, as it appears to me, by strong good sense, and also by a legal perception, upon the whole, hardly to be expected from bodies formed as Election Committees were. But speaking with reference to the decision in the second Cambridge case, I cannot myself, looking at the 79th section, say, if I were to put my own construction upon it, I should not have come—I think I should—but I say no more upon it, because I am told the question is before the Court of Common Pleas, in the Salisbury case; I think I should have come to the same conclusion in the second case, at page 50, which the Committee came to in the former case, at pages 45, 46, in which the Committee resolved that non-residence was a legal incapacity, no doubt referring to the terms of the 98th section. It should be added, that as the sections affecting residence, including the 79th of 6 Vict. c. 18, are expressly modified as to London only by the 46th section of "The Representation of the People Act, 1867," the 79th section is impliedly repeated and re-enacted by that Act, as to all other places, including Coventry.

I have delivered myself of whatever knowledge of the law upon this Leicester case, and other cases of out-voters was in me, and I must proceed to deal with the facts. Given, that it was lawful for the Member, in the terms of the statute, the 21 & 22 of the Queen, to provide conveyance for the out-voters; given that it was not lawful for the Member to promise, as was proved in the case of Cooper v. Slade, to pay the expenses of out-voters, should they come up; given that it was not lawful for the Member or his agents to pay the expenses of out-voters; and given also, as I think must be conceded, that the payment of expenses shortly after voting, traced to the agent of the Member, would be such pregnant evidence of a promise to the voter, as that such a promise ought to be inferred, unless the other circumstances of the case excluded that conclusion; was there, in fact, such a promise, or was there such a payment? I cannot do as I was asked to do in the reply, select one of these cases, and deal with it by itself, and say whether, if it stood alone, I should come to the conclusion that there was a payment; and next infer from that a previous promise, and then argue from that to the character of all the other cases. I think that would be reasoning from the particular to the universal in a very objectionable form. I think, on the other hand, that when dealing with the evidence, if you found that in a great or any considerable number of cases which have been brought forward there was evidence of payment, though you might not be satisfied with that evidence if those cases stood alone, yet you might fairly pray in aid other cases in which there was distinct evidence of payment, and, upon the whole, come to the conclusion that there must have been promise of payment in some. Further, however, as a third remark upon a question of fact, and here I am dealing purely with the question of fact, which anybody of education in court who has heard the evidence is quite as competent to judge of as myself, I think it must be conceded that if in a great number of these instances, in which it is alleged on the part of the Petitioners that a promise of payment, or a payment was made, such promise and such payment are disproved, great caution ought to be exercised with reference to payments as to which evidence has been given in the smaller number of cases; because you have here established, as it were, not only an intention that there should be no payment made, and no promise given, but a habit in reference to the election, that there should be no payment made or promise given, and it was unlikely, therefore, that any person connected with the Members (who had themselves assumed that habit, and enforced it upon their followers), in a shape to bind them by his agency, should have made the payments which in the lesser number of cases there is evidence were made.

Now with these strands to form a clue, such as it is, through the evidence, what course ought one's mind to take? I will take the Leicester case, which was properly put forward as the strongest, upon which the most distinct evidence was given upon the part of the Petitioners, the evidence given upon the part of the Petitioners being such, that had it been unanswered, I do not hesitate to say, I should have come to a conclusion quite satisfactory to my mind, that there was a conditional promise to pay, and a payment. A number of men, two or three and twenty (as to some of whom I have the strongest impression that they were persons who came to vote, and to share in that which ought to be the inheritance of the residents of the city, and came to do so improperly, bearing in mind the provisions of the 79th section), came over from Leicester to vote. They had previously met at the "Talbot Inn," where no doubt the plot, I will call it, if it were illegal, and plan, I will call it, if it were lawful, was formed. They had set out in the dark, from the neighbourhood of Leicester, under circumstances in which it appeared that they were desirous to escape observation. They had been brought over, and set down out of Coventry, at a place where also they might escape observation, and they had polled; and two or more of them afterwards applied to a person named Kilby, who was an agent of the Members returned, they applied to Mr. Arthur Seymour as an agent of the Members returned, and they applied to a Mr. Burrows, at Leicester, who was in communication with an agent of the Members returned, and they pressed upon these persons a demand for payment for their expenses, or for their loss of time. They were not very distinct (one could not expect it from them) as to the precise form in which it was to come, but it was to be payment in respect of their having joined the expedition, and having come over and voted at Coventry. Moreover, it is clear to my mind (whatever may have been the misconduct of all these men in the witness-box, and very grave it was in respect of each of them in any view of the case), that these men did, from what passed at the "Talbot Inn," come to the conclusion that they would be paid their expenses if they came over; that it would be "made sufficient" for them, or that it would be "made right" for them. They hoped it, they wished it, they expected it. Whether they would have come and voted if they had had no such wish or expectation, it is hardly necessary to consider; whether their enthusiasm would have evaporated if the prospect of getting something for coming over had been shut out, it is unnecessary to consider. Perhaps it would as to some, perhaps it would not as to others. However, they did unquestionably expect it.

I need only refer to the letter and the telegrams, for I dismiss them by saying that the meeting at the "Talbot," and the bringing over of these men, was in consequence of a communication between Burrows, who met them at the "Talbot," and the agent of the sitting Members. Putting those facts together, if they were not explained, I think no man in his senses—that is no man of my mind in his senses—could arrive at any other conclusion but that there was some dark transaction which it was necessary to conceal; the result of which was, that the men were brought over under circumstances in which there was a breach of the provisions of "The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854," in respect of them, or some of them.

That being the evidence on one side, has that case been answered? I must say (and one must be forgiven for saying so in such a case as this) I firmly believe in the honesty of intention on the part of the sitting Members. It is not likely that persons of education and intelligence like Mr. Eaton and Mr. Hill, if they were corrupt enough to break the law, as they must both have known they were doing if they set on foot or sanctioned such a plot, would have interfered themselves; it must have been a thing done by their inferior agents, if it was done illegally at all.

It is not very likely that Mr. Seymour should have done so. I believe it as little of him as I do of the sitting Members, and if the evidence had simply consisted in calling those gentlemen and saying, "We positively forbade anything of the kind, we were very much grieved at what we heard," and so forth, I should have said, "I am very glad to hear it, and I shall certify accordingly; but some person representing, or misrepresenting you, has broken the law, and you cannot hold the prize you have won in a race in which there has been foul play committed by a person whom you employed." Therefore, having first taken the statements of these gentlemen, it is necessary to see what the real explanation is which has been given, and to weigh it against the evidence on the other side. The explanation which has been given is this, that there was a council as to whether the men should be brought over. Mr. Eaton did not want to have anything to do with them, because he was pretty sure of 160 majority. Mr. Hill having some case in his mind with respect to which all I can say is, after hearing what Mr. Hill and Mr. James said of it, and knowing what I do of it, that it is an obscure case, which can hardly give much assistance, Mr. Hill, not being quite so sanguine as Mr. Eaton, appears to have at last turned the scale, and the men were sent for, but they were sent for at least in a way which, by the 21st and 22nd of the Queen, c. 87, is lawful, because by that Act the candidate may provide his own conveyance. Mr. Eaton provided his own horses and omnibus, and it was arranged that that conveyance so provided by Mr. Eaton should be sent over, and the men should be taken up. Circumstance the first, therefore, in favour of an intention to comply with the law rather than to break it. Then Mr. Hill states that he gave directions, which no doubt was done (that is confirmed, if confirmation be necessary, by the statement of every other person concerned in the transaction), that the men should be taken up away from a public-house, and set down away from a public-house. That again is circumstance the second, showing that the law was intended to be complied with in avoiding treating. And further, Mr. Hill being aware that any payment or promise of payment would vitiate the election and would be unlawful, which ought to have been enough, and I have no doubt would have been enough for him, directed that no promise of payment should be made to the men, and that their expenses should not be paid; and I think he went so far as to say that they should be informed that no payment would be made, which directions were afterwards, according to Burrows, complied with, and the men were so informed. Then the next witness is the "friend" who is mentioned in the telegram, the mention of whom also added a certain sort of mystery to the transaction; the friend sent over to assist in the contrivance. That friend turns out to be Mr. Eaton, jun., who was sent over, not to assist in any unlawful contrivance, but who was sent over for the purpose of taking care that what was done should be done according to the law. What he did certainly did not break the law, and certainly he did act upon the instructions which he received. I say certainly, because nobody has doubted Mr. Eaton jun.'s evidence. I did not myself doubt his evidence. But that is not all. Mr. Eaton went over and communicated with Burrows, who appears to be a strong party man, who has been a long time in an employment at Leicester, who has all the appearance of a man whose word is to be respected, and who, although he was contradicted on one point by Noah Cox, a witness called on the part of the Respondents, for the purpose of confirming him (a circumstance which only illustrates a saying which I do not stop to recite), was so contradicted by a person who had no interest in the matter, who was no voter, and who probably paid no more attention to what passed about him in the public-house than a person usually does to conversations in which he is not interested, and in which he has no concern. I say Burrows, whose evidence seems trustworthy, states he not only did not promise the men, but that upon the men suggesting the question (as I have no doubt they did, confirming in this respect the evidence of the humpback Clarke) whether payment was not to be made, he said there was no payment to be made. Burrows stated that; Cox was called to confirm him, but Cox failed to do so, saying that he did not hear anything said about payment or promise of payment, and I must take Burrows by himself. I think it must be taken if Burrows was speaking sincerely, and I have no reason to doubt that he was, he meant to say, and did in effect say, that he rather negatived than affirmed that payment was to be made. Then with the exception of what is to be found in that statement which Clarke made and contradicted, and in another statement of another Witness, which he made and afterwards contradicted, there is nothing besides conjecture to prove that any one of those people was actually paid any money; and if there be evidence, assuming even that hearsay evidence upon such a subject would be admissible, though I think it never has been held to be admissible except for the purpose of scrutiny, there is no tracing of any agency, except as connected with the suggested payment by Kilbey to a man I think named Parker, of 40 l. for distribution amongst those people. Parker did not prove it, and I pay very little attention indeed, as may be supposed, to his evidence. Kilbey denied it, and therefore it rests that such a payment has not been proved, and there is no reflected light to put the matter before the Court otherwise than as represented by those witnesses on the part of the Respondents, to whose evidence I have directed attention, to show that there was an under-current of corruption besides and beyond the lawful acts of Mr. Eaton and Mr. Hill, and young Mr. Eaton and Burrows. Moreover, it is clear that the Petitioners have, as was their duty, done their very best to bring together every piece of evidence that could be given upon this case; amongst other things they have subpoenaed a number of the men. I do not at all refer to this as a thing which would prejudice my mind, but no doubt the Petitioners were well advised, no doubt they did right in subpoenaing them, and endeavouring to get what they could from them, and also no doubt they were right in sending them away when they found they could not get anything out of them; a number of persons, stated to have formed part of the 22 or 23 men that came over, have been unable to add anything to the evidence upon the subject; and I shall conclude upon this case by saying that, to the absence of those Witnesses, I do not attach much weight, and I rather refer to it as showing that I have turned the matter about in my mind, and looked at it in many directions. If those men had been promised, I think there are circumstances of the case which are exceedingly strange. I pay no attention to them, and refer to them no further. I will not even go through them, because I believe it would be a waste of time.

I cannot forget the extraordinary conduct of the witnesses, throwing, if there was any evidence of illegality, and there was in the first instance strong evidence of illegality in the Leicester case, throwing the burden upon the persons they meant to serve, by their misconduct and their obvious falsity in denying that they recollected things which they must have known and recollected. This is not the first century by many in which it has been observed that the most dangerous witness that you can have to dis-serve you (even when he is called by your opponent), is a dishonest friend. I account for these people's conduct, which struck me so forcibly at the time, by saying that they attempted to be friends to the respondent's cause; they did as much mischief as they possibly could, and cast as much suspicion and prejudice about the case of the Respondents as could have been cast upon it even by hostile evidence of men who had so misconducted themselves. That suspicion and that prejudice has been removed by evidence of a trustworthy character; but the way in which those witnesses went on in the box has covered them with discredit, and would have ensured them an imprisonment if they had been men in a higher position in life. I am afraid, if I went on upon this subject, it has occupied my thoughts so long that I should remove, by the tediousness of the various topics which have occurred to me in considering the case, the effect of any reasoning I may have advanced in support of the conclusion that the Leicester case is not made out; that it is not made out that there was a promise to pay the men their expenses conditionally upon voting, and that there was not a corrupt payment, assuming that a corrupt payment after the election would fall within the 36th section, which I should rather like to consider more if I had to decide it. I think it would in the way I mentioned, as throwing light upon the conduct of the parties; but I do not wish unnecessarily to decide it; I only throw it out for consideration.

I now come to the other cases. I deal with this Leicester case as being the one containing the majority of instances, and I shall not repeat what I have said as to my view of the sort of reasoning applicable to all of the cases; I must pass over those which remain to be dealt with, shortly, inasmuch as I have stated my general views at large in dealing with the first. The next case to deal with is the Birmingham case; I think the Birmingham case was that of Lord and Rose, and I think the witness called upon the part of the Respondents was William Barnacle, a man said to have given 1 s. 6½ d., as one of the men said, lent, as he himself said, to one of the men to pay his railway ticket from Birmingham.

I think that there was also a statement in that case, that Barnacle had spoken of its "being all right," and further that there was, with regard to that case, the evidence with respect to Herbert Jackson. I should be very glad in disposing of those cases, if I should make any omission in respect of them, to have it supplied even at this moment, but it appears to me that in respect of that case there is no proof of any agency of the person who paid the 10 s.; I do not think it is sufficiently made out, and as Mr. Huddleston has so thoroughly observed upon this case on the part of the Respondent, and Mr. James has with equal thoroughness advanced what he had to say upon the part of the Petitioners, I do not think that I should be justified in saying more than that it appears to me that it is not proved that there was a payment by an agent in that case. I think it would be a strong measure with respect to the two payments of 10 s. each, to persons who had come over from Birmingham without any previous promise that I can make out, though undoubtedly with the expectation that they would be paid, to conclude that because some person, taking their evidence as true, gave each of them 10 s. for expenses, that person not being proved to be an agent of the Members, upon that penal consequences should follow. I can understand a candidate being very much injured by a person who was favourable to him, and who was very glad he had got in, and also who knew something of the men, saying, "These poor fellows have come over from Birmingham to vote; true, the Members cannot pay them, and I do not mind spending a sovereign or two upon the occasion, and giving one or two of them something to pay their expenses." I can understand that being done, and I can understand its being a fair conclusion to say, that if that was done to a hundred people, that unquestionably the man was not a mere friend but an agent of the Members, because even in the enthusiasm of an election contest men do not spend their own money in that large way; but I think it would be going farther than one would be justified in doing, though I confess I feel disposed to scrutinise those out-voters' cases a little more closely than, perhaps, others would, to draw a conclusion, I will not say, not warranted, but not sufficiently founded, and to say that the payment of that 10 s. by a person not proved to be an agent, even under those circumstances, does reflect such light upon the previous transaction, especially when Barnacle, who was not an agent, and who is called, was the person who is said to have held out the expectation and made the promise.

Now, I must pass on to the persons from London. The persons from London stand in rather a peculiar position, for this reason, because until William James Hedger, who was called late yesterday evening, was put into the box, everybody on both sides was under the impression that there was a telegram relating to those two men from London, from a person of the name of Hooper, in Warwick-street, Regent-street, directed to Hedger. The name of the son William James Hedger turns out to have been substituted by mistake for the name of the father Henry Hedger, the father being one of the ward managers, which ward managers (I think it has been taken by tacit consent in the course of the inquiry) must be taken to have been agents for the sitting Members. You have a telegram, "Keep the two men," and that was sent down shortly before the election, I think on the 12th or 14th of November, though the date is not very distinct. Then you have two men coming from London, one of whom said that he was led to expect 50 s., and another of whom said that he actually received 50 s. from a person, I think, of the name of John Moore. Upon the evidence of the second of those witnesses, I am rather inclined to believe that Moore did give him the 50 s.; that man, John Moore, is not called, and no explanation is given of his not being called. When Mr. James addressed me in reply, those two circumstances, that telegram as he properly used it at the time, and the fact of John Moore not having been inquired for or called, made so strong an impression upon my mind, that if the case had closed last night, and I had been obliged to decide upon the facts as they appeared, without further information, I might have come to the conclusion that those men did come upon the promise of being paid their expenses, and I think I should have come to that conclusion, though reluctantly; but then it occurred to my mind that this is not a case of nisi prius, and that it ought not to be decided as you must decide before a jury, who must give their decision upon the evidence offered, and cannot call witnesses as I can. This is a case in which inquiry can be and ought to be made; and now William James Hedger being sent for, proves that the telegram which was supposed to relate to the two men from London, was really a telegram relating to two commissionaires who were sent down to act as detectives for the purpose of watching and preventing bribery. With respect to John Moore, if either party had asked me to have a search made for John Moore I should have done so, and I said last night that I should hear any evidence on this point that either party might think proper to give. It was alleged on the part of the Respondents that John Moore was not to be found. The Petitioners have had an opportunity of searching to see if that was so; and I think I must come to the conclusion that John Moore is a person whose absence is not designed on the part of the Respondents; I am, therefore, to consider, so to speak, without prejudice, whether it is proved that John Moore was an agent, and I have not heard from Mr. James any proof that John Moore was an agent beyond suggestions or conjectures from other parts of the evidence. Very distinct evidence has been given as to who were agents, and I have a list, not including John Moore, of all the persons by whom prima facie and properly the Members ought to be bound; upon the whole it appears to me that the evidence of Hedger, and what I must consider as practically the explanation that Moore is not to be got at, ought to weigh the scale in the opposite direction from that in which it inclined in my mind yesterday evening.

The remaining case is one which I have passed over, because it stands upon a peculiar footing; it is the case of a man from Dudley; and with regard to him the evidence consists in this, that a telegram was sent to him and was sent to him in these terms:—"Eaton's Committee—Mr. Hammerton, come by first train to 'Stag' Bishop-street," and that is signed "James Kilbey." He said it was not his signature, but it was sent by his authority, and no doubt it was a paper which came from an agent of the sitting Members, and which, if it amounted to a promise to pay the witness's expenses conditionally upon his coming up and voting for them at the election, would have defeated the election. Moreover, Hammerton stated that he was paid a sovereign by Kilbey; with respect to the payment of the sovereign, if you take the payment of the sovereign with the telegram there is an end of the case, because Kilbey was an agent, and if he paid that sovereign to Hammerton this case is made out. It is necessary, therefore, to inquire what sort of a person Hammerton is, with a view first of all to consider whether it would be right to act upon his statement that he was paid the sovereign, against Kilbey's statement that he did not pay him the sovereign. This person Hammerton is not a person of good character, as is quite clear from his mode of answering the questions as to what passed before the Election Committee upon a former occasion. He must have done something to be ashamed of, or rather that other people thought he ought to be ashamed of; it appears that this witness Hammerton wrote letters both of which I have in my hand, and these letters are directed to Kilbey:—"I have had several visits from the ill-Liberals of Coventry, who went from Birmingham, respecting my coming up at the last election; I was three hours with them at the 'Bush Hotel,' and dined with them and took my grog, &c., and in answer to their queries, I told them bluntly that I paid all my own expenses, and if I had not they and their d--- party should not know for 1,000 l. I take this liberty to satisfy you and our party that I am firm, as I have heard that they have boasted I am coming up, but no go. I think I tricked them nicely to get a good dinner and wine and cigars, &c., and then threatened to kick them out of Dudley; if our worthy Members are unseated, I hope we shall have two others, and will come up and serve them. Please tell William Lynes, Esq., of the case, and how I disposed of them." That letter when read struck me as having two aspects, because that man, if he was a man upon whom no reliance could be placed like those persons called in the Leicester case, seems to boast of having something to conceal; that unquestionably is so, but I do not pay much attention to that letter. Then comes the letter of the 10th of December:—"I humbly hope you will excuse my freedom in writing to you; my daughter wrote to me yesterday, stating that the Radical demagogues intend to lodge a petition against the return of our respected Members. I hasten to inform you there was one Joseph Cooper acting in our ward, and he was always a dark blue before, and I am informed he came over on purpose to obtain evidence against us; and I know he is capable of doing or swearing anything. The said Joseph Cooper was in Birmingham last March, and followed me and the witnesses about, abusing me, and endeavouring to persuade them not to go at the instigation of Stephen Knapp. I hope you will see Mr. Kilbey respecting him; as I come into Dudley every day or so, any communication will find me, 52, Wolverhampton-street, Dudley. I beg to remain your humble servant, Thomas Hammerton. P.S.—I have just had a letter signed, Chairman, Messrs. J. and Carter's committee, dated 'Castle Inn,' 9th December, requesting information who paid my expenses and loss of time in coming up to poll, &c.—a nice little bit of Radical impudence. I shall reply that I came at my own, and will do so again as long as a Conservative is in the field against them." That letter also is open to the remark that I have made. That letter certainly has a double aspect. It may be the letter of a man who has got his expenses, and who writes to say that he is concealing that fact from the opposite side. Certainly it appears to me that these are letters which put one side in as great a difficulty as the other, with one exception, that they prove that Hammerton is a double-faced rogue. I know the difficulty of dealing with cases of bribery. I found it rather upon what I thought would be the sort of evidence which would be brought forward before these courts. I came to the conclusion that one would see people who had played false to both parties. I did not anticipate seeing so many poor, sad-eyed people, who have come to prove small payments to them, which could amount to bribery, but which might bear the aspect of charity; but I certainly expected to meet such cases as that of this unscrupulous and untrustworthy person, Hammerton. I felt at once the difficulty of proving bribery. As Mr. James put it, a jury could not act upon such evidence. Upon the other hand, I feel the impropriety, even for the sake of obtaining the good of doing away with corruption

(of which a great deal exists, though not so much as I had been led to anticipate in any of the places I have been in), of endeavouring to do away with corruption at the expense of introducing a loose construction of the law, or a hasty and violent presumption upon facts by a judicial tribunal. Of course it is most especially in dealing with facts that I must exercise my judgment as best I can. Where there is a person named Hammerton speaking to a bribe, and where there is a person named Kilbey contradicting him, and saying that there was no bribe, and where the person who is stated to have received the bribe is a tainted witness, whose evidence I should hesitate to act upon, even if there was no contradiction, then I ought not to say that the fact is proved, merely because it is for the public benefit that such facts, if they do exist, should be proved. There is no public benefit in relaxing the rules by which justice is administered in this any more than in any other part of the system of legal administration. I am bound to say that I cannot, upon that evidence, whatever suspicions it may raise in my mind, come to the conclusion (against Kilbey's evidence) that the sovereign was paid, and I am not at all now sure that this person Hammerton, who, as I strongly believe, looking to the way in which he gave his evidence about the papers produced before the Election Committee, had previously dealt in concocted documents, having first given false information to the agents for the Petitioners, did not write these letters to Kilbey for the purpose, to a certain extent, of confirming himself. I can quite believe that the learned counsel for the Respondents were quite uncertain whether they should produce those letters or not when he got into the box. However, I cannot conclude that the sovereign was paid.

It remains to say whether in point of law this telegram does amount to a promise to pay travelling expenses conditionally upon Hammerton coming over and voting for the Tory candidates. That is a question of pure law, and Kilbey's intention, either one way or the other, could not affect it. I must put a proper construction upon this document. I agree with Mr. James that an instrument or an act that would give a man to understand directly or indirectly that a thing would be done if he did something else in return for it, would be sufficient, but only because it would be a promise—a contract, if acted upon. The question is, what is the legal construction of this document, "Come by the first train to 'Stag,' Bishop-street"? Does that amount to an act or inducement, giving evidence of a contract, which, in the case of Cooper v. Slade, was held to amount to bribery? I think I may dismiss this by referring to the opinion expressed by a learned judge whom it is only necessary to name in order to command respect. My brother Bramwell, in the House of Lords, in the case of Cooper v. Slade (p. 765), gave the opinion that even in that case, where the terms were, "Your expenses will be paid," those words added by a person in the committee-room of the Member, after what he had said, were not, under the circumstances, sufficient evidence of such a conditional promise. However, his opinion upon that point, which was one rather of evidence than of law, did not prevail; but he pointed out in the clearest terms that no amount of hope or expectation on the part of a voter is enough to constitute bribery, and everybody agreed that the mere request to the voters to come up and vote could not constitute bribery. It is quite clear that it cannot as a matter of law, because if I were to ask one of the learned counsel to go to London and vote for me at a club or elsewhere where an election was to take place, and say, "Come by first train" to whatever club it might happen to be, although looking to the fact that an election was about to take place, there could be no doubt that I meant that he should come and vote for me at some expense, I think that it would be not only without authority, but that it would be contrary to the authority to be found in the opinions of all the learned judges who dealt with the case of Cooper v. Slade, to say that such a contract to pay the expenses was implied. If I send to a coal merchant, and say, "Send me in so many tons of coals," of course it means, "I will pay you for your coals;" but if I write to a man to do a thing to which a price is not usually attached, and as to which the law says there shall not be a price attached, and for which the law says there shall not be a price paid, I think that the implication of condition would be contrary to the principle, and also to the authority of that leading case to which reference has been made.

I must here leave the cases of voters coming up to vote. I recognise their importance, otherwise I should not have spent so many remarks upon them. Indeed, I have not a case here until you get to the end of the cases of actual bribery, which did not call for the attention which it received on the part of the learned counsel.

Now, I turn to the cases in which actual bribery has been alleged, and those cases must be disposed of in order. They were the cases of Shuttleworth, Villiers, Wale, Road-knight, Barton, and Horsfall. The most important of those cases, as it strikes me, is the case of Shuttleworth, and that is the case which has created most difficulty in my mind. When that poor fellow Shuttleworth and his wife got into the box and gave their evidence, I certainly did at the time arrive at the conclusion that a strong prima facie case had been made out, and if that had not been answered, I must have come to the conclusion that a bribe was given to Shuttleworth. That bribe is said to have been given by a person named James Mann. There is also the case of Villiers, in which James Mann's name was introduced. I think I ought to deal with those cases together. Villiers's demeanour did not impress me as that of a man who was telling the truth. It turned out that he had been previously convicted, and as almost every person at all hardened does, he said he was convicted unjustly, and moreover, he had written a letter, or had signed a paper in a very good hand (not at all an ignorant hand, but the hand of a man who seems to have known what he was about), stating that "Joseph Villiers, of Cocks-street, weaver, says, 'I am a voter, and at the last election voted for Hill and Eaton. I declare that I did not receive any money or bribe for doing so. The agents for the Petitioners have been trying to make me say so.—2nd February 1869.” Therefore, here is another of the double-faced ones, and not a man whose evidence is to be received with confidence, or to be acted upon unless it is confirmed.

With respect to Shuttleworth, he states that Mann had called at his place, and taken him aside in his house to a certain place under concealment, and gave him half-a-crown, and afterwards gave him 10 s. The evidence to confirm this is the evidence of his wife, who speaks to Mann having been at the house under circumstances in which the money is stated to have been paid, but not to the payment. That is the evidence of those persons. On the other hand, there is the evidence of Mann himself, who denies that he was at the house, and denies it in a circumstantial manner. He states when it was that he was at the house; he tells of his going there upon two occasions, and lastly upon the Saturday before the election with a card for Shuttleworth, which had been forgotten. I pay no attention to Mrs. Shuttleworth talking of Monday instead of Saturday; I think that is of small consequence. If I recollect rightly, she did so, but I do not stop to inquire into it, because it is a small matter, and circumstantial variances are less likely to occur in a made-up story; but Mann explains that on this occasion he did go to the house. He denies that he was there at the time that the half-a-crown was said to be paid, and he denies the payment of the 10 s. If it had stood upon the evidence of Shuttleworth and Mann, it would have been a case in which I should have been left without any other alternative than to say to a jury, “Do you believe the one, or do you believe the other, or rather do you believe the one side so much more than you believe the other, that you are content to rest your judgment upon it, and to pronounce for the affirmative?” The case, however, does not rest there, because, passing over the evidence of the opposite neighbour (to which I attach very little importance, for the reason which I mentioned before, that people negating that a thing took place in which they have no interest, comes to little or nothing), passing over the evidence of Wheateley, and coming to the evidence of Nunn, I find that there is no evidence before me going to the credit of Mann, that I can recollect. There was no cross-examination of Mann to show that he was a person unworthy of belief by reason of anything which he had said or done. He appears to be a person who is to be found, and who has been to be found for a considerable time, and against whom, if anything existed, no doubt it would have been produced, and properly produced. That being so with respect to Mann, I will take the evidence of Nunn, the grocer, who looked to be a person who might be relied upon, unless something was advanced to the contrary. He, like Mann, was not in any way shaken by cross-examination. He said that Shuttleworth had come to him, and stated that the paper that he signed (that is the paper, no doubt, containing his evidence given to the agents for the Petitioners, which he repeated in the course of his evidence in this court) was all false, and similar evidence, though perhaps not so pointed, was given by Wheateley; and it appears that this person wished to see Mr. Dewes upon that subject. Upon that, Mr. James made a remark, showing the fertility of his mind, which certainly is extraordinary, but which I do not admire so much as I did other remarks which he made in the course of dealing with this case. He said, “Very well. Shuttleworth was anxious to make a statement, and was about making it. He was not listened to by Mr. Dewes, but he must have been listened to by somebody else, and that somebody else must have been in the interest of the sitting Members, and that statement is not produced to contradict him.” Two remarks may be made upon that. In the first place, that Shuttleworth, being Mr. James’s witness, he had the opportunity of asking about any such statement, if any such statement were made; and, secondly, that it would be an extraordinary thing that Shuttleworth, having given even a hint to Wheateley that he had made a false statement in respect of Mann, should have gone off to any one connected with the sitting Members, and made a statement to him with a view of making a clean breast of it, and with the view of showing that what he had said was false, but which, if produced, would show that what he had said was true. I think that was the only shadow which Mr. James pursued in the course of his most able address. Those are the circumstances, and again I say, pronouncing a judgment, which anybody who attends to the facts is as competent as myself to pronounce, I being the one person to pronounce the judgment which is to be delivered, I cannot act upon Shuttleworth’s case.

If I cannot act upon Shuttleworth’s case, still less, then, can I act upon Villiers’s case, for the reason I mentioned, so far as it affects the husband. So far as it affects the evidence of the wife, who confirmed the husband in stating that two half-crowns were given to her by James Mann, James Mann avows that he gave the two half-crowns. He says, “I did so.” She does not say that they were given as a bribe. She used in her evidence some curious expressions, to which I have referred with regard to this, and which I find thus upon the note. “Q. Did he say anything in your presence to your husband?—A. No. Q. Did he say anything to you?—A. No; only he gave me the 5 s. Q. What was the money?—A. Two half-crowns. Q. When he gave you the 5 s., what did he say?—A. He asked where Mr. Taylor lived, my husband. He asked where Mr. Taylor, my husband, lived; that was all that passed.” Then, having stated that he did not say anything as to what that money was given for, she is further pressed as to it. “Q. Did he say anything to your husband when he gave you the 5 s.?—A. He said that was because they had not got nothing to do.” That is the whole account that she gives of that payment of the half-crowns. Mann, being called, states that he did give them, and that that he did give them to her, in respect of work her husband had actually done at the municipal election, and that he did not give them with respect to the Parliamentary election. In this state of things, it appears to me that Villiers's case falls with Shuttleworth's.

Wale's case was treated, and properly treated, as standing upon a different footing. Wale is the person who got the tea and the sugar and the shilling, and who says that 5 s. was slipped into his hand under mysterious circumstances. This was an old man of 80 years of age, who would certainly have been open to influences of this kind, and upon whom a very small amount of bribery would have worked. I pay no attention whatsoever to the suggestion that only a small amount of bribery was committed. His evidence is to be taken with that of the witnesses who were called on the part of the Respondents, viz., Thomas Hollings and his wife, and Pritchard; Pritchard went with Wale to the poll, and his evidence amounts to this, that he saw no sum of 5 s. paid by anybody. The evidence of Mr. and Mrs. Hollings was in effect that a small quantity of tea and a more considerable quantity of sugar were given to Wale, and that the tea and sugar (which were returned), and the shilling (which was kept), were given in consequence of Wale's distress, and as a mere act of charity to him. Mrs. Hollings especially struck me very much as being the witness of truth. She gave a very circumstantial account of the matter, which, if she has invented it, is certainly a piece of deception of a very clever as well as of a very minute kind. I doubt whether she could have invented it. I think that upon her evidence, if not upon that of her husband, I should come to the conclusion that that tea and sugar and shilling were given as a mere act of charity, and not with reference to the election.

It was properly observed, that if there had been many of these acts at about the time of the election traced to any persons who took the part of the Members, a very different construction ought to have been put upon them. I will not say that this is, as Mr. Hudleston remarked, with reference to the five-shilling cases, the only one of the sort, but it is one of two such acts, to the other of which I will now refer. That is the case of John Roadknight. The case of John Roadknight is to be taken with the evidence of Daniel Hunt Clare, if I recollect rightly. It struck me at first, that this witness gave his evidence rather oddly, but I satisfied myself in the end that it was only a peculiarity of tone, and perhaps slightly of manner, which appeared to me at first to be attributable to hesitation. I incline to think that the 5 s. was given, but whether it was given under the precise circumstances, I do not think it necessary to determine, the circumstances not amounting to enough to satisfy me that the act was traceable to the Members. Pritchard said that he found Roadknight in distress, and that he took him to Clare, whom he had known to have relieved people out of charity, under similar circumstances, and that Roadknight, being taken to Clare, did receive a couple of loaves and some other food. Clare gave Roadknight several other sums of money, I think, amounting to about 10 s. Roadknight said that the money was given in respect of some 10 days' work; but Clare said it was given in respect of about five days' work. That is a circumstance which in my mind goes to confirm Clare, because it shows that he is giving a candid account of the transaction out of his own mind. He states that the amount of work paid for was a less amount than that which Roadknight spoke to; which, of course, would exaggerate the effect of the payment made, if it was a corrupt payment. I think the payment of the 10 s. is explained by Roadknight himself; and it is further explained by Clare to have been a payment for work. I cannot hold, and I do not believe, it to have been corrupt. But then the giving of the food is explained, both by Pritchard and by Clare, to have been an act of charity to a man who certainly was in distress at the time; and, although bribery under the guise of charity is even more detestable than if it were bare-faced, care must be taken not to confound the one with the other.

With respect to Jane Barton, she says her husband got money, or a promise of money, from the Members themselves, and her husband was called to contradict her. I do not think her husband need have been called to contradict his wife; but she says that one or the other of the Members did it, and they both contradict it. It hardly required further notice; and it did not receive much notice at the hands either of the judge or of the counsel. The fact that the persons alleged to be implicated are well off in the world, and that the witness Barton is a poor person, has nothing to do with the matter; but it is preposterous to imagine that the Members would have exposed themselves to the consequences which would follow in the case of this one person; because, if they had made a practice of it, we should have had all Coventry ringing with the cry of corruption, which would properly have been raised against them.

The next case to which I will refer is the case of Joseph Horsfall, who said that he had voted on the Liberal side before, and that a person of the name of Thomas Jackson gave him half-a-crown in the street. He says that he distributed bills, and delivered about 30 or 40 of them; and he spoke to being present at one of the places where treating was alleged to have taken place, and where this Thomas Jackson was, and where he says that they had "gin-hot." He gives the circumstance of time; and he says that Jackson told him that if he voted for Eaton and Hill, he would give him 10 s. Now I must turn to the evidence on the other side. The evidence on the other side consisted in the calling of Thomas Jackson, who denied the alleged offer to bribe. It amounted rather to an offer than a bribe, inasmuch as he had done some work; and no very clear comparison was drawn between the amount of the work and the money that he received. But

Coventry.

Jackson denied the story, and said it was not a true story; and to confirm his evidence the Respondents called the landlord of the place where the treating was said to have taken place, who said that there was no "gin-hot" served during the day. I think that in that case, again, the evidence which has been given on the part of the Respondents outweighs the evidence which was given on the part of the Petitioners.

I believe that I have gone through all the cases in which actual bribery was alleged, viz., Shuttleworth, Wale, Villiers, Roadknight, Barton, and Horsfall; the case of Hayward being, I think, withdrawn.

The next set of cases with which I have to deal are the cases of offers of advantage; and although these cases have been classed below those of bribery by both the learned counsel, it cannot be supposed that an offer to bribe is not as bad as the actual payment of money. It is a legal offence, although these cases have been spoken of as being of an inferior class, by reason of the difficulty of proof from the possibility of people being mistaken in their account of conversations in which offers were made; whereas, there can be no mistake as to the actual payment of money. With respect to these cases I must content myself with saying that Thomas Neale, who actually voted, I think, for Messrs. Carter and Jackson, spoke of what passed between him and Linnett and Fawson; and that his wife also spoke of what passed between him and Linnett and Fawson. Those persons were called on the part of the Respondents, and Linnett and Fawson denied that the offer which had been alleged by the witness had been made. In that case there is a contradiction of the witnesses. There are also the cases of Harris, Priest, Cooke, Brown, Kilpack, Everett, Jones, Milliner, and Jackson. These cases which I must here class together are those as to a very great number of which the persons who were alleged to have made offers were called and contradicted the evidence which was given on the part of the Petitioners. With respect to those cases in which the persons who were alleged to have made offers were not called, there is not any proof that the persons so charged were agents. If there had been a single person standing in the position of an agent of the sitting Members, or either of them, who had not been called to contradict the allegation, the case would have been relied upon by the counsel for the Petitioners, and brought to the attention of the court. I have carefully gone through the cases, and that which he had failed to discover I, as was likely, have also failed to discover. Those cases have been answered where they required an answer, and where the agents were incriminated, and they have been answered in other cases, where no answer was required, of course for the purpose of showing that this class of evidence had been exaggerated. There is no case in which the agent was incriminated in which the agent has not been called for the purpose of either contradicting or explaining.

This, I think, is a summary of the facts, as they have presented themselves to my mind, and of the law, as I understand it, upon the various subjects upon which a decision has been claimed. It remains that I should deal with a question which is certainly more difficult than some upon which I have had hitherto to pronounce, and it is so because it is a question of discretion, a question upon which minds will differ, upon which the judge can in the end, for the most part, only say, "I think so," "I think, upon the whole, that is so, and I so decide," upon which it is not usual to hear arguments, and upon which judges are seldom able to give all the reasons that occur to their minds. If I should be asked to do so, I will state my reasons, because I have a desire that in everything I do, in which any advantage, as it appears to me, could follow, my whole mind should be exposed to view and criticism, which however I do not invite, and which I certainly do not fear.

The question which remains is that of costs. As a rule, costs ought to follow the event, and in ordinary actions in the courts to which I have been accustomed, they almost invariably follow it, the exceptions being rare. When I set off upon this circuit, I certainly did so with the intention of acting upon my old notions, and of dealing with these cases as if they were ordinary suits between party and party. I have, however, become deeply impressed with the feeling that there is a third party, no less interested than those who are immediately engaged in the Petition, and that I ought in each case to consider, not merely whether the Petition has failed or has succeeded, but whether, upon the whole, I think there are grounds, not founded merely upon the belief of such witnesses as many of those who have been called before the court upon this occasion have displayed themselves to be, but founded upon the very character and history of the transaction, upon which it was for the public benefit that the Petition should be presented, and upon which I think that the Petitioners have had reasonable and probable cause for instituting this inquiry, which I am satisfied that if I had been in their place I should, without anger and without prejudice, have thought it right should be instituted. I say no more upon that point unless it is desired that I should do so. I think this is a case in which a petition has been most reasonably presented and prosecuted, and therefore I say nothing about the costs, although the Petition has in the end, in my mind, altogether failed of arriving at the result of unseating the Members.

I deem and determine:

That Henry William Eaton, whose return was complained of by the Petition, was duly elected and returned.

That Alexander Staveley Hill, whose return was complained of by the Petition, was duly elected and returned.

That

That no corrupt practice has been proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any candidate at such election.

Coventry.

That no evidence is before me that corrupt practices have, nor that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have, extensively prevailed at the election.

I shall certify to the Speaker accordingly.

DOVER ELECTION.

Dover.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Baron Martin, 23 March 1869.

Mr. Baron Martin.] I DO not wish to stand in the way of either Mr. Hewitt or Major Dickson getting into the witness-box, if they think it desirable, but I think it would be better not to do so, and that it will be a great deal better not to enter into inquiries which are in substance extrajudicial. The only part of the case that affected Major Dickson was the cheque for 27 l., which included the price of the supper; I am satisfied that he knew nothing of it, and that he paid it as a legitimate part of the East Kent election expenses. I think it will be better not to call either of those gentlemen. I see no occasion for it; I think that nothing has been done in the matter which a professional man might not do, and that Major Dickson is completely exonerated from all blame. I have only further to say that I sanction this withdrawal.

DUBLIN CITY ELECTION.

Dublin City.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Keogh, 5 February 1869.

Mr. Justice Keogh.] IN this case of the petition of two gentlemen, electors of the city of Dublin, Mr. George Foley and Mr. Thomas Woodlock, praying that the election last held for the city of Dublin, so far as regards the seat of Sir Arthur Guinness, may be avoided, I have given the voluminous evidence, extending over many volumes of manuscript notes, my best consideration. The case has been protracted over several days, but I am bound to say that I do not think any time has been at all wasted; and as regards the assistance afforded to the court in its very peculiar position—that of being both judge and jury—I have received, and have to acknowledge with thanks, the greatest possible aid from the learning and the skill of the counsel who have been engaged upon both sides.

The petition to which I have just referred contains several clauses. It seeks to avoid the election upon the ground of bribery; it also seeks to avoid the election upon the grounds of treating, of intimidation, and of the illegal payment of the travelling expenses of voters. I think that those are the four heads of charge made by the Petitioners against the sitting Member. As regards the two charges of treating and of intimidation, I am not aware that any evidence has been at all adduced to sustain them, and therefore they disappear from the case. The heads of charge which remain, and which the Petitioners contend that they have substantiated, are those of bribery, in its direct and immediate sense, and bribery, if it be so, as committed by paying, or promising to pay, the travelling expenses of voters upon condition of their voting for a particular candidate, and to those I will apply myself.

In order to enable me to reduce to anything like arrangement the immense mass of evidence which has been adduced before me, I have found it necessary to look with one general view at the whole of the case; and I think it will conduce to clearness that I should give, as succinctly as I can, a short narrative of the history of this election.

In the first place, it has been correctly stated by Mr. McDonogh, on behalf of the sitting Member, that this is not a case in which there might be any reason to suspect that the party entering upon the contest, seeking the suffrages of a great city such as this is,

would be driven to make use of illegal practices. He said, and truly, that it was natural that Sir Arthur Edward Guinness should seek the representation of his native city. He was the sitting Member until the dissolution of Parliament. The princely munificence of his father, which the citizens of Dublin cannot easily forget, the virtues of his grandfather, which I am old enough to have heard upon every tongue, all justified him in seeking the representation of this city. I shall say no more upon that subject.

The electors of this city numbered, I think, in all from 12,000 to 13,000; I believe something over 12,800. The number of persons who polled at the election were, I think, in all about 11,000. The contest proceeded, and Sir Arthur Edward Guinness was returned at the head of the poll, but outstepping the second Member by only a single vote. The majority of Sir Arthur Edward Guinness over the person who stood lowest on the poll, namely, Sir Dominick Corrigan, was 208. It is, therefore, manifest that a single vote taken from Sir Arthur Guinness and given to Mr. Pim, the other sitting Member, would have reversed their positions, and placed the one at the head of the poll, and the other second on the poll. It is equally manifest that 105 votes taken from Sir Arthur Guinness and given to Sir Dominick Corrigan would have placed Sir Dominick Corrigan at the head of the poll, and Sir Arthur Guinness at the bottom.

The first step taken by Sir Arthur Guinness was, in my mind, a most judicious and proper one. He selected for his conducting agent a gentleman whom I have known for very many years, and who is known by all the members of the profession, both upon the bench and at the bar, to be a gentleman in his profession, and, outside his profession, of perfectly unblemished character. Sir Arthur Guinness confided his interests in that contest to that gentleman, and having done so, as far as the machinery of the election is concerned, he is not in any way further personally connected with it. Mr. Sutton, the gentleman to whom I allude, associated with himself other gentlemen, Mr. Williamson, Mr. Thomas Fells White, and others, of whom I should speak in equally high terms, as far as I am acquainted with their personal character.

Those gentlemen proceeded to conduct this contest; and from the very earliest moment it was plain to all those who knew anything of the facts, that it was certain to be a very neck-and-neck race. As the preparations for the contest proceeded, it was every hour becoming more manifest that the struggle would be closer and closer. That is sufficiently shown to us by the vast number of telegrams which have been proved—telegrams which, by the way, are nothing but electric letters, as I will call them, written by the candidates, or those acting on their behalf, to electors; letters, upon the production of which, if they were in the pockets of the electors, or if copies of them were in the desks of the candidates, or those acting on their behalf, the parties of course would have a right to insist; and there is no reason why, because they are, according to the invention of modern science transmitted along a wire, instead of being, according to the olden way, written on paper with pen and ink, they should have any greater protection. Those telegrams were, according to the request of the parties, produced under my order here, and they disclosed this unquestionable fact, that the agents of Sir Arthur Guinness, as the day of the polling came near, were thoroughly convinced that, in the language of those telegrams, not one single man could be spared with safety to the cause or the chances of Sir Arthur Guinness.

The way in which the election was conducted has a most important bearing upon the case. There was, in the first place, as far as I understand, no central committee; that is to say, there was no general committee to collect up all the work of the different out-committees or ward-committees; but there were central committee-rooms where the leading agents of Sir Arthur Guinness were employed from morning to night. There, all information was carried from the outlying wards; there, the results of the canvassing were delivered; there, too, the canvassers resorted; there every person went who required information, whether he was a voter or a non-voter. But independently of these central committee-rooms, without a central committee, there was in each of the different wards of Dublin (I think they amount to 18) a committee established. Those committees had all the machinery, which is usual in any society, collected together for the purpose of furthering any one common object. The committees, being 18 in number, varied in the number of persons who were on each committee. In some there were 11 or 12 committee-men; in others, there were 20 or 25; they reached in one particular case, that of the South Dock Committee, to as great a number as 55. There was attached to those committees every description of officer; there were presidents, vice-presidents, secretaries, assistant-secretaries, and honorary secretaries; there were "solicitors in charge"; there were, in some of them, ecclesiastical presidents; there were scarcely any of them without clergymen on the committee. The military element was represented in them; there were colonels, and captains, and staff officers, and I think one or two of them appeared to have been particularly dignified by having a special supply of four gentlemen, who are bracketed together, and said to be "clergymen to the ward." There is no evidence at all before me to tell me what was the religious persuasion of those gentlemen, whether they were Church Episcopalian clergymen, or Roman Catholic clergymen, or Presbyterian clergymen. It is not of any importance in this case, because there is no allegation that there was any undue influence, spiritual or otherwise, used in this contest. On one committee I see that a gentleman was not content with being president, but he was also enrolled as vice-president. All this I collect from Sir Arthur Guinness's books, now in evidence before me.

It is necessary to call particular attention to some of the names on these committees, with a view to the subsequent evidence; but far more than the name or the profession of any person upon any one of those committees, it is, according to the view which I take of the case, of the utmost importance to mark specially one of those wards and one of those committees. Beyond a doubt there is one ward and one committee which is treated in a very different manner from all the others, and that is the Inns Quay Ward and Committee; and within that ward (at Green-street) all the freemen are polled. There the president is an eminent barrister, Mr. Norwood; the vice-president is a clergyman, the Reverend Mr. Gibson; the secretaries are Mr. Falkner, Mr. Young, and Mr. Williams; and the honorary secretary is Mr. Samuel Tudor Bradburne. He is the honorary secretary of this Inns Quay Ward, about which I shall have necessity to say much; and he is the private secretary of Sir Arthur Guinness. With him is associated, as honorary secretary, a gentleman of the name of Edward Lawlor, who is also one of the solicitors in charge, and in addition one of the committee-men. It was contended by Mr. McDonogh that I was to keep within the four corners of the page which contained the entry of the names of those committee-men, that I was not to allow or hear of any inference of authority outside the four corners of that document, and that the authority of each gentleman, whatever authority he had, was only to be attributed to the limits of his own peculiar ward, and only so far to bind Sir Arthur Guinness. But that is not so, even as a matter of fact, because I find that a committee-man in one ward becomes the president in another. I find that one gentleman, a Mr. Charles Crawcour, whoever he may be, is one of this committee, and he is upon three other committees. The same observation applies throughout. But dealing with this particular Inns Quay Ward Committee, it has a characteristic of vital peculiarity; it has not an imperium in imperio within itself. But there is overlying itself another committee, which is called, by distinction, the "Inns Quay Working Committee." Now, there are 18 wards and 18 committees, and how comes it to pass that in this book, coming out of the possession of the sitting Member, and therefore truly representing, as I take it, the state and condition of the arrangements made for the purposes of that election, there is no one of those wards, or of those committees, except this one, which has had what is called a separate special working committee? There is a page which contains the names of the committee, as in every other, and on the counter side of the page is the "Inns Quay Working Committee."

Now, let us see what is the composition of that working committee. The first thing I remark upon that working committee is, that it was chosen, as appears by the book of resolutions (which was given in evidence), upon, I think, the 13th of October. I may be wrong as regards the date, but the resolution was read by Mr. Heron, from the proceedings of this particular ward committee; there Mr. Henry Foster, who plays no small part in these transactions, moved, that out of this committee, which was not by any means a large one in point of numbers (not half the number of the south ward committee, sufficiently small in its numbers to be working in itself, and not too numerous for practical operations, if they were of a simple and ordinary character),—Mr. Henry Foster moves that, out of that ward committee, there shall be another committee chosen to be "a working committee," and that is carried unanimously.

Mr. Henry Foster is the mover of that resolution, and he is himself named a member of that working committee. Who are the other members of that working committee? Mr. John Norwood, as I said before, an eminent member of the bar, president of this Inns Quay Committee, is the first name. Mr. Samuel Tudor Bradburne, who is the honorary secretary of that committee, and the private secretary of Sir Arthur Guinness, is one of the other members of that working committee. Mr. George A. Young, who is the assistant secretary of that committee, is a member of the working committee. Mr. Edward Lawlor, who is one of the solicitors in charge of that committee, and who is also one of the honorary secretaries jointly with Mr. Samuel Tudor Bradburne, is another member of the committee. Mr. Edward Lawlor is made honorary secretary of that working committee; he is secretary of the committee; he is one of the solicitors in charge of the committee; he is a member of the working committee, and he is secretary of the working committee; but travelling outside the members of this very committee, as if there was something there to be done which did not appertain to any other of those committees, other persons are introduced into it not belonging to the original committee at all.

What is the meaning of appointing a working committee out of another committee? It implies that the general committee is too numerous for the work, and therefore reduces its numbers, and makes it more practical. Is there any pretence that the number of this committee was too great in itself, if, as I said, it was but ordinary business which was to be transacted? But if a working committee is required, why travel out of the limits of the other committee to introduce some new elements which did not before belong either to the ward or to the committee? What do I find? that a new office is created for this working committee which is not to be found in any other committee or sub-committee, and the officer is called a "superintendent"; Mr. Henry G. Hall, of 12, Seville-place. Who is the chairman of this working committee? Mr. Norwood was the chairman of the ward committee. No one can question his zeal, or his industry, or his learning for all purposes which might be required, even if there were not two solicitors in charge (for I remark that in the case of every one of those committees, there were two solicitors in charge of it); but Mr. Norwood will not answer to be the chairman of this working committee; and accordingly a gentleman whose name has not been much dwelt upon, but which I think is of great importance in the view which I take of this case, is specially appointed on the 14th of October 1868, to be the chairman of this working committee, Mr. W. W. Barlow. I believe it will be found, on referring to other portions of the book, that Mr. W. W. Barlow is stated to be a solicitor. I find that there is a page in this book for solicitors, and that at pages 38 and 39 on the list of solicitors, and under the heading "Solicitors," is the name of W. W. Barlow; address, 14, Henrietta-street; and unless there are two persons of the same name, I think we may fairly assume that he is the same person; and "by whom recommended, Mr. Bradburne," the private secretary of Sir Arthur Guinness. So that again we find that upon this working committee of the Inns Quay Ward Committee a special chairman is appointed; and on turning to another part of the book, we discover that he has been brought into privy with this working committee, not by reason of having belonged to the committee to which this was to be not subordinate, but, as I consider, controlling, but at the recommendation of Mr. Bradburne, who is himself a member of the working committee, who is the honorary secretary of the committee itself, and who is the private secretary of Sir Arthur Guinness.

That committee being so constituted, they proceeded to their work. The whole machinery of the election is managed by means of these committees. As the time for election approaches, instructions are being prepared for them, as well as for canvassers and agents. It is necessary to say a passing word about the number of persons who were employed for the purpose of conducting this election. I recollect, in the progress of his address, discussing this matter (as he suggested, and with my full consent adopted,) more in a conversational tone with the bench than in the regular formal speech to evidence which is made by counsel. Mr. Butt said that, looking at the number of wards, the number of committees, and the number of electors, those persons who had signed what are called the "gratuitous employment papers," they being in all 385, that number divided amongst all those committees would not make a very excessive number of employés for the purpose of that election. Assuming for a moment that those persons were all legitimately employed—though I have not yet had an answer to the section of the Act of Parliament to which I directed the attention of the learned counsel, namely, that making it illegal, whether for money or without money, to give employment to voters, in order to induce them to vote,—and, adopting the criticism of Mr. Butt, that it was no excessive number of employés, considering the vast number of wards and committees, directing my attention to this other book, also in evidence, at which I have had the opportunity of looking, and which throws, I might almost say, an electric light upon the whole of this case, I will not pledge myself to be perfectly accurate as to the number, but going over it with as much accuracy as I could, without counting every name, and wishing to be very much within the mark, and throwing out as far as I could all duplicates (for duplicates do occur in the weekly payments), making all due allowance for those deductions, I think I am within the mark when I say that upon this book it clearly appears there were 800 paid agents. But Mr. Butt argued, as he always argues, with great judgment and discretion, that fair allowances should be made for the excitement of an election. No doubt, fair allowances should be made in all these election matters. I quite admit that we should not measure them, as it were, by a two-foot rule; great passions are excited at elections, great interests are at stake, there is the desire for victory, there is the gratification of a just and laudable ambition, but making all those allowances, and going to the full extent to which Mr. Butt went in his observations as to 385 voters (serving as gratuitous agents) not being an exorbitant number, what becomes of the matter when to the 385 I have to add a regiment of 800 paid retainers?

The vocabulary of agency, in all its multifarious forms, is exhausted in that book. There are canvassers, agents, sub-agents, clerks, tally agents, poll agents, and poll runners; there are care-takers for rooms, male and female, and care-takers for freemen. Presently I shall have to observe about the extraordinary care which has been taken of those freemen; they appear to have been the object of the most anxious and tender solicitude. "From early morn to dewy eve" their personal interests have been most carefully guarded, at least upon the day of the polling; but all this enormous staff having been brought to bear, the parties went to work, led undoubtedly by brave men and clever men. No profession and no individual appears to have scorned to take a portion of the money of Sir Arthur Guinness. I venture to say that there is not a friend, no matter how dear, who was engaged in that contest, who scrupled to be a participator in the waifs and strays of the wealth of Sir Arthur Guinness. The colonel in command had his car-hire carefully provided for; the captain who canvassed had his weekly wages, increasing as he went along. However, it was necessary that, even with such experienced hands to conduct the election, instructions should be issued. The names of members of the bar appear very frequently in those books; they are very numerous. I think I observed in going through these books, amongst the names of persons who took a very warm and active interest in the contest, at least one of those who presided as a judge in revising the lists. I shall say no more upon that branch of the subject. The advice of counsel is taken, and in one remarkable instance a member of the bar was employed in bringing up the most wretched of the electors to the poll, to point out to them where they were to vote, and to prepare the street lists. There is in that book 45 l. paid to a member of the bar for preparing street lists. My friend Mr. Butt spoke of "street agents." I thought that was the proper designation of the people who ascertained at the doors of the houses how the voters intended to vote. My friend Mr. Butt said also there was such a thing at an election as "gutter agents." I thought that their occupation was more manual than professional, but it is the first time that I ever heard of a member of the bar becoming something lower than a gutter agent. At all events there was legal advice to be had, and when legal advice is required about legal matters and lawful matters, we all know very well where it is sought, and it is not in that rank of the profession. I see one or two of my

my legal friends before me who were consulted in the ordinary way, and mention is made in the most ordinary and legitimate way of their names in these books.

Instructions were prepared, and I have them, or some of them, before me. These are the instructions to canvassers: "Your duty will be to make yourself acquainted with the voters in each district or street in which you shall be directed by the ward committee to canvass, and daily report the result to the committee; and you are to acquire such information as will enable you to take upon yourself the responsibility of bringing up a certain number of rated occupiers, or freemen, to the place of polling on the day of election." Now, what is the meaning of that, "Take upon yourself the responsibility of bringing up a certain number of rated occupiers or freemen?" The connection between the "information" and the "responsibility," and the "taking up," appears to me at least to be very roundabout. "But you are, on no account whatever, to offer any bribe, promise, or inducement of any kind, for the purpose of obtaining the vote of any person whatsoever." Now, it is said, and said truly, that that is a very proper injunction to give. If it was by itself it would be simple enough; but when put in connection with the previous portion of the sentence, that the party is by no means to offer a bribe, but is "to charge himself with obtaining such information as will enable him to take upon himself the responsibility of bringing up the voters," it has not that convincing sincerity, to my mind, that it otherwise might have.

The next paper of instruction is to the secretaries and agents of the ward committee-rooms, and those instructions are very peculiar. They are signed by the conducting agents, and, therefore, they are a distinct, clear, and manifest adoption of all those ward committee-rooms. At once they enable me to sweep away all the arguments that have been most ingeniously urged out of all those cases, beginning at the earliest period of the last century, and coming down to the present moment, decided by Committees of the House of Commons, upon the question of recognition and adoption. Here, under the hands of the conducting agents, is a distinct and positive recognition of all the canvassers and all the ward committees, and their acts are just as much the acts of the conducting agents, as if they had been appointed by them, as if they had gone round to each of those wards and nominated every man on them, beginning at the president down to the honorary secretary. But what does this say? "You will reply to any person being a voter who applies for an appointment, that having regard to the Act of Parliament (a copy of which is posted in your committee-rooms), that such party cannot get employment for payment without involving the loss of his vote" (the word "payment" being italicised); "but if such voter be desirous of working and assisting the candidates, he must do so on the distinct understanding that he gives his services gratuitously, and without any promise of payment for same from the candidates, or any one on their behalf; and you will not employ any person whatsoever without the authority of the conducting agents." Now, at first sight, I am struck with the curious fact that a man comes to ask for employment for payment, and is told, "We cannot pay you for your work, but if you like to work gratuitously, we will employ you." Suppose, in the ordinary transactions of life, that a man were to come to my house and say, "Sir, I would wish to be employed as your carpenter; sir, I would wish to paint the walls of your house, or I would wish to put the slates on," and I were to say, "My good sir, I have a particular objection to paying anyone for any servile work; you may labour upon my house, but I have a conscientious objection to paying you for your labour; but, at the same time, if you are willing to come and do it for nothing, I am willing to employ you." Would not that be a strange proposition? Yet it appears to be about the suggestion which is made in that instruction, and carried out in that notable document, the "gratuitous service certificates" (signed by 385 electors), which Mr. Thomas Fell White, the solicitor, is modestly reluctant to take the credit of having originated.

Now I come to the instructions for the ward committees. The day of polling approaches, and here is the instruction: "Some members of each committee" (and this I thought and think disposes of that question raised and argued with great ability by Mr. McDonogh of collective responsibility) "should take charge exclusively of the freemen resident in the ward, and communicate all information regarding them to the head committee rooms." That is one instance of what I call the tender solicitude with which the freemen were regarded. "The committee will let the conducting agents have on or before the 31st October instant, a list of all such persons as they are well acquainted with and will recommend for discharging" (this, I think, very important) "the following duties at the ensuing election, namely, for poll and check-clerks and tally-agents" (I dwell upon that word for a reason, which will presently appear; the tally agent whom I at this moment have in my mind is William Watkins, and having just said that, I pass on), "stating opposite to each of their names what his peculiar capabilities for the office to which he is recommended are, as great care in the appointment of agents must be observed, having regard to the 8th section of the 31st & 32nd Vict. chap. 49," which is the section providing against the employment of voters for payment or reward six months before the election; and then it goes on, "Instructions for the day of polling. Polling commences at 8 o'clock a.m., and closes at 5 o'clock p.m. All freemen" (in large type) "poll in Green-street." "Those members of the committee who have undertaken the canvassing of the freemen" (thereby clearly showing that one of the principal duties of a member of the committee was to be a canvasser of the freemen) "resident in the ward should understand the incalculable importance of having them all sent up to the poll at Green-street, before 10 o'clock a.m. on the day of the polling, as also the necessity on receiving from the tally-rooms, in Green-street, from time to time, during the day, returns of unpolled freemen, of immediately thereupon sending agents to see that the unpolled freemen so returned are sent up forthwith." I heard once of a gentleman who, in reading a book, thought he would mark those passages which were most worthy of re-consideration. Here is a short passage in these instructions, and the person who penned it and who sent it for printing is so impressed with the extraordinary value of every word, that almost every word in it is italicised, or in large letters. "These members of the committee who have undertaken the canvassing of the freemen resident in the ward should understand the incalculable importance of having them all sent up to the poll at Green-street before 10 o'clock a.m. on the day of polling." That necessity of receiving returns of the unpolled freemen, the necessity of sending agents to see to the unpolled freemen, and the necessity ultra all of sending them up forthwith, were all italicised. Where was the incalculable importance of the freemen polling before 10 o'clock, and a householder not polling until 5 o'clock? Why is the lodger not of so great importance? My friend, Mr. McDonogh, in speaking of one or two shocking things that were proved against lodgers, dropped the expression, that the lodgers might sink even below the freemen. However, as far as the lodger franchise is concerned, happily, on this inquiry, I only detect a couple of cases of corruption as affecting them. But why, I say, is there this incalculable importance attached to having the freemen polled before 10 o'clock, and the householders, or rated occupiers, or lodgers, having the whole day to range over according to their pleasure? I merely call attention to that as, I think, constituting what I would call the atmosphere in which, at all events, a portion of this election contest was conducted.

Now I have given an account (longer than I indeed intended) of the general preparation for the great encounter; armies are arrayed, and chiefs are at their head upon each side, and one little thing alone remains to mention—possibly that which, in some minds, occupied the smallest space; possibly it may have affected, in some way, even those who were most disinterested. I refer to the fact that two agents for election expenses were appointed, both of them highly respectable, one being a member of the bar, and the other a member of the medical profession—both of them, I verily believe, incapable of doing the smallest thing which would be unworthy of a man of honour and a gentleman. One of them was Mr. Meredith, a member of the bar, who, I am satisfied, would not knowingly soil his fingers with anything which would approach in the slightest degree to any unworthiness; the other gentleman I do not know personally, but I have no reason to think that he is not deserving of equal commendation. But to them was to be entrusted what are commonly called the "sinews of war," and, beyond a doubt, they had been supplied in this case with no niggard hand. It is quite true, as was mentioned by Mr. Butt and Mr. McDonogh, that a vast sum of money was not deposited previous to the election; on the contrary, the greater portion of it has been paid since the election, and a very large portion of it even within a very recent period. Sir Arthur Guinness was called upon the table, and he gave his evidence as a high-minded and honourable gentleman, in a manner creditable to himself, and equally creditable to the good taste of those who had selected him to succeed his esteemed and respected parent. But Sir Arthur Guinness was not asked (and if he had been asked, I am certain he would have given a frank and immediate answer) whether he had intimated that there was a limit where he would stop, or whether he had told his election expenses agents that there was a limit beyond which he would not go. He was not asked, "Have you indicated to your agents that they are not to draw upon your purse beyond a certain amount?" Fortunately for himself, and those who were dependent upon him, his resources are believed to be very great. I can only draw from the circumstance that no such question was put by the able counsel in this case, who have conducted it with the utmost skill, the inference that the question was not asked because it would not have been favourably answered, and when he entered into that contest with all the chivalrous feelings of youth, with all that disregard of sordid pelf, which I believe, from his character, from his manner, and from his words, he entertains, I believe Sir Arthur Guinness fixed no limit in his own mind, except to pay whatever he was asked by his agents, legitimately appointed. That being so, then, this contest was entered upon with a distinct understanding that there was no limit placed upon the resources upon which the agents of Sir Arthur Guinness could rely. Accordingly a sum of 12,000 £. has been already carried to the credit of the two election expenses agents, Dr. Guinness Beatty and Mr. James Creed Meredith, solely for the purposes of the election, not mixed up with any other fund, such as the registration fund, to which I shall presently have occasion to refer, but confined entirely to the transactions of the election; and of that fund, 10,174 £. has been expended, and the rest has been carried back, only within a very few days, to the credit of Sir Arthur Guinness. But the statute has not been complied with; no full, clear, regularly drawn-out account of the whole of the election expenses has been furnished to the returning officer, that omission taking place in the teeth of a most critically-prepared section of the Act of Parliament; and to that extent the law has been defied, because what Mr. Meredith says is this, "You have in that book all the expenses." But what is there to tell me that when this inquiry is over scores of other canvassers, called to the scene of plunder (as I will call it) by the well-known profits of those who went before them, may not appear, and demand and receive many other thousands from the purse of Sir Arthur Guinness? But there is the fact that 10,174 £. has been expended up to this time upon this contest, for election election expenses pure. I use the word "pure," not in the sense of uncorrupt, but for election expenses exclusively.

Dublin City.

Is there any other expenditure? The preparation for the registration of this city and the registration itself was carried on during the months of September and October last year. There is a great Conservative party in this city, composed of gentlemen of the highest position, having great public interests to look to—men of wealth, with landed property, personal property, commercial enterprise, all interested in maintaining the constitutional rights of the country, and its steady advancement. For my part, I hope that we shall never see the day when there shall not be a Conservative party in the country. But they are as much interested in preserving the constitutional rights of electors, and more so than any other class in the community. Composed in a great measure of those gentlemen, a registration committee exists in this city, and it holds its meetings and has offices at No. 3, Dame-street. The secretary of that registration society is a gentleman of the name of Hodson. The Conservative party subscribed to its fund. Its proceedings are managed by an intelligent solicitor, a gentleman as to whom I have reason to know as a member of the bench, that he has found favour in the eyes of that body for his intelligence, and no doubt for his skill in his profession, and as a scholar. I believe he is a member of the university, and perhaps in sharper and more intelligent hands the management of the proceedings of that society could not be placed. The public, or those interested in the proceedings of that society, subscribed towards the funds of that society a sum of between 400 l. and 500 l., one individual contributing 100 l., the general public confining their pecuniary testimony to their interest in the cause to a sum of between 300 l. and 400 l. How is the rest of the fund made up? Sir Arthur Guinness gives in three or four cheques the vast sum of 3,850 l., in those months of September and October, to Mr. Goodman, who carries the whole of it to his private account in the bank—every farthing of it. Now, do not let me be misunderstood for a moment as insinuating that there is the slightest possibility of any malversation as regards that money on the part of Mr. Goodman. I do not believe anything of the kind; but suppose those things were done in other hands, what might they not lead to? Is money to be sown broadcast in that way? are we to expect that no corruption will follow? or is it not rather, as is said by the great poet of England—

"On a sudden open fly
Th' infernal doors.
She opened, but to shut
Exceeded her power."

Agree to scatter in this lavish way so large a sum as 13,000 l. or 14,000 l., and even if you were to stamp upon every 5 l. note that no man should use it for the purposes of corruption, corruption would still prevail. Here we have 15,850 l. taken out of the coffers of Sir Arthur Guinness within three months to sustain the interests of the great Conservative party of this city; and in what does it result? In bringing to the poll 5,587 electors who record their votes! Let me say that, putting both those sums together, it took within a fraction of 3 l. a man to register every voter who recorded his vote upon that eventful 18th of November in favour of Sir Arthur Guinness!

I have been referred to numerous cases which have been hunted out of the books which contain the decisions of Committees of the House of Commons, for which I entertain the greatest respect, as I do for the House of Commons in its collective capacity and in every way. But I have been referred to other cases of a more recent date, decided by the eminent judges who are trying these cases in England. Two of them, I am proud to mention, were members of our university, and one of them was a member of the Irish bar before he joined the profession in England. What does Mr. Baron Martin, with his strong sense, say, when dealing with the case of the electors of Bradford, who polled 19,000 men, that is just 8,000 more than the polling in the city of Dublin? I have not the means of knowing how many registered electors there are for Bradford, but I venture to say that if 19,000 came to the poll there are more than 21,000 electors; 19,000 and some odd hundreds were polled in Bradford on both sides, and there were but 11,000 in Dublin on both sides; 7,000 l. is expended in the borough of Bradford, and Mr. Baron Martin says that "it would be impossible to convince every man of common sense that such an expenditure could take place without corruption"; and he goes on to say, "that no election impeached upon that ground of general bribery and general expenditure of money alone could stand before any tribunal actuated by common sense and justice." If that was the opinion of that eminent judge upon an election petition tried within the last 14 or 15 days, what am I to say of an election in which 5,500 men are brought to the poll at an expense of something less than 16,000 l.? The electors in the one place predominate in number over the electors in the other in the proportion of more than three to two. The expenditure in the smaller place is more than double the expenditure in the larger place.

But this election is not to be governed by the rule which I laid down as clearly as I could in Drogheda, and which, I am happy to see, has been re-echoed by the judges in England, and notably by Sir James Willes, I think, in the Lichfield case. I said there, and I say now, that general bribery, without its being traced to the candidate, will invalidate the election. Why? Because there is a third party, too little thought of in these cases, but whose interests, let me say, I hope will soon be fully and entirely recognised—and that is the public. I say that general bribery will invalidate an election, even though it be not directly traceable to the candidate. I say that general treating will invalidate an election even though not directly traceable to the candidate; and I say, above all things, that general intimidation and undue influence, whether it is lay or ecclesiastical, whether it is by the ecclesiastic of one persuasion or the ecclesiastic of another, whether by the Protestant, Episcopalian, or Presbyterian, or the Roman Catholic, will upset every election; and I hope that at every election at which it is practised it will be so treated, until the parties who use it learn that their best game is to work with clean hands.

Dublin City.

But this election is not impeached upon any such general grounds. That case was not so opened. Probably the learned Counsel for the Petitioners, who has conducted his case with great ability, felt that he could not find evidence sufficient to sustain the charge of general bribery so as to invalidate the election, independently of the acts of the sitting Member or his agents.

But the election of Sir Arthur Guinness is impeached upon the distinct ground that, by himself and his agents, he has been guilty of specific acts of bribery, ranging within the two heads of charge which I have before mentioned. The first charge is what I will call primary or direct bribery; the other I may call consequential bribery, that is, the payment of the expenses of voters coming to the poll, contrary to the Act of Parliament in that case made and provided.

This leads me to the evidence in detail; and, as I wish to clear away matters as fast as possible, let me say that there is not a particle of foundation for even the most remote shadow of suspicion of any act of bribery, big or little, having been committed with the personal knowledge of Sir Arthur Guinness. Therefore, as far as his personal position, his personal character, and his personal acts are concerned, he is entitled to have, and he shall have from me, the most unqualified testimony that his hands are clean and his character unspersed by these proceedings with reference to bribery or corruption. But there remains the great case charged in the petition, namely, that, although giving no authority, but, on the contrary, disclaiming authority for any such purpose, there still have been employed on his behalf (to use the words of the statute), and acting on his behalf, persons who have compromised him, and with him the last election for the City of Dublin.

Now I proceed to deal with that branch of the case. These charges may be divided under two or three heads; the details are spread over 2,000 and more pages of manuscript. I have tried as far as I could to bring them into some sort of order, and I shall describe the first class and the most important one as that which connects itself with the Inn's Quay Ward, and especially with the transactions at 76, Capel-street. I think they involve ten specific charges of bribery—Kirk, Butler, Walker, Hagarty, Beckett, Bailey, the two Wilsons, father and son, Benjamin Cathrens, and Michael Steed. Those are, I think, all under that head, and I will presently deal with them. There is a most important class of cases to which I shall require to refer in some detail, more in the interests of the public than of the two contending parties here, and that is the class of cases which I will call Robinson's. They are persons who are alleged to have been dealt with by devious and crooked ways; guilt is always devious and crooked, innocence is straightforward. The lower vices, like the lower animals, crawl upon the ground, but it is all the more for the interests of the public that they should not be suffered to prevail because of any disinclination which we may have to come into contact with them. The third class comprises those which I will call "young Mr. Vance's cases," for that is the way in which they were described by the witnesses. The fourth class is that in which the charge of bribery could not probably, from the nature of the thing and the want of evidence, be maintained, but which throws a light upon the whole of the general transactions, and that is the circular, or circulars, with cards enclosed, which appear to have reached several of the electors of this city, and which being headed "strictly private," and referring to a former communication, directed them to write their names and addresses (adopting almost the vocabulary of the chamberlain or of the gentlemen in waiting) "legibly upon the enclosed card and present it at 3, Dame-street, two days after the election, to a person who would be there appointed to receive the same." Benjamin Warren's is the fifth class, and those comprise all the cases to which I have been able to direct my attention as having an important bearing against the sitting Member.

There are other cases not unimportant, but which I mean to clear away before I proceed further, as in my opinion they are either not proven or are displaced by the sitting Member and those who have been produced on his behalf. The first of those to which I shall refer is that of William Booth. He was the man who said that he was suborned in some way or practised upon by a man of the name of Tierney, of the "Express" office, and that he was brought over to Alderman Manning; and he says that having told the Alderman that he would expect to be paid, the Alderman said he should be "enumerated." I think that was the expression; I do not mean to enumerate that amongst the number of cases which I consider as proved upon this inquiry. I think that that is effectually disposed of by its own tale and by the very clear and distinct swearing of Alderman Manning. It is impossible to believe that Alderman Manning is so great a fool that to a fellow of this kind coming in and saying "I mean to be paid for my vote," he would reply, "You shall be remunerated."

The next case is that of Greer, which, from first to last, appeared to me to be fraught with suspicion. He told his tale about two men named Leech, and swore to the most direct and palpable bribery by Mr. Birch. If that ever took place I must believe that

Mr.

Mr. Birch was as wilful and corrupt a perjurer as ever appeared in a court of justice. That case I disbelieve; and therefore the sitting Member is entitled to my decision upon that charge.

The cases of Michael Kelly and James Doyle remain. Michael Kelly's is a very curious case. It is that of an agent going into the enemy's camp, and trusting a little too much in doing so. However, stranger things do happen. Warren is alleged to have given two letters to Michael Kelly, and one of those is delivered to its destination, and the other is handed over to Mr. Fitzgerald. Those letters are not produced, and could not be proved, but at all events it is sufficient for me now to say, as I observe Mr. Baron Martin says, that "it is not necessary at all for a judge, unless he thinks proper, to do more than a jury, and to give reasons for his decisions in every particular instance." I do not think Kelly's case proved.

As regards the case of James Doyle, who brings in the name of Mr. Ledger Erson, who was a member of a committee, and an active partisan, no doubt, of Sir Arthur Guinness, I think that is a very weak case, directly met by Mr. Erson's contradiction, and I should not like to rely upon it.

I now come to a case of a very different description, which I will also dispose of before I arrive at my ultimate decision, and that is the case of the freeman William Dalton. That man is alleged to have been bribed by means of Mr. Caulfield, who is the governor of the Four Courts Marshalsea, and has been so for very many years. Dalton is a freeman steeped in poverty; that is a conceded fact, else he would not have been immured in prison for 15 months for the paltry sum of, I think, 11 l. 1 s. 6 d. He is in the custody of Mr. Caulfield, who holds an important public employment. Some of the very highest people in the country are, by special provisions of Acts of Parliament and resolutions of the House of Commons, forbidden to meddle with elections. A peer of the realm, unless he is an Irish peer who has a seat in the House of Commons, has no right to interfere in an election. Lord Lieutenants of counties are forbidden to use their influence at elections; and, in England, the military, strictly speaking, ought to be removed from towns during elections, and sometimes are so removed. Undue influence is forbidden by law, and is a high crime. If a clergyman uses it, to put the strongest case, he is visited, and deserves to be visited, with the severest reprobation. "If you are strong, be merciful." The greater the influence the more cautiously it ought to be used. I say, then, it is a scandal that the governor of the Four Courts Marshalsea, should be playing the part of a committee-man at an election, and a trafficker in votes with those who are under his control. But Mr. McDonogh said, trying to break the fall of these matters as much as he could, though I am perfectly certain he is as sensible as any one in court of the limits of propriety and impropriety in such transactions, that Dalton was an honest man, and would repay Mr. Caulfield, and that Mr. Caulfield was a generous man and a charitable man, and that it was for that reason that he advanced this sum of money to liberate "poor Dalton," who had been in his custody, unthought of, for 15 months. When did this ray of charity and benevolence first dawn upon the mind of Mr. Caulfield? When did it first concern him to be solicitous about the payment of debts which were not his own? On the day before the polling for the city of Dublin! The poor lady to whom this small debt was owing is solicited to come to the Marshalsea. She is met by the Marshal; she is met by her debtor, and she is induced to sign a release. I am told that the debt had been brought down from 11 l. to 4 l. by payments from time to time. That is a very curious circumstance; but assuming it to be the fact, she signed a release for 4 l. to liberate this man. It is drawn by Mr. Caulfield, and it is authorising himself to release the man. I have heard before now of the governor of a prison being in his own custody, and of a warrant ordering him to keep himself in close keeping. In the curious history of this country, we sometimes come across some such enigmatical contradiction; but here is a warrant drawn by the man himself, telling him to discharge the prisoner as soon as he has received from the prisoner the debt; and he pays the debt himself! It is said, that was all charity, and had nothing to do with the vote. But there is a light thrown upon it by Mr. Caulfield's own evidence. Why did he not liberate the man then and there? If he was to lend the money, why did he not then and there do it, and pay the money to the lady? He does not pay it until the 21st of November, three days after the election. At what hour does this Dalton vote? To use his own description, he cannot tell the hour, but it was very nearly dark, and I suppose, on the 18th of November, we may believe that it was approaching very near the termination of the election. What does Mr. Caulfield himself say? he goes in the morning to Mr. Waller, who is one of the principal gentleman employed in the great establishment of Guinness & Son, in James-street, hard by the Marshalsea, and he says, "I have got a voter, who is a Conservative, in my custody, and if you like, you may have him." That is the expression which he uses. "If you want the Conservative voter you may have him, but to have him there is 4 l. to be paid, and I do not mind, if you want him, paying it, for he is an honest man." What a curious mixture there is there of business and charity! With one voice he says, "This is a poor honest fellow, I am anxious to liberate him." With another voice, he says, "He is a Conservative voter, and if you like, you may have him, but you must come for him, and you must take him on a car, and you must bring him back on a car." Dalton remains at the prison that night; but I make nothing of that, for I dare say many of those poor fellows who are so long in prison do not know where to find a home at night; but to tell me that this was all benevolence or charity on the part of Mr. Caulfield, would be an insult to my understanding, as I have no doubt it would be to many of those gentlemen who still felt it their duty to press that view of the case. I confess that this case has cost me very serious and anxious consideration, and although, with no small difficulty, I have come to the decision that I do not see my way conclusively to find that William Dalton was bribed by the hands of Mr. Caulfield, and fortunate it is for Mr. Caulfield that I do not, yet, I say, that it is a transaction which trembles upon the very line which separates charity from corrupt inducement. It is not for Mr. Caulfield under such circumstances to assume the tone of affronted innocence, as he did upon the table here when cross-examined by counsel; I told him that counsel was far and away within the limits of his professional privilege. The fact that I have been long and anxiously considering his case, is the best evidence I can give that it was within that limit.

Having disposed of those cases as to which I am prepared to say that the petitioner has failed, I now approach those four heads of charge to which I have already specially alluded. First, as to the transactions at 76 Capel-street, and the evidence thereon. Now I said that this working committee of the Inn's Quay threw a light upon the whole of those transactions. It is the only committee in which, as I said before, there is a working committee; and the persons whom you would naturally expect to be most active on behalf of Sir Arthur Guinness are there, notably his own private secretary. I do not say that he has had, directly or indirectly, anything to do with corrupt practices, but he is there. Mr. Norwood, the barrister, was on that committee; he was in court during a portion of this trial; he was the chairman of that committee; that committee and its doings were impeached more than any other part of this case, but he never was put into the chair. Mr. Foster, the grand contriver (for I will not hesitate to describe him as being, and if my mind does not deceive me, before I close my observations I shall demonstrate that he was such), is not called, except by the petitioner and the court, and by them is called in vain. I called him in the interests of justice; I called him to give him a locus penitentiae; if guilty, it was to enable him to say something ad misericordiam, if nothing else. Nothing is heard of him except a certificate, which I am taken to task for calling an unverified certificate. Every lawyer knows that every certificate which is not proved as to its handwriting, and as to its truth in matter and substance, is an unverified certificate, and cannot be taken as verified in any court of justice. That may soothe the susceptibility of that gentleman who is so indignant that his certificate, without his testimony, should be called unverified. The very absence of Mr. Foster should have made the sitting Member's counsel, if they could do so with prudence, produce everything which could throw a light upon the transactions of Mr. Foster. The absence of Mr. Davenport Crosthwaite was another circumstance which ought to have thrown them upon expanding wide every means of information; but, instead of that, neither Mr. Lawler nor Mr. Hall, who is the superintendent of this working committee, imported, as I have said, not from the committee itself but from outside the committee, is called; nor is Mr. W. W. Barton, solicitor, produced, who is made the chairman of that working committee, having been recommended to the head agents by Mr. Bradburne, the private secretary of Sir Arthur Guinness. On the contrary, the conducting agents say they do not know of any such solicitor as Mr. Barlow. I do not deny that Mr. Foster is ill; he may be ill; but all I know, and all I say, is, that it has been made very plain to me that his absence is caused by the fear of this inquiry. If it were not so, then it was incumbent upon those who are acting for the sitting Member to produce member after member of Mr. Foster's family (who were proved to be within call of this court-house, this inquiry lasting over nine days) to show me that he was not absent from that cause, but that he was absent because of illness, over which he had no control whatsoever. But what turns out on examining the evidence? The man who went to Foster's house, upon the morning of the 26th, says that he was told at the house that Foster had left for England upon the previous day, namely the 25th. This court having commenced its proceedings upon the 23rd, and the whole case having been opened here on the 23rd, Foster flies upon the morning of the 25th. Does any one expect that I am to be deceived by such a flimsy pretence as that? Again, during the progress of the trial, another effort is made to subpoena this man so absent. And what are we told? The lady at the house says that he is gone to France. Scarcely is the evidence given when a lady, I suppose the very same lady, his sister, deposits in the box at the Registry Office, from which it is brought here within 15 minutes, a letter purporting to be written by that identical Mr. Foster, which is dated from Torquay, in Devonshire. Where is Mr. Foster? "Echo answers, 'Where'!" No attempt is made by the sitting Member to produce him. He is in the rank of a gentleman; he holds a public office, though how long he will continue to hold it is another thing. He is known to Sir Arthur Guinness, who met him on one occasion (though I lay no stress on that) at the Inn's Quay committee. He is not a member of the Amicable Club, but Sir Arthur Guinness thought he was, and, moreover, thought he had met him there at dinner. Whether they receive strangers or not, I do not know, but if they do, it may account for the fact that Sir Arthur Guinness was under the impression that he met him there; but Sir Arthur Guinness, giving his evidence with every frankness, and concealing nothing (I should be glad to repeat that as often as possible—I am convinced that he concealed nothing), said that he believed that Mr. Foster was a member of that club, that he had met him there at a dinner. That institution, like many other institutions in the country, is for loyal and social purposes. Sir Arthur Guinness mentioned that Colonel Taylor, the Member for the county of Dublin, and many other gentlemen of rank and position in the country, are members of it; therefore it was no discredit to meet Mr. Foster there. But all those are circumstances that that would make it the more important that this Court should have been supplied with every possible information as to what had become of Mr. Foster, and where he was; but no such thing was attempted. This Mr. Foster is a committee-man and canvasser. He is enjoined to canvass, and he does canvass, and he has three men upon whom he relies; as to two of them, Mr. Heron called attention to the fact that they came very characteristically from a mad-house—a lunatic asylum. Those were, I think, Kempe and Noblett, from Dr. Duncan's lunatic asylum. Foster, who is an officer in the Registry Office, is very particular in recording his attendances; and by a reference to the book kept in the Registry Office, and entered by himself, he appears to have been only absent on the eventful day of the contest, from 11 to 12 o'clock. It is always desirable that a pure man shall be able to show that he is absent from where impurity has been perpetrated, and accordingly, but for the ray of light, which finds its entrance into 76 Capel-street, we should have been all under the impression that Mr. Foster was attending to his duties in Henrietta-street the whole day of the election, except for the short period when he was allowed to go and record his vote. But such are the erring means by which we sometimes arrive at our conclusions. Foster was in no such way engaged, for having the previous evening arranged with Watkins, Kempe, and Noblett to meet them in Dorset-street at early morning, Foster consigns those three men to the front parlour of 76 Capel-street; he visits them to see how they were getting on between 11 and 12 o'clock. It is no great distance from Henrietta-street to 76 Capel-street, and he went, anxious that their health should not suffer by too much confinement, about 10 minutes after the close of the poll, to tell them that their vocation was gone. What more? Mr. Foster, well knowing Mr. Forrest, who is one of the principal printers for this great election, and who is entered in this book in a very remarkable manner, as being the owner of the house at 76 Capel-street, goes to him and says, "I shall to-morrow want two rooms, a front and back parlour; I shall want them for a friend of mine, Mr. Marquis, who is to carry on there some very important commercial business." We must assume that, because Mr. Foster got labels printed to the number of 25, upon which he had carefully printed "Offices of Mr. Marquis," he received them from Mr. Forrest; he paid for them with other circulars which he got printed, to which I will presently call attention, one of them being that relating to 3 Dame-street, and he said, "I will call in the morning, and you will give me possession of the two rooms"; and Forrest, being interested in the cause, said, "By all means, I agreed for a pound note for the use of the two rooms, even at the risk of disturbing another gentleman, named Donaldson, who was over on business in connection with steam engines." Forrest roused him and told him he should be up at once, that there was a very early bird coming there, and he should make way for him accordingly. Mr. Foster engages the rooms and gets those labels, and Marquis appears in the morning. "Mr. Marquis's Offices" are put on the door, and he has with him a young gentleman, who seems to have been fashionably attired, and they go into the bed-room, and in the bed-room they stay the whole day. They do not even look for any refreshment, but they keep the door locked, and are there the entire day, while Foster's other satellites—those three men, namely, Watkins, Kempe, and Noblett—are posted in the next room, two of them not being able to read or write; but all most attentively listening to Watkins whilst he is perusing the list of the county of Dublin electors. To prevent their being disturbed in those studies, a chest of drawers is taken out of the bed-room and placed between them and the cross door. A young man is in the hall, and during the day the transactions take place to which I will presently refer.

Now I think it is established, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that Mr. Foster, the member of the Inn's Quay Ward committee, the gentleman who proposed to establish the working committee, the gentleman who was a member of that working committee, was the person who plotted, who laid the plan for, who designed the whole of this transaction at 76 Capel-street, where, as I shall presently determine, beyond yea or nay, ten men, now known by name, were bribed. Mr. Butt, with that frankness which characterises him in discussing any question of law or fact, said that "it did not admit of a doubt that bribery of the most flagitious kind had prevailed there"; and either Watkins or Kempe, when examined, says that at least 30 men went behind that chest of drawers which they called a screen, presented a ticket at the opening in the panel, and received from an unknown hand an envelope, which in every case contained a 5*l.* note, after they had voted for Sir Arthur Guinness.

Now, Foster having so contrived this transaction, who are the men whom he employs? I am told that Foster is not an agent, because he is only a committee-man; but I have shown that, independent of all cases, by the acts of the conducting agents of Sir Arthur Guinness, every member of this committee is solicited to be a canvasser, and not a canvasser in the sense of merely asking "How are you going to vote"? It was said by Mr. McDonogh that it would be hard to hold a candidate liable for the acts of such a man; and I agree with Mr. McDonogh, that those are questions of degree, and that common sense must have play in such matters. But here are the committee, who are solicited and urged to canvass, and to take care of the freemen, and are warned of the incalculable importance of bringing them up. Certainly that was within the rule laid down by Mr. Justice Willes at Windsor; within the rule laid down by Mr. Baron Martin at Norwich; and within the rule laid down by Mr. Justice Blackburn at Bewdley. There is not the shadow of a doubt that a canvasser of this description is to the fullest extent capable, if he transgresses the law, of making the candidate liable. I do not say under an indictment, nor for the penalties which are imposed by the Act of Parliament, if they are sued for in a court of justice, but for the Parliamentary consequences of their acts; and why? According to my mind, because it is for the public weal that a man shall not hold that which he has obtained by the very corruption of which the public have a right to complain. Otherwise, what would prevail? I said that if 105 votes were taken from Sir Arthur Guinness and added to the poll of Sir Dominick Corrigan, the whole position of the election would be reversed; but if Sir Arthur Guinness were not held accountable for Foster's acts, Foster might be proved to have put into the hand of every one of those men a 5*l.* note, their 105 votes would be the votes which place Sir Arthur Guinness at the head of the poll, and yet he should hold that which was obtained by those very means, which Mr. Locke said, "cuts at the fountain of public security," tampering with voters; which Sir William Blackstone one century ago called "The infamous practice of bribery," adding, "Nothing is wanted to put it down except resolution and integrity to put the law in execution."

But if that were not sufficient to make this Foster an agent, as I consider it amply did, who is Watkins? The period which has intervened has enabled me to look over those books, and what do I find? "William Watkins, canvasser, 4*l.*" In some respects this book is a melancholy book, in other respects I protest it is as amusing as a light novel. The rapidity with which merit and desert is rewarded, and how men grow, if not in wisdom, certainly in fortune, during the few days which precede a contested election, never was more happily illustrated than by the pages of this volume. A man who commences with a guinea has his merit rapidly seen, and he is a 30*s.* man. Then his great energy and capacity are properly considered, and he mounts to three guineas, and again he goes to six guineas. The inverse proportion with which those calculations are made is perfectly startling. But Watkins is a canvasser at 4*l.*, and the very same Watkins is a tally agent at 1*l.* 1*s.*

Now, I called attention in the instructions to the words, "Tally agents," and I said, in connection with that, I would mention the name of Watkins. What is the business of a tally agent? It is to bring voters to the poll upon the day of polling. I do not doubt that Watkins could have been a tally agent upon that day. In one sense he was worth a dozen tally agents; he was guarding the outer room in which at least 30 or 40 voters were paid the price of their voting for Sir Arthur Guinness immediately after they had given their vote; but whether he is a tally agent or not, in any case he is a canvasser, and he is a canvasser employed by the committee-man who proposes the appointment of the working committee, of which he is himself a member, in conjunction with the names which I have mentioned, one of them being the private secretary of Sir Arthur Guinness. I can entertain no doubt that Sir Arthur Guinness ought to be bound by the acts of Henry Foster and his subordinate Watkins; but then, if they are the agents of Sir Arthur Guinness, this election is gone; I might close the book. One single case of bribery, if established and brought home to the sitting Member or his agents, is sufficient to avoid an election. Why? Because it is for the public interest that a man who bribes, or whose agents bribe, should not continue to represent the constituency. If the candidate has nothing at all to do with the bribery, even by himself or his agents, if the constituency is permeated by general corruption, he shall lose his seat. Why? Because the great public weal is of more importance than the sacrifice to which he as a member of the public is obliged to submit.

But it does not stop there. What are Mr. Foster's doings before this contest? There are two men out of those ten who appear to be rather interesting members of the class to which they belong; one of them is William Walker, and the other of them is William Beckett. Beckett is a man who repudiates the idea of receiving a bribe; Beckett was, and is, and always will be, as he told us, a sincere member of the Conservative party, so far as giving his vote at an election goes; but Walker, who also supported Sir Arthur Guinness at the election, says that he went to the ward-rooms in Dorset-street, that is, the Inn's Quay Ward. I take it he identifies them by saying that he saw there the secretary, Mr. Falkner, one of the three secretaries, and to him he applied for employment. He received the usual answer, "I cannot employ you for money, but we will employ you without money." Higher people than he appear to have acted in the same way. There are solicitors in this case who were paid for their services, and perhaps a more portentous birth than any we are acquainted with are solicitors who actually act without pay. So did Walker. He says he saw Mr. Foster there at the committee-rooms, and he saw Mr. Lawler there, and Mr. Falkner; and he heard from Beckett (this is a curious word which appears to pervade a good deal of this evidence) that "all would be right." That is an observation which may be very innocently used. We may all think that there is a millenium of grace approaching, where everything will be right in the world. Walker, who is one of those thinking and reflecting men of whom Mr. Dickens, in his admirable work, speaks as "never making up their minds until the last moment of an election," said he would rather have the thing from Foster himself; and, accordingly, he comes to Foster's house with Beckett, and Foster said "he would be all right." But still Walker appeared to hesitate, and he said "he could not say anything more to him than he had already said to Beckett," that "all would be right"; "they might depend upon it that all would be right," and accordingly he voted early in the day in favour of Sir Arthur Guinness.

That is the second of what I would call the exploits at this election of Mr. Foster. But does it end there? Mr. Foster is evidently a man who is capable of giving advice; and and he, instead of going to the committee-rooms to get information and assistance, appears to have moved in an orbit of his own, and minor lights came to him in order that they might be instructed. Accordingly, Mr. William Johnstone, who performs no mean part in these transactions in one sense (no trifling part perhaps I should say, recalling the word "mean"), goes to Foster early in the case, to do what? To see if he, William Johnstone, could make himself of any use in the approaching election. Is Mr. William Johnstone an agent for Sir Arthur Guinness? I have heard the counsel for Sir Arthur Guinness maintain that Mr. William Johnstone was not an agent for Sir Arthur Guinness. He described himself as the assistant of Mr. Sutton and Mr. Williamson and Mr. Thomas Fell White. He had a special room allotted to him at the head committee-rooms in Dame-street. He had placed under him that excellent man who gave his testimony so clearly and so honourably, Mr. Rudolphus Mortimer. He had associated with him Mr. J. B. Fraser, as a clerk.

That is the second act of Mr. Foster as regards those transactions; and out of that appointment of Mr. Johnstone comes the second class of what I call constructive bribery, namely, the payment of voters made upon a promise conditional on the voter coming up to vote for Sir Arthur Guinness. So that if on the one part Foster is shown to be the active agent, prime mover, designer, and conspirer in the direct acts of bribery which took place at 76, Capel-street, he is the first person who brings Johnstone on the scene, who is made the agent of Sir Arthur Guinness in his head committee-rooms, assisting his principal conducting agents, and the office is given to him out of which his constructive bribery naturally arises, namely, his being told off for the purpose of managing the out-voters. Does it stop there? It does not. Mr. Johnstone comes upon the table, and a melancholy spectacle he was. Sometimes men are driven to shame by being contradicted by a host of witnesses. Sometimes a man's evidence is displaced by evidence from the other side, but this does not belong to that category. Driven by hard necessity, the counsel of Sir Arthur Guinness, after Mr. William Johnstone had been examined, and gone down off the table in such a plight as I do not want to describe, were compelled to produce an independent witness to prove that every word which Mr. Johnstone had sworn was false. I am not putting this evidence one scintilla beyond what it is. Mr. Johnstone swore that there were masses of letters received from out-voters. One person, that worthy man, Mr. Mortimer, from whom, if he had known all the truth, we should have had it, said that 460 letters were received in that office from time to time on this business.—"Where are the letters?" is the question to Mr. Johnstone. "I do not know." "Are you positive you do not know?"—"Positive." "What became of them?"—"They were in a box." "What became of the box?"—"I do not know." "Can you form no opinion?"—"None whatsoever." Before he left the table he admitted that he had told Mr. Bond that he wished this box to be taken away, but he persisted in still saying that he did not know where they were. The next morning Sir Arthur Guinness's agents produced Robinson, the clerk of Bond. It was startling, I believe, to everybody who was not prepared by previous information. Robinson said, "I have the box; I got it from Mr. Johnstone; he told me to take it; he has the key of it; he examined it after he left court here upon the last day;" and Mr. Johnstone is recalled, and admits the whole thing. Can any rational beings be deluded by such pretences? He asks me to believe that the box is in the same state in which it was when he placed it in the hands of Robinson, confessing that, after he had given that evidence upon the table here, he had gone to the box, taken out of it quantities of papers, and replaced some of them; and he expects me to believe it is now in the same state, though he had sworn he did not know of the existence of the box, whilst he had the key of it in his very pocket.

The telegrams are produced to this Mr. Johnstone, and are put into his hands; and what does he say about them? First, he says that he does not know them at all; he does not know the handwriting. Somehow or other it turns out that two of them, at least, are in his own handwriting, and then he swears that only two of them are. I took them up here upon the desk, and travelling over them I at once saw that there was at least one other of them in the same handwriting, and all of them are very like, though disguised. They are put into his hand again, and he admits that the third is in his writing, but that, of course, he knows nothing about the others. Mr. McDonogh, in opening the case for the defendant, could not have known anything of these matters, because he characterised the transaction at 76, Capel-street as an infamous plant; he characterised the transaction at 3, Dame-street as one of the vilest conspiracies that ever was hatched by men to destroy the fair fame and reputation of a young and distinguished gentleman. What turns out to be the case? Fraser is produced, who confesses that ten of those telegrams are in his handwriting. Mr. Mortimer says he brought other telegrams to the office. The course of business was to take the telegrams to the office, and every one of those telegrams sent in the false name of "John Wilson Johnstone" is traced to the office of Mr. William Johnstone, who is appointed assistant agent of Sir Arthur Guinness, and who has been introduced into this foul quagmire of corruption by Mr. Henry Foster. What does that man say in answer to the question, "Who is John Wilson Johnstone?" On his oath, he swears unblushingly that he does not know. Aye, but there is great danger in this. There are honourable men who are excited by elections, and who, if, when acting under excitement, they do a rash thing, or even a criminal thing, feel that there is some principle of honour left to compel them to admit their fault. Such is Mr. Alma, an honourable member of his profession. He came upon the table, and he is asked whether he knows anything about these transactions, and he at once shook his head, and said, "I do." I dare say he much regrets that he had any hand in those transactions, but when a man commits a fault (and we are all erring mortals), what can he do but admit it, and feel and express regret? Mr. Johnstone swore that he did not know who was the pretended John Wilson Johnstone. Why, he knew it as well as he knew his own name, that it was Davenport Crosthwaite. Who gave him the first idea of that transaction? Who whispered in his ear that it was desirable to practise one of those things, to engage in what Mr. Burke calls one of the "serpent vices"?

I am now taking those things stage by stage, and step by step, travelling through the whole of the case. Who first introduced Davenport Crosthwaite upon the scene? He also has left this country, I suppose for the benefit of his health. No account of him is given. He, at all events, is a member of the Amicable Club, and he is a member of the committee of the Royal Exchange Ward, as is proved by the document to which Mr. Heron referred me this morning. He is one of that society established for loyal and for social purposes, of which Sir Arthur Guinness is a member. He did not require any introduction, according to his rank in life, for any honourable engagement, and, accordingly, we do not find him going to Sir Arthur Guinness to recommend him to his agents. But who is the person who does recommend him to Mr. Wilson Johnstone? Mr. Wilson Johnstone says he first made his acquaintance on the introduction of Mr. Henry Foster. He came to his office, and he produced to him an envelope directed to Mr. Johnstone, and with the name of Henry Foster on the margin. Therefore, I say, that through every part of this case, through every part of these illegal transactions, you find the trail of Henry Foster.

At first Mr. McDonogh, struggling against difficulties, tried to limit the number of those voters who were bribed at 76 Capel-street to 10; but it came out from Watkins and the two other men, Kempe and Noblett, that at least 10 went in in the first two hours behind the screen where the money was given out. I find that a man of the name of Noblett (I do not know whether he is the same or not) is down on the counter page to that on which Watkins appears, and he receives payment. It comes out that at least 30 went in; but, says Mr. Butt, "There, at all events, the corruption terminated, and there is not a particle of evidence that it extended beyond that." Is that so?—Why did Mr. Foster get 25 labels with the words "offices of Mr. Marquis" printed off? He had printed off labels upon which were "offices of Mr. Marquis." As to Mr. Marquis being in existence, or whether he is some other Davenport Crosthwaite, or John Wilson Johnstone, or some other person of that kind, no human being can tell; but he gets 25 labels printed, and he takes them with him, and he puts upon one place, which has been discovered, the label of "Mr. Marquis's offices," and he puts up in that one room three or four or five of them, it all being a perfect piece of legerdemain. But he still carries with him the remainder of those labels. It is not in proof that there was any other "76" in Abbey-street, or Britain-street, or Talbot-street, or any other place in the city adjoining the polling booths; and if it stood upon that supposition in that way without evidence, of course I could not pronounce adversely to the sitting Member; but if I had a jury assisting me in this case, and if I left to them the question whether these labels were not printed for other rooms, I believe that any 12 gentlemen of sense in the community would come to the conclusion that they were; 30 or 40 voters were directly bribed in 76, Capel-street, to induce them to vote, or in consequence, of voting for Sir Arthur Guinness. May not some one or two batches of 30 or 40 have been bribed in one or two other places selected as "the offices of Mr. Marquis" by Henry Foster, and then might not the citizens of Dublin fairly conclude that the representation of their city was snatched from their hands, not by legitimate, but by illegitimate and corrupt means?

It is said by Mr. McDonogh that Kirk voted without any previous communication. That is not the case. That was a mistake on Mr. McDonogh's part. If Kirk was speaking the truth, he was addressed before he voted by Campbell, who asked him what he would give him if he got him 5*l*.; who told him that money was going, and who told him that a card would be put into his hand, and who gave him the number "76, Capel-street." It seems, if this man is speaking the truth, that a card was put into his hand. By whom? By a young gentleman. Every witness deposes that the cards were put into their hands by young gentlemen. It is a very remarkable circumstance, not as imputing any intention to corrupt to the gentlemen who conduct this case for Sir Arthur Guinness, but I say, as tending to corroborate the story told by those 10 men, that Mr. Thomas Fell White, who is an agent for Sir Arthur Guinness, as confidential as Mr. Sutton himself, though acting under Mr. Sutton, says "Mr. Sutton, Mr. Williamson, and I appointed a number of young men to bring the freemen to their booths." The freemen say that they were addressed by young men. Kirk says that a young man preceded him whilst Campbell followed him and pointed out to him the booth, and when he came out slipped a ticket into his hand. Is it true that he got the ticket? Were the tickets going? Were they railway tickets? Now I corrected Mr. Hemphill on the last day, and I was wrong in correcting him; I said that that young man Hawkins, who was in the hall, and who was employed by Mr. Forrest, did not say that they were railway tickets, but that they were tickets. On going through the evidence, I find that I have erroneously corrected Mr. Hemphill, whose better memory made him more accurate, and that Hawkins in the employment of Forrest, the printer, who is in the employment of Sir Arthur Guinness and his zealous partizans, said that the men who came to the door had all of them railway tickets. Is that corroboration?

It is said, and truly said, that those men were all acting under the influence of money; they they had been offered rewards; hopes had been held out to them. They expected to make, what was to them, a little fortune, if they can establish this case for the Petitioner. That is true; if a jury were here to consider their evidence they would take that into account, and allow it to have weight in determining the conclusion at which they should arrive; and I, in the complex position of judge and jury, am bound to consider that circumstance and to give it weight; and if the evidence were doubtful and were not corroborated, and if the story was not in itself sustained by every description of evidence which can give weight to testimony, if it stood alone and unsupported, it would be our duty to reject it. The money is offered. The parties acting for the Petitioners have been obliged to have recourse to these means; but I must say that for an impure means it could not have been placed in purer or safer hands than those of Mr. Fitzgerald; and that I know is the feeling of the gentlemen upon both sides of this Court. It is necessary often for the ends of justice to have recourse to such means; our laws authorise it. When crimes are committed, it is one of the means of detection. Offers are every day made by the authority of the rulers of this country to persons who will give information which will lead to the detection of crime. The very Acts of Parliament under which I am sitting here to-day hold out inducement to obtain such information. How? Because, whilst they proclaim penalties against persons who are guilty of those offences, they also provide that, if you give your evidence to the satisfaction of the Court, you shall receive a certificate of indemnity. Every reader of Roman history will recollect that through the ages which mark the most glorious period of the Republic of Rome, there was one continuous struggle carried on against bribery; it being felt by the greatest and the most virtuous men who ever adorned that State that if bribery were not put down bribery would destroy the Republic; and accordingly by the Julian law, the law de ambitu, it was provided that whilst a man forfeited all his civil rights and privileges by the commission of bribery, if he disclosed the facts, and brought to justice any other person who had been guilty of bribery, he was restored to his position.

Am I, with such precedents as these in the laws, ancient and modern, and in the very Acts of Parliament under which I sit here, altogether to reject the evidence of those witnesses because they admit themselves to be participators in the corruption? Perhaps I put the law too strongly when I told Mr. McDonogh that he might consider them in the light of accomplices, and that so they would require to be corroborated; but for the purposes of this inquiry I do not withdraw that observation, because I say that if this were a trial for felony they have been sufficiently corroborated. What is the corroboration of Kirk? In the first place, he says he got a five pound note and he went with it to the printing office, where he was employed, I think Mr. O'Toole's printing office, and there he sees Moloney, Donne, Johnstone, and Mr. O'Toole. A noise arises in the office, and Mr. O'Toole, the proprietor of the establishment, rushes in and asks what it is all about, and they all cry out, "It's the money he got for voting;" and he produces the five pound note eo instanti. That is the cotemporary evidence. What takes place; the most natural thing in the world, "Ill got, ill gone." The man who took the bribe proceeds to spend it in drink upon his fellow-workmen; he goes down to Ryan's public-house to give a general treat to them all, and he produces the five pound note at Ryan's public house and pays for the treat; and the man who changed the five pound note for him upon that identical day is produced here and proves it. But he acted as canvasser and had a card. He says he gave that the following day to Johnstone; and if this case stood upon that evidence about the card and the three men, Mr. McDonogh's observations would have great force, impeaching the testimony of Kirk, and I should be probably obliged to say there, as I have said in other cases, "Not proven." He tells us that he was very drunk and he gave this card to Johnstone, and Johnstone went to the committee-room. He says there were a number of gentlemen there, and he got a card and was told to go down to Mr. Byrne's of Lombard-street, and that he went to the private entrance of Mr. Byrne's house, he having a pawn office adjoining, and that after waiting a few minutes and looking in, and seeing something like a desk or a table, whether on the left or the right he cannot say, he got 3 l., and vanished with it and gave it to Kirk, who says he got it. What interest has Johnstone in telling us that story? Was it to supplement Kirk's testimony? Was not Kirk's testimony complete without it? If Kirk stopped with the five pound note it was unimpeachable. I admit that it is susceptible of very grave and serious observation, and that if I disbelieved the whole of that transaction it might throw some doubt upon the previous testimony. That is the way in which it is put by the counsel for the sitting Member. But on the other hand I am not to lose sight of the surrounding circumstances; may he be mistaken in some of the circumstances, and be speaking truth as to the main fact? May he be depositing to some other house? I am only putting the possibility; may he have taken some other entrance to be the entrance of Mr. Byrne's of Lombard-street; may he be merely mistaken as to the day? Mr. Byrne is called as a witness. He is the active partizan of Sir Arthur Guinness. Let not that tell against his veracity; I do not think that it should. His wife is called as a witness; her testimony is unimpeached. The servant, who was engaged in the house that very day, is called, and she too speaks to circumstances which are inconsistent with the testimony of Johnstone. One of the clerks in the pawn office, and one only is produced; two others are not produced. But the family of Byrne have been seriously active in this matter. A large sum of money has found its way amongst them, 45 l. or 35 l. for printing lists, and 100 l., which I will not refer to any further. A sharp and active young fellow might do a good deal of mischief which it might be very hard to identify afterwards. I will say no more; I believe the evidence of Kirk, although it is contradicted by the testimony of Campbell; but the evidence as to the transaction of Johnstone should have been exhausted by the evidence of the other two clerks, one of whom was at Newbridge, only 20 miles from the city of Dublin. They should have been produced and put upon the table before I could be asked altogether to discredit the charge.

Let me take the case of Butler, and deal with that. He says that he breakfasted with Beckett; that is admitted. He went with Beckett to the poll; that is admitted. He says Beckett told him that if anything was going he would get it for him. Beckett is the friend of Foster, and he brought William Walker to Foster's house. Mark that! Butler swears that he got the 5*l.* note, he and Beckett entering the house at the same time; that both their wives followed them; that they went out backwards, and rejoined their wives in front; that they went past 76, Capel-street. He denies that they went into 76, Capel-street, but he admits that the party of four (and it is before me as clearly as if it were photographed) went on that day, of all others, to buy two new hats, which neither of them intended to wear, and did not remove from the hatters until four days afterwards, to Castle-street, where Beckett changed a 5*l.* note, as is proved by the clerk of the gentleman in whose house the hats were bought. After that they proceeded, still in company with each other, to another part of the city, and they came down to Bolger's, another public-house in Henry-street, and there the whole party are assembled, and Butler treats them as they had treated him at Judge's, I think on Cork-hill, and he produces another 5*l.* note, and it is changed for them, and the price of the treat is taken out of it. Is that all? The shopman who changed the 5*l.* note said, "I asked him, when he handed me the 5*l.* note, had he voted; and he laughed." What is more, that same clerk, whose name is Thomas Brady, proves that he changed, upon the identical day of the election, three 5*l.* notes for Cathrens, another of the bribed men, for Butler, the man to whom I am alluding, and for Hagerty, and Beckett, who denies all knowledge of this transaction, except that he admits that Butler paid for the treat, that he paid for Butler's hat; that they went with their wives and bought bonnets afterwards, and travelled backwards and forwards together in the city that day. Brady, an unimpeached witness, says that Beckett was with Butler at the time when he changed the 5*l.* note.

But what about Walker? Walker tells us that Foster was at Green-street upon that morning, and that he called aside Hassett, who was another of those parties, and that they all went in to vote, and that then Hassett told him that 76, Capel-street was the place to get the bribe; that he got it there. And he says he changed the 5*l.* note at Keegan's, and that Hassett and Hopkins were with him. Francis Winter, the shopman at Keegan's, is produced, and he proved that Walker and Hassett changed two 5*l.* notes on that day; that one 5*l.* note was changed by Walker, and that one of the other two men, one of whom was Hassett, changed also, upon that occasion, a 5*l.* note. Hassett denies that he had a 5*l.* note at all. Which of those two am I to believe?

John Wilson, the younger, says that Campbell asked him, "What will you give me out of the 5*l.* if I get it for you?" And he (Wilson) said he would give him 2*l.*; and he says that he absolutely went to 76, Capel-street and got the 5*l.*, and brought it back to Campbell and gave it to Campbell, and that Campbell gave him four half-sovereigns and a sovereign, making the 3*l.*, and kept the other 2*l.* for himself. I am told that that is unlikely, because Campbell is in a position which puts him above what is described to have been treachery to Sir Arthur Guinness. Does any reasonable man think that those who are traitors to society and to themselves will not be traitors to their employers?

It is sought by Mr. Butt, with his usual adroitness, to get rid of the evidence of those Wilsons by saying that young Wilson said he did not introduce his father to Campbell, and the father says he did introduce him to Campbell. "No," says the young fellow, who was examined first, "I went away as soon as I got my money, and I saw some one making a sign, or something of the kind." Is that a contradiction which is to dispose of Wilson's evidence, and of this evidence coupled with the corroboration to which I have been alluding. The father swears that he also went up to Campbell. Steed is the man who got what he calls "the tip" from Wilson, and so he proves. Is not this a corroboration of Wilson? But suppose one cannot corroborate the other. I think Steed says, having got "the tip" from Wilson, Campbell told him first to go to hell, but that afterwards he told him what he meant by that locality. Then Campbell comes and swears that there is not a word of truth in it. He swears in terms of imprecation which would horrify any human being; and am I to take his solemn adjuration in the teeth of those 10 witnesses? I know that evidence is non numerandi sed ponderandi, but "numerandi" or "ponderandi," I do not believe one word of what Campbell swore. He tells us how he lives; and heaven help the men who trust their honour or their right into the hands of such a fellow. He says he is the inspector of the North City Registration. What is known about him? Referring to this election book: his name is down under the head of "General Agents." What has he been? Mr. Thomas Fell White says that Mr. Goodman, who is the person who has managed the whole of this registration, mentioned Campbell to him (that is to Mr. White) as a man "thoroughly acquainted with the freemen." Mr. White goes to Green-street, and what does he say about Campbell? "He saw him bustling about," he says; a very remarkable expression. What was Mr. Campbell doing on the morning of the election? He was assisting Mr. Goodman on the very morning of the election; what does he say of himself? "It was my duty" (mark the words) "to see that the parties who were employed brought up their men to the booths; and I was there from eight o'clock in the morning until five in the evening; and I held the same post at the previous contested election." I believe he did, but I do not think think he ever will again, for I feel that any man who seeks to represent the city of Dublin, whether he is disposed to represent it upon honourable principles, as I am certain Sir Arthur Guinness was, or whether he may be minded, as other men have been minded, to obtain the representation of the people by illegal means, will avoid Campbell. What more do I find about this man? In this book, which throws a remarkable light upon every part of this case, I find William J. Campbell named here as a paid agent. In the next place, his car-hire was paid before the election, and out of this fund. The election took place on the 18th of November, and his car-hire is paid up to October the 25th out of this fund, and altogether independent of Registration Society.

But what is the use of trying to involve this case of the Conservative Registration Society, and the acts of the men who were employed under Campbell, and Campbell himself, in clouds and darkness? Mr. Goodman says, he transferred his men to 47 Dame-street, at the head committee-rooms, but the impression sought to be made upon my mind by that statement was this, that although at 47 Dame-street, they were working, they were only, as it were, completing the task begun at No. 3 Dame-street; and they were to be paid out of the funds to be provided by Sir Arthur Guinness and the other parties who subscribed for the purposes of the registration.

Then that business was mentioned about taking their I O U's, in the absence of Mr. Goodman, and Mr. Goodman coming back and saying, that he did not want any I O U; that it was a perfectly legal transaction to pay them for their labour; I turn to this book, and I find that Mr. R. L. Hodgson, who is the agent of this Conservative Registration Society, not produced, although in court during every day, on October 7th makes the entry "To pay clerks, 80 l. 14 s. 8 d.; 17th October, ditto, 70 l.; R. L. Hodgson, to pay clerks 24th October 80 l.; ditto, to pay clerks 75 l." All those are struck out of the first portion of this book, which is a remarkable circumstance; but when I turn to the last item under the head of "Expenditure," at the Central Committee Rooms, I find that every one of them is paid every shilling, not out of the funds of the Registration Society, but out of the funds passing through the hands of the agents for election expenses; "October 10th, R. L. Hodgson, to pay clerks 8 l. 11 s. 8 d.; 24th, 57 l. 1 s. 6 d.; 31st, 82 l. 8 s. 4 d.; November 7th, 88 l. 6 s. 2 d.; 14th November, 52 l. 9 s. 2 d.; 21st, 140 l. 16 s. 8 d.: I have taken the trouble of totting up the four first items, and they are identical with the items struck out in the other part of the book.

Who are those clerks? One of them is the very man about whom so much has been said, J. B. Fraser. Although he was put in another room, he was transplanted by Mr. Hodgson from 3, Dame Street to 47, Dame Street. Campbell and his 20 men are in the best room of 47, Dame-street, the drawing-room, to which the agents have recourse, and to which the voters have recourse, and he and they are engaged every day in that room. Is he engaged in making out the lists? They were completed, according to the evidence, on the 12th or 13th of November, and Campbell's special vocation, as he himself swears, was then receiving the reports from the canvassers who were employed in testing the opinions (as we will call them) of the freemen voters. Such is Mr. Campbell, and I prefer to leave him.

I am, therefore, of opinion that it has been proved that ten men, who are named, were bribed in 76, Capel-street; that it has been proved that they were freemen; that it has been proved to my satisfaction that there at least some 30 men were bribed by the same machinery. I have reason to believe, in the words of the statute, that many more freemen were bribed there or elsewhere, and that that was done by those for whose acts Sir Arthur Guinness, though they were not personally committed by himself, is liable under this statute and before this tribunal.

The second case, to which I now come, is that of the persons who I said were tampered with by Robinson. That man appears to have been formerly on the Liberal side. It does not matter a jot on which side he was; but that is the history he gave of himself. He mentioned that he had some cause of quarrel with somebody, and that induced him to go to the other side. At all events, he is a person of some means, for he has a loan-office in the city of Dublin. The first time he appears on the scene is in company with Mr. Goodman. He goes to Mr. Goodman with an introduction from Mr. Purcell, the barrister, and he says, "If your gentlemen" (really it was hard to understand him) "will trust me —"; and there he stopped. We all, in our school-boy days, recollect what an aposiopesis was. He said, "If you will trust me"; then he must have asked Mr. Goodman to let him into his confidence, and to tell him who were the unpledged voters. It is quite idle to suppose that people are not to exercise their reason upon these matters, or to arrive at a conclusion, unless there are pieces of evidence to fit in as closely as pieces of mosaic. He must have asked Mr. Goodman for the lists of unpledged voters. Why? Because Mr. Goodman gave him a letter addressed, not to one ward, but to 18 wards, to the secretaries of all the wards, in these words, "Allow Mr. Robinson, the bearer of this letter, to see the unpledged voters in your ward." Now if it had said "voters" only, or "lodgers," or "rated occupiers," or "freemen," it might have been different, but it is let him see the unpledged voters; that is to say, the voters who have already been canvassed and have declined to promise. The construction put upon that letter by Mr. McDonogh may have been the true one, and I daresay was the true one in the mind of Mr. Goodman; but if you give instructions at large you must take the consequences. Far be it from me to impute any corrupt purpose to Mr. Goodman. I may have thought in the progress of the case a little hardly about one or two things which have turned up about him, but I should be sorry to impute any corrupt intention to him, and I should be sorry if any such impression remained. Armed with this document, this man, influenced by vindictive motives, immediately goes, and I suppose he gets the information that he is authorised to obtain. We find him next admitting that he went to a voter of the name of Dogherty, who, he believed, was a Liberal, and would vote on the Liberal side, and he said to him that he thought he could get him employment if he would come to the side of Sir Arthur Guinness. The very fact of his saying that, if he was an agent, is of itself a corrupt offer within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, and we need go no farther. Where does he appoint with Dogherty to meet him? Under the portico of the Post Office. The committee-rooms are in Sackville-street, and the mural literature of elections make such places more conspicuous at times in their ugliness than the handsomest façade of a public building. He goes there in a cab, and he asks if Dogherty is there? There is no Dogherty, but there are a number of men who are deeply interested in the coming contest—"thoughtful and reflecting men," as Mr. Dickens calls them. He says, "Who are you"? and they say "We are freemen"; and he says either "Lead on," or "Follow" (it does not matter which); and accordingly they go to the scene of action at the committee-rooms, where Mr. Boughey and the other persons are. What does he then do? In answer to me, having had time to deliberate, he says he went there for the purpose of procuring employment for those men whom he had never known anything of before, except that they were freemen, and he, in distinct and positive terms, admitted he was to get them employment in order to induce them to vote for Sir Arthur Guinness. Those are the very words of the Act of Parliament, "to offer to procure any office or place or employment in order to induce the voters to vote." He spoke out of the very statute itself, when he gave his testimony that he did that for the purpose of inducing them to vote for Sir Arthur Guinness. He pulls out of his pocket a sheet of paper, and upon that there are 18 or 19 names, some of them not present; but he says he took their names from their relatives and friends who were present, and who wished that they too should be participants in the employment which he was to get for those who were present. Then he says, "Will you rely upon me"? and one of them, who is a man of the name of William Field, says there was at once an exclamation, "We will;" one unanimous shout—

"With loud acclaim they hail the day."

They were satisfied; conviction was brought to their minds, and they would all vote for Sir Arthur Guinness; and the moment he heard that, he said with great naïveté, "I did nothing more about the employment when I found they were secure." What takes place then? They said to him, "Mr. Robinson, when shall we see you again"? "When shall we three meet again"? "When shall we see you again, Mr. Robinson"? said these freemen; and he replies, "In a week or ten days," and he admits that. Mind, this is the testimony of Robinson—this is not the testimony of the much-abused freemen. In his trial, the abuse of the freemen has all come from the people for whom they voted, which is the most curious thing in the whole matter. Campbell says he was pestered the whole day with them; that they were perpetually asking him for money. Mr. Thomas Fell White says that 30 or 40 of them came to the central committee rooms in Dame-street, openly asking for money for their votes, and he says that in reply to that request some of those who so solicited payment for their votes were told that they could not get it, but that they would be "gratuitously employed." Now, I want to know what were they to see Robinson for "in a week or ten days." They had never seen him before, as far as we can understand, and he had never seen them before; they had no interest in him, but he had this interest in them, that he wished to persuade them to the better side, and accordingly he was anxious to get them employment, as he says, to induce them to vote for Sir Arthur Guinness; but when he found they were certain for Sir Arthur Guinness, he did not think of the employment. Am I to take it that they were to see him in a week or ten days as on a friendly visit, to inquire about the state of his health, or what was it? I was anxious to know, and accordingly I asked the witness himself, and the only answer he could or would give me, on his oath, was that he could not tell me what was his own meaning. Therefore, I am driven to put a construction upon that; and, strange as it may appear, with the small assistance which he has afforded me for piercing the recesses of his heart, I think I know what he meant and what they understood him to mean. But there is a light thrown upon it by the evidence of another witness, and that is the Prussian, Cremer, who is, though a foreigner, upon the registry. We all know that on the continent constitutional privileges are of very recent and modern creation, especially in Prussia, and therefore Cremer, who has been 18 years in this country, may be excused if his early education did not teach him that the franchise was a trust; certainly, when he came upon the table he thought himself the most injured man in the world for not having received what he considered the fair price for his vote. Robinson said that he had known him for a long time. Therefore, there is no reason why they should not come together. Robinson said he lent him money several years ago, and that some of it is still due. That may be true or not, but he says he met him and asked him whether he would vote for Guinness and Plunkett; that some other person had been at him in the other direction, and Cremer said he would like to know something about it; and Robinson said if he would vote for Sir Arthur Guinness he would be "all right" (again that expression comes upon the scene) "after the election." Accordingly he votes for Guinness and Plunkett, and he says, "I really think I would have voted for Mr. Pim, for he was a good employer, and I am a capmaker, only for the promise I got." He is asked, "What was that promise?" and he says, "I expected to

Dublin City.

to get a 5*l.* note. He calls on Robinson the day after the election (and this is not contradicted by Robinson) and what does Robinson say?—"That he is to keep quiet for 21 days." Now that is a very remarkable statement coming out of the mouth of a foreigner, coming out of the mouth of any man of humble degree. If it was an invention why did he not say 20, the even number? Why did he fix on 21? Why not say 20, or 10, or 7? It would be nearer the consummation of happiness, the receipt of the money if it was 10 or 7 days; but he says 21 days. Why? I think I have an answer in this Act of the 31st and 32nd of the Queen. The time for presenting a petition to Parliament is 21 days from the return of the writ into the Crown and Henaper Office. A man of the intelligence of Robinson communicating with the committee rooms, and knowing there was an alarm about a petition, might readily enough hear that; by why should it come into the head, or into the mouth of Cremer, the Prussian, who was engaged in making caps at the time he voted for Sir Arthur Guinness? I believe Cremer. He wrote two letters; he says he wrote a letter first to Robinson, saying he would rather have a few pounds now than wait for the 21 days. I protest it is scarcely possible to go through this evidence without being struck with the ludicrous aspect in which it appears. He told him he would rather have a little down than wait for the 21 days; he gets no answer, and he writes another letter, and he sends it by a gentleman, whose name he gives, and who could be called if he did not do it. He got no answer. He went to the private residence of Robinson. Why should he go to the private residence? Robinson gave him his card, with his private residence, which he produces on the table. He went to the private residence, and he could get no satisfaction from him except this, that he said there would be some money going, and that if there was he would take care of him. Robinson admits that he gave him his card before he voted. Why did he give him this card? He knew his place of business in Swift's-row. Why did he give him this card, with his private residence? Robinson again tells us, on his oath, that he did not know what Cremer wanted. And again I am driven to arrive at a conclusion, and I do arrive at a conclusion, and that is, that Robinson was engaged in endeavouring to obtain this man's vote by corrupt promises, no matter how indirectly made; and the more indirect they are, the more it is for the interest of the public that they should not prevail, in order that it may be seen and felt, that no matter how crafty are the devices, no matter how subtle the intellect—

"Look like the innocent flower,
But be the serpent under it."

the law is too powerful, and will prevail.

Then McDonnell is called as a witness, and it is said, "Oh, he has told an improbable story, that when he was canvassed by Copeland, a hand was put up, and that he interpreted the five fingers as meaning 5*l.*," which cannot be true, because Copeland denies that he ever did anything of the kind, as well he might, for when I refer back to the evidence, I find that it is not Copeland who was stated to have put up the five fingers, but a man with Copeland who put up the five fingers, in the presence of Copeland; and Copeland is produced to contradict what was not sworn against him, whilst the man against whom the evidence of McDonnell is given, is like the other witnesses in this case who are not produced, out of Court.

Upon that head of charge, I come to the conclusion that Mr. Robinson, so authorised by the letter of Mr. Goodman, who was an agent in every respect of Sir Arthur Guinness, was himself an agent of Sir Arthur Guinness for the purpose of that corrupt transaction with those men, and that those freemen were so practised upon by him, and that Sir Arthur Guinness is liable for his acts in the same sense which I specified before; and so I shall report to the House of Commons.

I now come to the two individual cases, namely, those of Alexander Fergusson, and John Kelly, which I called young Mr. Vance's cases. Those cases rest upon the testimony of those two witnesses; Fergusson is a working goldsmith or silversmith, and he says that on the morning of the election, young Mr. Vance, who is down in this book as a canvasser, and a paid canvasser, goes to Fergusson, and Fergusson says, "I would like to have my rent paid, it is due." "Well," said Vance, "You will work for it if we want you?" "Yes," was the reply. "Well, come on, then, and vote," said Vance. Fergusson said, "Well, if I am going up to vote, I would like to have payment for my loss of time"; and Vance said, "That will be all right too." They go then to another committee-room, at No. 77, Dame-street, where, beyond a doubt, Alderman Manning and some of the committee were. The multiplying of these rooms is a very suspicious circumstance. There is 47 and 48, Dame-street, and exactly opposite to that is 24, Dame-street, where Mr. Davenport Crosthwaite is closeted. There is 3, Dame-street, from which the regulation men are removed, and there is 79, Dame-street; Fergusson is brought there, and he says that he went into a room to sign his name to one of those papers, and that Alderman Manning slapped him on the back and said, "All right," or something of that kind; "Go up and vote." Alderman Manning says he did not say this, and I believe Alderman Manning either did not say it, or has no recollection of what occurred. What he is stated to have done is a very small matter; but Alderman Manning is charged by Kelly with saying that those papers were to evade the law; Alderman Manning positively swears that he never said anything of the kind, and it would be a difficult thing to believe that a man could have said such a thing without recollecting it. But there is a very easy explanation of the fact; Charles William Godwin, a witness for the petitioner, says that he was brought to the same place at the same time with Kelly, and that is was young Mr. Vance who said in the presence of Manning "this was only a thing to evade the law." May not young Mr. Vance have said it, and may not Alexander Fergusson have thought that it was Alderman Manning who said it? The evidence of John Kelly corroborated by Godwin satisfies me that it was said by one or other of the persons then present. I was struck by the circumstance, that while every witness produced in this case was elaborately, and I do not say too elaborately, cross-examined by the counsel for Sir Arthur Guinness, they touched with the most delicate hand young Mr. Vance when he came on the table, I think the number of questions put to him altogether were three or four, and they really amounted to one general question, "Did you offer any place, employment, or reward to any voter in order to induce him to vote at this election?" To which he replied (and it was a most remarkable answer), "Not to my knowledge." That is the contradiction of Alexander Fergusson, and not one question is asked, and not one word by way of contradiction is attempted as to John Kelly. Vance is cross-examined as to what he meant by "Not to his knowledge." But all that he will say is that it was to the best of his memory, and that he would not swear positively; but he says that he did see Alexander Fergusson at 79 Dame-street, where Alderman Manning was, and he only gives that qualified contradiction to the direct swearing of Alexander Fergusson, who afterwards went to ask to be paid, and not a syllable of contradiction to John Kelly, who swears positively that he was promised this money by Vance, and that the conversations about it took place in Mr. Cole's shop, in Mr. Cole's presence. Mr. Cole in like manner is not produced to contradict him, so that the whole of this charge remains untouched, except by a general statement of young Mr. Vance who says, "Not to my knowledge." I believe Alderman Manning to have sworn what he believed to be the truth, but in the heat and hurry, and bustle of an election contest, many a word may be spoken and soon forgotten, and I do not consider that he has given any substantial contradiction whatever to those witnesses whose dealing is really with young Mr. Vance, and not with him, Alderman Manning. I believe that charge is substantially proved against young Mr. Vance, as an agent for Sir Arthur Guinness. He is a canvasser, not to ascertain how a man will vote, but he is a canvasser in the widest sense of the word; authorized to use all exertions with voters to solicit them, and to poll them as soon as ever he can. That is the instruction to Mr. William John Vance as a paid canvasser, and I hold that for his acts Sir Arthur Guinness was responsible.

Then comes the case of Benjamin Warren, and he also is a canvasser; he goes to two men of the name of Richard Jesson and George Booth. Jesson has since died, but his wife spoke as to what occurred in her presence in his case; and the other man is living. They are both stated to have always voted on the Liberal side before. Warren had charge of the district in which this man Jesson lived, and the wife, Mary Anne Jesson, said he told her husband that he would be decently treated, and that he would be handsomely rewarded if he voted for Sir Arthur Guinness. That is corroborated by her son, Joseph Jesson. The boy was produced on the table. She says that the man Warren was introduced to her husband by a freeman named James Hall, who was present at the conversation, and who could have been produced to contradict her and her son, if they were swearing what was not the truth, but that James Hall was not called; and upon that testimony, and considering the demeanour of the witnesses who gave it, I arrive at the conclusion that that charge is proved against Benjamin Warren.

The charge against George Booth, perhaps, would not have weighed very much if it had stood alone; but the words being in his case the same as those which were used in the other case, I arrive at the conclusion that he also is swearing the truth.

That disposes I think of all the individual cases, and there remains but one other, with which I shall deal as rapidly as I can, namely, the case of the electric telegrams. It is clear and settled law, as laid down in the case of Cooper and Slade, which stands unreversed, reported in the 6th House of Lords Cases, recognised the other day in the able judgment of Mr. Justice Willes to be still law, and not, in my opinion, in any way touched by the provisions in the subsequent Act of Parliament against the paying of out-voters' expenses, as contained in the 17th & 18th Victoria, and re-enacted, except as to Galway, Cork, and Limerick, by the 31st & 32nd of the Queen. That case decided what I should have thought was plain and palpable law under a wider and larger proposition, that a promise to pay the travelling expenses of a voter, conditionally upon his supporting a particular candidate, was a bribe. That is law, as held by the House of Lords, and I am bound by that. But I should have thought that any conditional inducement of any kind, with or without the Statute, to induce a voter to vote in a particular way, was from the earliest times clear and unmistakable bribery. I must say that I cannot comprehend how you can offer anything to any man on the condition that he will vote for another without committing bribery; and I have the greatest authority in the law of England for that proposition, if any authority were required. In the year 1784, the then Lord Stanhope introduced a Bill into the House of Lords, providing that the payment of travelling expenses should be subjected to the penalties of bribery. The Bill was carried through the House of Commons, and it was brought into the House of Lords by Lord Stanhope, and Lord Mansfield spoke against the Bill and defeated it, saying that the paying of travelling expenses was clearly subject to the penalties of bribery, and that no Statute was required to make them illegal.

If that be the state of the law, let me now deal with the facts. Is there a conditional promise here? Let us look to the telegrams sent to the voters. First, they are sent in a fictitious name—they have the badge of fraud upon them; secondly, they bear upon the face

face of them conclusive evidence that they are sent in reply to letters, but no letter is produced—no letter is accounted for. We have Mr. Mortimer's testimony as to the receipt of the 460 letters, and every telegram commences, "Letter received." Like a true man, when Mr. Mortimer found the lock broken on the box containing the letters, he got another lock, and he has the key of his box, which has however, to use his language, "mysteriously disappeared," and no one will impute to him that he is speaking of a box as having "mysteriously disappeared," of which he knows the whereabouts at the present moment. He produces his key, but where is the box and where are the letters? They are not produced. Some of the telegraphic messages say "not a man can be spared"; "not one vote to spare"; "come up and record vote to-morrow, without fail"; "every vote required to insure success"; "letter sent." What did that letter contain? Read it by the light of another telegram: "Letter received; please come, arrangements will be satisfactorily made." What is the meaning of that; or of this, "Come and record your vote on Wednesday; not one to spare; letter by post"? What means this: "Letter received; please be in Dublin on 18th morning"? I am told that there is nothing about voting in it. I know the word "voting" does not occur in it, but it runs, "Please be in Dublin on the 18th morning, and forward account of expenses to me." And this is the last to which I will refer: "Not time for remittance; letter received." It may be that some subtler intellect would discover that there was some other possible construction of those documents, and that they might import that a general impression prevailed in the excellent mind of "John Wilson Johnstone," for which we now read "Davenport Crosthwaite," that it was a hard thing that those out-voters should not have the means of coming up to the poll and of registering their votes for whatever side they pleased, and that while he, in his generous benevolence, was working in 24 Dame-street under a false name, suggested by Mr. Henry Foster, and assisted by Mr. William Johnstone, all their anxiety and all this elaborate machinery was only to afford an opportunity to the out-voters of registering their votes for either Sir Arthur Guinness or Mr. Pim or Sir Dominick Corrigan; and that, in any event, after having so done, the voters were clearly entitled to go to that office of "J. W. Johnstone's" to tell him that they had recorded their votes for Mr. Pim or Sir Dominick Corrigan, and that having complied with his wishes, they hoped he would pay their expenses, and that they would have received them. I confess, looking at those documents in a commonplace way, my reading of them is that they were a direct solicitation to vote for Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, and that they contained a condition that the voters were only to get their expenses if they voted for Sir Arthur Guinness. Forty-one persons, out of more than 70 to whom these telegrams were sent, did vote for Sir Arthur Guinness; and if I am to arrive at any conclusion as to anything which has not been presented oculis fidelibus, I am satisfied they either were paid or are to be paid, in pursuance of the conditional promise, their travelling expenses upon that occasion.

It is not for me to say whether this is right or whether it is wrong. The Legislature and the law have declared that it is illegal, and I am not to listen to anyone saying that indeed it is not a moral offence. Without doubt all this wickedness of bribery has arisen from a lax moral feeling upon the subject. The Legislature has struggled for centuries, or at least for the last two centuries, with unfailing earnestness, to strike down the hand of the briber. Corrupt bribery cannot be carried on without large sums of money, and woe be to us if the Legislature of the country, by the influence of unbounded largesses, should pass altogether into the hands of a plutocracy!

My friend, Mr. Butt, in his zeal for his client, was betrayed into an expression which I cannot allow to pass unnoticed. I said before, and no one could misunderstand me, that, both personally at present and by my recollections of the past, I entertain unfeigned respect for Sir Arthur Guinness and his family. He is the head of, I believe, the first commercial firm in this country, second to none in any country; but I cannot allow it to be said in my presence, without expressing my respectful dissent, that either he or any other man, whether he has thousands or tens of thousands at his disposal, can claim the representation of this city as a rightful inheritance.

One branch of the Legislature is formed by those who rightly claim to be there by inheritance; but the other branch of the Legislature is formed of the representatives of the people, and the people, and the people alone are entitled to choose them.

I have said that there has been a constant struggle going on for two centuries to purify the Legislature. Men of the greatest wealth, and, I regret to be obliged to say, men of the highest rank, have set themselves to work against this great intention of Parliament. I have now before me a work of high repute (the present Lord Stanhope's "History of England"); and he mentions that, on one occasion, the Mayor and Aldermen of Oxford, in the year 1768 (just a century ago), "had written word to their members that they should be re-elected if they would pay 7,500*l.* to discharge the debts of the corporation. With proper spirit the Members laid the case before the House, and the House committed the peccant Mayor and Aldermen to Newgate for five days when, having, acknowledged their guilt and asked pardon, they were discharged, being first, however, severely reprimanded by the Speaker at the bar, and on their knees." The celebrated Lord Chesterfield, writing to his son in December, 1767, says: "I have looked out for some venal borough for you, and I spoke to a borough jobber, and offered five-and-twenty hundred pounds for a secure seat in Parliament; but he laughed at my offer, and said that there was no such thing as a borough to be had now, for that the rich East and West Indians had secured them all, at the rate of 3,000 l. at least, but many at 4,000 l., and two or three that he knew of at 5,000 l."

See how the offspring of corruption grows upon the wing—

"Parva metu primo mox sese attollit in auras."

"Some weeks later," says Lord Stanhope, "we are told, on the same authority, that George Selwyn has sold his borough of Ludgershall to two members for 9,000 l." Next I read that, "no place at these elections could vie in venality with Shoreham. There, bribery had been reduced to a system, and the electors combined in a confederacy for the equal partition of whatever money was received, and, as in the first days of the Apostles, all things had been common among their followers; so this confederacy, by a most profane and irreverent misapplication of the name, called itself the 'Christian Club.'" ("The Christian Club!") "But these scandalous practices, though long continued, were not brought to light until 1771, when one of the Members having died, and a new election ensuing, a Committee of the House of Commons investigated and disclosed the whole case. By an Act of Parliament in the same year, the members of the Christian Club were deprived of their votes, and the franchise was extended from the small town of Shoreham to the adjacent hundreds."

Parliament, as I have said, has struggled at all periods, and done all in its power to put an end to such practices. In a moment of unbounded confidence, the House of Commons has abandoned some of its most cherished privileges, and seeing no other way to the correction of these vast abuses, has deputed the task to the legal tribunals of the country—to the judges of the courts of common law. We know that at this particular moment Parliament has enfranchised vast masses of the people, going from the upper to the lower stratum, and giving the franchise to men who have heretofore been kept from it; because it was said, and perhaps truly, that from their poverty and from their necessities they were liable to be operated upon by men of wealth, seeking at any price and at any risk to force themselves within the walls of the House of Commons. It was long and forcibly held by the higher classes that it was a dangerous thing to give the franchise to men who were so liable, by reason of their poverty, to be corruptly acted upon; but now that the poorer and humbler classes are admitted to the franchise, is this the time when the higher and wealthier classes should seek to make good their own predictions by lavish expenditure upon those very men who had been so long excluded on the ground I have mentioned? It should not, and I hope it will not, be. It is the duty and the interest of men of wealth to close their purse-strings, and not to allow any men, no matter how they may be interested in cause or party, to induce them to open the flood-gates of corruption; and, above all things, it is desirable that men who have borne heretofore an unblemished character and an unsullied reputation, should not, by placing large sums of money at the disposal of subordinate agents, employed at second or third hand, enable them to perpetrate those corrupt and illegal acts, whilst they, without whose money they could not have been accomplished, still maintain a fair face before the world. One of the most beautiful passages in the Offices of Cicero is thoroughly applicable to this class of men: "Totius autem injustitiæ nulla capitalior est quam eorum qui cum maxime fallunt, id agunt ut viri boni esse videantur." "No species of iniquity is more fatal to society than that perpetrated by those who, whilst they most deceive us, so contrive things that they may bear the face of virtuous citizens."

I have now done with this case; to me it has been an arduous and a most painful task; I should have been far better pleased, if I had been able, with a conscientious conviction, to declare that the Petition against Sir Arthur Guinness had failed, and that he stood unreached by any charge in that position which his honoured father occupied. I cannot do so; I must declare that this was a void election; I must certify that Sir Arthur Guinness was, by his agents, guilty of bribery at this election; I shall report, and it affords me the greatest pleasure to do so, in broad unmistakable terms, that he was not guilty himself personally, directly, or indirectly to his knowledge, of any transaction of a corrupt nature. I shall enumerate, in my certificate to the House of Commons, the persons who I consider were bribed, and those who were bribers; and I shall furthermore declare, because it has been proved by Mr. White, one of the principal solicitors of Sir Arthur Guinness, acting for him at that election and now acting for him on this Petition; proved by Campbell whose agency has been established, and whom Mr. Goodman described as the person best acquainted with the freemen; proved by that document the most artful of all, which was to be delivered at No. 3, Dame-street, after the election, and which was printed and paid for at 76, Capel-street, at the desire of Henry Foster; proved by what appears to me the most conclusive evidence, direct and circumstantial, that the freemen of this city have been shown to a great extent to be corrupt voters, and I shall leave the House of Commons to deal with their case, and the constituency as affected by them.

I shall give the costs of the Petition to the Petitioners.

Mr. Heron applied for certificates of indemnity for 16 persons.

Mr. Justice Keogh said that he should grant certificates of indemnity on both sides, to every person who had been examined, except those witnesses whose evidence he did not believe.

Mr. Heron applied for an adjournment of the trial, in order that Henry Foster and Davenport Crosthwaite might be examined when they returned to this country.

Mr. McDonogh objected to the application.

Mr. Justice Keogh refused the application.

GREENOCK ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Lord Barcaple, 13 February 1869.

Greenock.

Lord Barcaple.] THIS trial has, of course, occupied my very anxious consideration during nearly the whole of this week, both in court during the evidence, and afterwards in carefully going over and, to the best of my ability, analysing and judging of the evidence as it was gradually produced. Now, with the great benefit which I have derived to-day from the arguments on both sides of the bar, I have to address myself, as it has been justly said, to the functions both of judge and jury; and I do feel it to be a very anxious and a very responsible thing indeed that is thus cast upon me in the exercise of this new jurisdiction, now for the first time brought into operation in Scotland. I believe that, in common with many other persons, I had hardly anticipated that we should have had an example of it in Scotland upon the present occasion; and I trust that it may be very long indeed before this great seat of trade and flourishing town shall again have such a visitation as that which has been inflicted upon it for nearly a week at present.

I am sure I need not do more than once address my most earnest appeal to all the very orderly and intelligent audience who have been here throughout the week, to request that they will feel it both a duty to themselves and to Greenock, and a great personal favour to me, that neither now, nor at any time before this court is altogether adjourned and broken up, and they leave it, they will indulge in any expression of feeling or opinion whatever.

The portion of the case which has been the subject of a supplementary argument at the end of the proceedings is so entirely separate from the rest of it, that I think I shall most conveniently deal with it by expressing my opinion upon that matter at first, before going into the other things which require a consideration of the evidence.

The facts of the case upon that part of it are substantially not disputed; and the question is, in so far as I have to consider it, simply whether there was such a miscarriage at the last election in Greenock, in reference to the arrangements of polling places and of polling districts, as has vitiated and invalidated the election. Except for the purpose of determining that question, it is unnecessary that I should either direct my mind to the subject, or pronounce any opinion upon it.

There were objections stated to the course taken by the sheriff in this matter, some of which have not been referred to in the argument, which I may just state, because it will be satisfactory to the parties, I think, that I should allude, in a single word, to the whole of them. There was first of all an objection taken in respect that it was alleged that one of the polling booths or rooms, in the first ward, I think it was, was connected with a public-house; that is to say, that there was direct access from the one to the other. That, I think, has been disproved in point of fact. I believe, if I remember rightly, it was not stated in the original petition. I ruled, therefore, that it could not be gone into as a separate subject of investigation. But in the course of the investigation into other matters it did appear (and I think it is just as well that it should have appeared), that in point of fact there was not, in my judgment, at least, any ground whatever for having entertained that objection.

Then it was objected that the sheriff, in the course of making those arrangements, had communicated with, and taken more or less the assistance and advice of, the town clerk; and that was said to have been objectionable, I suppose, the more especially from some idea that, as one of the candidates was, or had recently been, the provost of the burgh (and I believe he was still the provost of the burgh at the date of the election), there was a sort of impropriety in communicating with the town clerk upon that ground. I certainly cannot conceive that that is a matter, however, upon which I could base any judgment to the effect that there was an illegality committed. But I may say, that upon that point of the case I have no doubt whatever. The town clerk has express duties to perform in this matter of the providing of places in which to poll; and by the very last provision which we have upon the subject, that, in the Reform Act of last year, new duties are imposed upon him, or new instructions are given to him, which imply that he is still a public officer responsibly charged with some duties in this matter, who is bound to discharge them aright, and who will be looked to as the party responsible to do so.

I cannot conceive that the sheriff did anything that could be looked upon as illegal in communicating with that public officer. He was entitled to have his assistance. He was entitled to require from him all the assistance which he, as town clerk of the burgh, could give him in the matter; and I must assume, and no reason has been suggested why I should not assume, that he might have relied upon him, and probably did rely upon him, with entire, and, for anything I know or believe, well-grounded confidence, that he would get nothing but such assistance in the matter as one responsible public officer ought to give to another. From the very outset of the present system of election, the town clerk has been a person who was charged with duties in the matter of providing polling places in burghs. Indeed, originally by the Reform Act of 1832, he was the sole party who had any functions to perform in that respect, and he was to make the division. I do not know whether it was suggested at the bar or not; but I do not understand, or think that the 27th section of the original Reform Act has been repealed. It has been modified and added to by supplementary provisions in subsequent Acts; but I think it remains there as the basis of the whole thing; showing that the town clerk is a person who, as he has duties to perform in the matter, might well be consulted and called upon to give advice by the sheriff.

Then, the third ground of objection, and that which has been the subject of argument, is in regard to the arrangements which were made by the sheriff; and those, as I understand them, seem to have been of this kind: that taking the wards as they had been fixed last year, I mean in 1868, under the provisions of the Act for dividing burghs into wards, it being, in point of fact, identical, or nearly so, with the wards which have prevailed here ever since the time of the Municipal Reform Act in 1834, I think it was, the sheriff did not while he increased the number of polling places or polling booths (call them which you will), increase the number of districts, but appointed a certain number of rooms or other places at which the poll was to be taken within each one of those districts. In the first district, which is the largest, he appointed four; and then it is said, and I understand it to be quite admitted in point of fact, that further, in appointing those polling places within that district he did not assign the persons being voters, living within particular portions of each district, to each new polling place, but he divided the entire list of voters in the district by taking them alphabetically, and transferring a portion of the alphabet to one polling place and another portion of the alphabet to a second, and so on.

Now, it is said, and was argued with great ingenuity and with great force by Mr. Christie, that that is not acting upon a sound construction of the statutory provisions upon which this matter proceeds. I do not think it is incumbent upon me at present to pronounce any judgment upon that point. Those are provisions which I rather think are not easily all read together; and if my memory does not deceive me, even so long ago as very soon after the passing of the Reform Act of 1832, it was found that upon this subject, in the 27th clause of it there were provisions which it was difficult to work out and difficult to read together, and especially difficult to apply in burghs as in counties. The truth of the matter is, that "polling places" with reference to counties, is an expression which has always had, and to some extent always must have, a somewhat different meaning from that which it has to burghs. A polling place in a county is very commonly a town—and within that town, no matter where the polling booth may be situated, it is still at the same polling place. But then there is nothing of that sort in ordinary burghs, unless you conceive that which has not, I believe, in Scotland been at all common, that you have in one of the central burghs a particular public place, which has by use or by misapprehension of the statute from 1832 downwards, been always used as the polling place of that burgh. But the much more ordinary thing, and that which the statutes, even in their more recent provisions, seem to point to is, that in burghs the place for taking the poll must necessarily be more or less fluctuating, because it is either to be a temporary booth erected where the public authorities may find a convenient space for doing so, which disappears whenever the election is over, or it is to be a room hired for the purpose from any person who has a room convenient to be hired for that purpose at that time, that is to say, it is very generally either a booth upon a piece of ground which may happen to be vacant at the time, or it is a shop or room or other building which at the time happens to be untenanted. That implies that necessarily there must be some degree of fluctuation; and, therefore, I do not know that I can say that I think that there is any very precise rule which can be adopted by the public officers who have the charge of carrying out those provisions. I rather think that he has a latitude. I have no doubt it has always been acted upon, and I rather think that that latitude is within the statutes themselves.

But the real question which I have to decide is, whether anything has been done in this matter by the sheriff upon the present occasion which is to invalidate the election. Now that is a very serious question indeed. To invalidate an election—to put a town, and a large town, with a great population, and a vast number of voters like this, to the necessity of having a second election in consequence of a mere miscarriage, is no light thing; because I must, of course, look at this matter altogether apart from the rest of the case, and I must treat this exactly as if there were no other complaint at all except of this as an illegality committed.

Now, in the first place, I am by no means satisfied that there was any illegality at all; but, in the next place, I am quite satisfied that if there was, to any extent, a contravention of those statutory provisions, if they were not carried out precisely (for that is, as it appears to me, the utmost that can be said about it), they are provisions of such a kind that it would require that something much more should be made out than merely that they were transgressed in good faith, and without any serious consequence, in order to invalidate an election. Whether I look to any evidence which is before me, or to anything which is suggested by the nature of the question which arises upon this alleged miscarriage, it appears to me that there is not the slightest ground to believe that it did, to any extent, affect the fairness of the election which was held here in November. I cannot see how it should have done so. On the contrary, although I am not bound to judge of that, and do not judge of it, and certainly am not in a good position to judge of it, nevertheless I see nothing whatever to lead to the conclusion that the sheriff is not perfectly right, at least in

in this: that his arrangements were such as were best calculated for bringing about those ends—of a tranquil and quiet, and an easily-managed election, which it was his duty, as sheriff of the county, so far as he interfered or had to interfere in the matter, to endeavour to accomplish.

Upon these grounds, into which I need not go more fully, I have no hesitation in holding that, in so far as any question arises before me here, there has not been a ground made out, in respect to this matter of the polling places, on which I could hold that the sitting Member was not duly returned. If there is any question in regard to this matter beyond that, it is not a question for this place (and I am very happy to think so, because I think it would be a very bad question for one judge, sitting alone at a trial, to decide upon), but it is a matter which, I presume, the sheriffs of Scotland have had occasion to consider before, and in regard to which what has taken place at present may lead them to reconsider and to take the best and most authoritative advice, and, if necessary, to get some more clear statutory provisions, in order to put an end to all possible doubt upon the subject.

Then I come to the other and more important part of the case. I am dealing with the Petition which seeks to have the election set aside upon the ground of corrupt practices in all those three divisions of corrupt practices which we have in the statutes of bribery, of treating, and of undue influence.

Before going to consider the nature of the evidence in other respects, I may at the outset say what I know is expected to be my opinion on both sides of the bar, because I think they concur in it, viz. that there is no ground whatever (and I say it most gladly, but I say it with the very reverse of surprise, for I should have been naturally astonished if I had had to say anything else) for holding that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the late election for the burgh of Greenock. The result of that to the burgh would have been most serious indeed. But, as might have been expected, that is not made out in evidence, and Mr. Christie most fairly and most properly explained that whatever general expressions occurred in his petition he neither now intended, nor had at any time wished, to make a charge of that sort against the burgh.

Then, though it does not fall under my duty to report upon it, I may, in passing, observe that I am extremely glad to find, in the course of the evidence, that some appearances, which there were at one time, as if there had been some extraordinary amount of dissipation connected with the election, and a great and unusual number of drunken people in the streets, did, when the matter came to be fairly investigated, die away altogether. It was stated, upon what seemed to be competent authority, that rather the reverse was the case. It is very probable, I think, that Bailie Hunter, who certainly was in a position to judge very well of the matter in some respects, as he left town rather early in the afternoon, may not have seen some of the excitement which prevailed, and not unnaturally prevailed; but I must take it upon the whole of the evidence now that the instances which we have had spoken of (and some of them are very important as matters of evidence as regards some of the charges of instances of individual intoxication, or of three or four intoxicated men being seen at one time), were not indicative of the general state of the population, even of the working classes of Greenock upon that day. They had another business to perform that day, and I conscientiously believe that they felt that they would have been acting very unworthily, and that it would have been very far indeed from their wish to have exhibited so deplorable a spectacle.

Now, I must proceed to consider the evidence which has been laid before me, but I think the parties will scarcely expect that I should do so in very much detail. The charges are very numerous. Those that were put into the note of particulars were very numerous indeed. Even those which have been the subject of inquiry in this trial amount to a large number, but a very considerable proportion of them, in the view which I take of the evidence, admit of being disposed of almost in a single word; and I am not surprised that it should be so, because, from the nature of the Petition, it not being a case of any one great and monstrous evil that was complained of, but of a number of individual instances of alleged improper practices where it is difficult to get evidence, it is difficult to sift the evidence. The Petitioner was led to listen, perhaps too readily, to accounts which reached him as to the state of particulars in regard to individual alleged instances of corrupt practices, but some of the cases he has properly abandoned, and others of them, I may say, I am disposed to set aside almost without observation. There were cases, of which that of the man Rankine may be taken as an instance, which, when the thing was investigated, was found to be the reckless act of some one, two, or three people who seemed to have been enjoying themselves too much on the day of the election, and, as is the unfortunate consequence of that fault, very much disposed to renew the same indulgence the next morning, beset one of the agents to give him money to drink, or asked (according to the expression of the place apparently) for their "morning." Mr. McIlwraith, apparently, very properly would have nothing in the world to do with it, but another gentleman came up (we do not know who he is), and he, wishing to be relieved from them, I suppose, or having possibly some sympathy with the men, gave them a shilling. That is a matter, I need not say, of no consequence at all.

Then there are one or two cases, of which, perhaps, the most notable is that of Mr. Harley, a butcher, which was made the subject of inquiry, as to a bribe which it was supposed that he had got, and it was the only bribe of any considerable amount which we have to discuss. It was said that he had got 10*l.* for his vote, but then it came out long before we got to the end of the explanation, long before we got any corroboration (I may say that I, in my mind, had no doubt about it in my humble judgment), that the whole thing was a joke. I did not doubt it almost from the beginning.

Then there was an old man for whom a subscription was offered to be got up by Mr. Boyd. I cannot say that it appears to me that that can figure at all as a case of corrupt practices. Such a thing might be made a case of corrupt practices, but it would take a great deal of evidence to do that. It would require to be set up as corrupt. It is not corrupt in its own nature. No doubt (and there alone is there any ground for it) this conversation took place when Mr. Boyd was calling to ask about his vote, but looking to what it was, looking at the consistency of the proposal with the excellent practice in those trades of the men helping one another when they are laid aside, it seemed to me to be the most natural thing in the world, that having done his work about the canvass (and I do not think it mattered which way it was, whether he got his vote or got his vote refused) he should have said to him what it is proved he said, and what I see no reason to doubt was substantially what he said, and was the substance of what passed, that "altogether independently of your vote, I will see, if times keep well, if we cannot get up a subscription for you." It is quite true that the subscription has not been got up, but it is not a rare instance that a man should say something of the kind when the subject of distress is immediately before him which he does not afterwards follow out, and he might, perhaps, feel, and I do not think he would be wrong if he did feel, that there might have been some difficulty in following it out in the state of things which has been existing here for some time past.

There was the case of a man named Nicholson, about a topcoat. There again, I must say, that my first impression of that case was rather different from that which came out ultimately. It appeared to me to be a joke from the outset, but it would rather seem that it was not, and that the men were not perfectly sober; at all events there is no evidence in the world. There is the evidence of one man, who says that that was so, but the other man says, "No;" and then Mr. Boyd, in whose shop it was also, says "No." So that there is no evidence there.

The case of McAlpine, the porter, who got a shilling put into his hand, was very properly given up. I daresay he did get the shilling put into his hand, and I daresay that was a joke, and a good-humoured joke, but there is not the least reason to suppose that it was bribery.

There was a public officer, an inspector of markets, who was said to have been spoken to by Bailie Hunter, but I heard no evidence leading me to a supposition that anything passed there that could be looked upon as concussion or intimidation.

The coal weigher was the servant of a coal merchant, and he was dismissed by Mr. Orr; but so far as I could make out from the question, it was a quarrel about the accounts; which of them got the best of it I do not know, but of course a man might say that he might dismiss his servant without its having any connection with his vote.

Then there was a case where a stranger was said to have flourished a large quantity of silver, to the amount of 3*l.* or 4*l.*, and it was said that he had 20*l.* to sport. That, of course, is of no importance. We do not know who that stranger was, even if there is not a certain amount of exaggeration about it, but it is quite plain that it is no case of bribery.

Then there was a trick played upon Mr. Brodribb, who kept a public-house, and who seems to have lost some 2*l.* 10*s.* I think he was very simple, but whether the trick was played upon him by the witness Armour or not, or whether the trick was played upon the witness Armour by some other people with whom the witness Armour had got into conversation, he not being very sober at the time, does not appear, and is of no consequence.

These are specimens, at least, of a very considerable number of cases which I do not think can enter seriously into the present consideration; but I think that the present discussion is a very serious one indeed. I have felt it to be so throughout, and I have felt some matters connected with it to be of extreme difficulty.

The first that we heard of this election in the evidence was a letter from the sitting Member, in which, certainly, an ill-advised and unfortunate expression was used. He said, writing to his correspondent, "If I go in I must do it properly to win, and I suppose that Christie is not prepared to bleed freely." Now, I do not, in the least degree assume (very far from it indeed), that that imported any intention on the part of Mr. Grieve to spend any money in any illegal way. That is not the thing, and I do not believe it did; but it did import an intention to come into the field with money ready to be spent, and that freely, for the purpose of overcoming an opponent and gaining the election. I cannot imagine a worse key-note to be struck at the commencement of the contest than this. If it comes out it will certainly be very unfortunate for the candidate; and whether it comes out or not, if the election is conducted upon the footing which that seems to indicate, it will be extremely liable to give rise, at least, to suspicions, whether well-founded or not, as to how the election is truly conducted and is gained.

Now, it is quite unquestionable, I think, that this determination was carried out. There were employed for Mr. Grieve, besides his principal agent, Mr. King, eleven ward agents, as they are called; but that is, as every person who knows Greenock must be perfectly well aware, not an agent for eleven wards, for there are only five wards, but three agents for the first ward, and two agents for each of the rest. The result of that was, that a sum of 1,715*l.* 10*s.* was paid to those eleven agents and Mr. King, Mr. King's bill, however, being only a hundred guineas. I am excluding at present all charges for outlay and clerks; but for fees, for remuneration, there were bills sent in to the amount of 1,715 l. 10*s.* I think, if it stood alone, and it does not stand alone, the charges of that sort would be a very large sum indeed to expend in this way in an election of this kind. It is true that the election lasted for a long period of time, and that probably increased the expense. But then the expense was being carried on upon the footing of employing so very large a proportion of the law agents in this place, subject to the payment of a fee for this kind of work, and the charge I observe is in quite general terms, "To fee for acting as agent in Parliamentary Election." I think that is the way in which the thing is stated. In the case before me, it is 157 l. 10*s.* that is charged. Then, in addition to those agents, three of whom were thought necessary for one ward, and two for each of the rest, I find there were three accountants who had charges somewhat of the same sort, with the exception of one of them, who must be entirely set aside. He charged ten guineas for pure accountant's work, only of a proper kind, in making up states of the returns, I presume, by canvassers, or something of that sort. But one of them is an account sent in in these terms: "June 13th to November 16th, time and trouble employed between those dates in conducting your canvass, 90 l." Now, I must say that I think that that is a very strong course of expenditure, and that it was not likely that an election could be conducted upon that footing without its attracting attention, and by attracting the attention of opponents creating a considerable tendency to look with suspicion at the whole expenditure throughout the election, I do not say that in itself it is a ground upon which an election can be set aside. Possibly, however, I think that in a strong and aggravated case it could. These gentlemen, no doubt, are not paid to vote, but in consequence of their being paid they must not vote, and I do not advise the experiment to be tried to any much greater extent; at least I would rather hope that it will not be again tried to this extent, for I am quite satisfied that it is an unfortunate course of procedure.

On looking to those cases which it has occurred to me require a more positive examination of the evidence, I suppose the first, in point of time, and one which stands apart from all the rest, in consequence of the sitting Member being the party immediately connected, is that of Aird, the porter. The sum that is involved (and that is common to all the charges of bribery, and to all the charges of treating, too) is trifling in the last degree, and it would have had less importance, I think, if it had not just been for this appearance of large expenditure throughout, and the disposition to make large expenditure. I do not believe that Mr. Grieve had the slightest intention of actually bribing this man; but it was a very unfortunate thing for him to do; and I daresay he might think that it was so, perhaps, immediately afterwards. It is said that it could not be wrong, because it was done in public. Its evil, looking to the value and the small sum involved, is perhaps just because it was done in public. It was a very liberal thing to give a man half-a-crown for doing a thing which, if it was necessary that he should do it at all, he would have been content to have done for a sixpence. It was a display of a kind of liberality, and it was a display of that kind of liberality just at the end of a conversation with the man about how he and his fellow voters were going to vote, and it was done in the presence of the fellow-voters, which seems to me to aggravate it. But although I think that it was an unfortunate thing, and ought not to have been done, I cannot look upon it as an act of bribery, and I cannot sustain it as a ground upon which to set aside an election. If it had been an act of bribery, if there had been other circumstances which made the sum, small as it is, appear to have been given to this man for the purpose of inducing him to vote, then there is no doubt the smallness of the sum would not have exempted the act from its consequences.

There is the case of Lindsay, the shoemaker, who was supposed to have been endeavoured to be got out of the way by sending him to Glasgow. As this case stood upon the evidence for the Petitioner, I must say I was extremely impressed with it. It appeared to me to be a case that it was difficult to explain away if the facts were as they stood then; but since that we have had the evidence of Captain Campbell as to what took place upon the first night of the visit, which is not very material; and we have the evidence of Mr. Dennistoun, who is the man who is said to have made the corrupt proposal. Now I do not in the least degree give more credit to Mr. Dennistoun than I give to any other witness. Mr. Dennistoun, I have no doubt, is a gentleman entitled to credit; he has done a good deal, however, to disable him here as a witness by having taken this large sum, and he must be received, and all those law agents must be received, subject to the reservation which is made when the question comes to be considered as to the influence and consistency of their own acts. But looking at this as a jury question, and weighing the whole of the evidence together with it, I am sufficiently satisfied that Mr. Dennistoun's account of the matter was correct; and I rather think (though in that, of course, I may be mistaken) that I see an explanation of the whole thing without the supposition that there is any wilful falsehood upon the other side. In the first place, the man Lindsay himself knows nothing about the matter; the question is what took place in his house when he was away at the morning post; the boy who was brought here I do not for a moment imagine came here to tell us an untruth, but I was impressed with the notion that the boy was speaking more or less from the effect of probably repeated discussions of this matter. I may be wrong in that; I have seen a child much younger than that a valuable witness, but I cannot say that this boy's evidence impressed me as giving additional weight to the case; but the mother is a more important person. Now, Mr. Dennistoun standing in the doorway, speaking across the breadth of the outer room to the mother who was at the inner door, and merely looking through it

Greenock.

(she had not her clothes on even at the time) did speak about the man going to Glasgow; but he says, which is a very natural thing, "Has he gone to Glasgow?" He said he had an idea that the man was doubtful about his vote, and that possibly he might have just gone off to escape out of the way. As there had been some talk apparently about birds on a former occasion, the woman may possibly, not hearing very perfectly what was said, and possibly having her own idea as to the great propriety and prudence of her husband not going to vote for Mr. Christie, but rather going to vote for Mr. Grieve, and pleasing these gentlemen who had called and talked about the birds, have been very willing at least to adopt that view of what Mr. Dennistoun said, and may have possibly thought it was what he said, and she seems to have been active to send off and prevent even her husband from coming home and getting away to Glasgow, intimating great willingness on her part, I think, that he should go. There is, I think, the explanation. She instantly sent off the man Adams to try and catch her husband, but Adams, however, was on the other side, and would not have done her any good.

Now there is the case of a bet, which, it was said, McGregor had offered to pass on to Mathieson; that is to say, if he gained his bet of 1*l.* he was to give Mathieson 1*l.* All I can say about that is, that, looking at that as a jury, I am satisfied that McGregor's account of that is true. We have not got old Mr. Mathieson's evidence; I do not know that that would throw any light upon the matter; the case is really not proved, and I am myself individually impressed with the conviction that Mathieson was right.

Then there was the case of McLachlan, a moulder, who said Mr. Duncan Hendry offered to give him work; there is only that one witness, McLachlan; he is contradicted by Hendry, and therefore there is no case. But if I am bound to make up my mind about it, I say again that, looking to the whole evidence, I am impressed with the idea that McLachlan's account is not correct.

There is the case of Lafferty, who says that Mr. Boyd, the same man who had promised to get a subscription for Calder, had offered to get him into work if he could. Now Boyd does not dispute that he said he would try and get the poor man into work; he was in bad health, and seems not to have been fit for work since; but Boyd said he would do that, and that he said to him that it would be quite independently of his vote. I see no reason to doubt that that was the way of it, and ultimately the man voted for Mr. Christie; I cannot look upon that as an attempt by Boyd to bribe. It is a very serious thing indeed to find a man guilty of an attempt to bribe; it involves him in very heavy consequences, but I cannot say that there is upon my mind any impression that it has been proved that Boyd did that with a corrupt motive.

There is the case of Hector Ross, which has been given up by the Petitioner upon the ground that the agency of Brodie, the man who was said to have given the money, has not been proved; but in that case there is a most painful conflict of evidence, and that not of one witness against another witness as in some of the cases, but of several witnesses upon each side. I think it right to say there again, as the case was very fully investigated and the evidence tested as much as possible, that the impression left upon my mind is, that the evidence of Mr. Brodie, and of a man, I think, of the name of Raff, who was with him, is true. What may be the explanation of the evidence given upon the other side I cannot take upon me to say; whether there was any confusion or any mistake I cannot say; but I certainly am not impressed with the evidence of those witnesses who were called to support that case.

Now I pass on to the cases of undue influence, leaving the few remaining cases of treating which I have not already disposed of to be spoken of afterwards.

There is the case of Bain, who is said to have been intimidated, or concussed, or threatened by McIndoe with the loss of his house. McIndoe was the factor for a large tenement or tenements, apparently containing a good many tenants, and it is said that he threatened to turn this man out. There is also some evidence for the purpose of showing that he or his wife said that they had the authority of the landlady, but that was not authority, as I read it, to turn the people out, but rather that the landlady wished that they would vote in a particular way. I can hardly believe that they would have turned those people out; they would by so doing have depreciated the value of the property extremely, but it seems to me that, upon the whole evidence, there is no appearance, taking it at the strongest, of anything that I could hold to be intimidation or undue influence for the purpose of setting aside the election. That would require to be something very decided indeed. I rather look upon it that the whole that took place between those parties is perfectly capable of the construction that it was truly, after all, a somewhat bantering or possibly braggadocio conversation between the two parties.

The other cases of undue influence are of a much more serious kind in their nature. It is the allegation that men working in public yards were threatened with being turned away from their employment if they did not vote as their employers wished them. In one case it takes the rather different aspect of a man being promised to be kept on if he did vote as his master wished. In substance and in spirit the thing is of course the same, though that case would go under a different legal category. Nothing can be more important to be checked than this. It is to be checked for the freedom of election, and it is to be checked as a monstrous operation against workmen. We have seen in this trial how very serious indeed the consequences of such an exercise of power may be, because we have had the evidence of a number of workmen in which it has come out that, from the way in which the works are necessarily conducted, fluctuating in point of amount, of employment from week to week, according as orders come in and orders get executed, and patterns can be got, men are constantly dispensed with and taken on; and, accordingly ingly, there is the greatest possible facility for exercising a power which would be of the most grievous description if it were corruptly exercised. Therefore, I cannot imagine any form of undue influence which would be so perfectly obnoxious. But, looking at these cases generally, and taking them in the mass in the first instance, the first matter that strikes me is, that it is, to say the least of it, a very important circumstance, in my opinion, that there is clear evidence that there was, at the time of the election, and that there continued to be for some time subsequently a slackness of work in this department of the employment. That is a material fact, because it implies the necessity for the dismissal of men, and it would require that it should be shown, and shown distinctly, as far as dismissal goes, that the men were not dismissed in consequence of their not voting as their employers wished. Now I think that, upon the whole of that part of the case of the dismissal of the men, the case has failed. I think there is nothing that can satisfy me that the men were in any one instance that has been spoken of dismissed in consequence of their vote. Some of them were dismissed who had voted for Mr. Christie when their employers were ardent friends of Mr. Grieve, but that might have happened although their employers had resolved, in the most serious way, that the election should have no influence at all upon their conduct to their workmen. If their employers did resolve upon that they just did their duty, and did that which, as employers, they ought to do, and that which I should hope employers generally do. We had the evidence of one very extensive employer indeed in the witness-box, Mr. John Scott, and I was perfectly satisfied by his evidence that it was his sincere desire that that should be the course of action in regard to the two extensive works with which he is connected.

But while I am of opinion that there is no case made out of the dismissal of men in consequence of voting against Mr. Grieve, there remains another form of charge, and that is, that there were intimidating communications made to the men by the overseers. Objection has been taken to the men being canvassed in the works. That is a matter about which really I cannot undertake to express any very decided opinion. The men themselves, I should say from what we heard, do not like it. I do not know that it sounds altogether a very pleasant thing, and, probably, it is a thing that had much better be dispensed with upon any future occasion. Everything of the sort that is liable to bring about suspicion and ill-humour may lead to charges of this sort, and to investigations which might otherwise never have taken place.

But, in regard to the evidence as to the foremen having threatened the men that they would be put away if they did not vote as their employers wished in Mr. Steele's yard, McWilliam was the man so charged. Now, I must say that I am not at all satisfied that McWilliam said anything that could be founded upon as going at all in that direction. I think that, upon the whole, taking the evidence of McKilnee and McKee on the one side, and McWilliam upon the other, and applying to it the best judgment that I can, the matter is explained in such a way as must prevent my making use of it as a ground to invalidate the election.

Then there is the case of the Greenock foundry, and there were there the cases of Kidd and Johnstone and the case of Bissell. Kidd and Johnstone, I think, were dismissed by Gallacher, and it is said that Gallacher could not bind Mr. Grieve; that is to say, that Gallacher's action in that matter could not invalidate the election. I am not satisfied of that. I understand that there is no ground to hold that Bain was not an agent. He canvassed, and Bain being an agent to canvass, I rather think that if Bain employed a person under him to canvass, Mr. Grieve is compromised by Bain's proceedings in that matter.

The doctrine that was stated by Mr. Christie upon the subject of agency, as I understood it, I fully adopt. I think that there are three principles applicable to three kinds of matters. There is, first of all, the strictest of all principles, that which is applicable to a criminal charge; and there you are responsible for nothing at all except your own individual guilt. That is a thing consistent with ordinary common sense. There is then the principle that is applicable to actions of a civil kind raised against a party on the ground of a wrong done, and in which it is proved that the wrong was done by the defender's agent; that is to say, a person employed by the defender while he was doing the thing which he was employed to do; but there there comes in the principle that he was employed to do the particular work, and that he was not employed to do the wrong. Then there is the third class of cases with which we are at present engaged, where, in these election petitions, it being proved that a candidate is having his election carried on by a committee or by certain canvassers, those canvassers do something which, if the candidate is responsible for it, will invalidate the election, and it is held that he is responsible for it in the sense of making the validity of the election depend upon it. I do not see how these election petitions would be of the least use otherwise, because I suppose that there are very few candidates indeed who undertake the practice of corruption by their own hand. I presume there are equally few candidates, or very nearly so, who ever say to their agents that they are to proceed corruptly in the matter. I do not think, however, that that is more than a question of law in the present case, because, upon the facts it appears to me that there is not sufficient evidence that because Gallacher dismissed those men they were dismissed in consequence of their having voted against the wish of their master, or that he made any communication to them beforehand which can go to invalidate the election.

Bain, the foreman in the work, appears to me not to have carried out very accurately or well what I understand to have been his employer's, Mr. Scott's, instructions. I think he went further than Mr. Scott would have entirely approved of, and had more communication with the men and talked more to them about their votes, and in a way which probably would have been checked if Mr. Scott had known of it; but I do not think that anything that he did or said amounted to intimidation or undue influence of the workmen. I think the workmen were canvassed, and they might have thought that disagreeable. They were spoken to, perhaps, and he might have said to them, "You had better vote for Mr. Grieve;" and they might have their own idea about it, that perhaps they might meet with consequences if they did not comply with the wishes thus expressed. I think it would be a great deal better if no such canvassing of workmen went on, but it would require to go much beyond that to entitle me to find that there had been such undue influence as to set aside the election.

Those are the only cases of that description, and I am left only to deal with the cases of treating. There is the case of McLachlan, who says that along with the man Simpson, Mr. McCallum, one of the law agents, treated him to spirits at the "Buck's Head." Now, if this had proved to be the fact, which certainly, upon the evidence of those two men in the course of the Petitioner's proof, I suppose it would have been, I should have doubted excessively if there was any case of corrupt treating in the sense of the statute. It was not a pleasant thing to learn that, early in the forenoon, a law agent had taken two men, about whom he seems to have known nothing at all, into a public-house and sat down to drink with them. It would have been a discreditable sort of thing; but, looking to the exceedingly trifling amount, it could scarcely be supposed that he was to get their votes or influence their votes in any degree by giving it to them. But it was capable, I think, of this explanation, that he wanted to canvass them; he wanted to discuss the merits of the election and of the respective candidates with them, and turned in there in order that they might do so; and, perhaps his position in life made it natural that he should have paid the bill. The bill must have been a shilling, we are told, and could not exceed it. Therefore if that case had been proved too, I should not have been prepared to have upset the election upon that ground. But then we have the evidence of Mr. McCallum himself, and he positively denies it; and we have his evidence confirmed by Mr. Brodie, who was said by both men to have served the drink; and he denies that he ever saw them there, and says that he would have remembered it. It is a very unfortunate conflict of evidence. The case upon that matter was not proved, and I think would not have been sufficient if it had been proved; but I am bound to say that I think there is not evidence to lead me to suppose that in this matter we have got a false account of the matter from Mr. McCallum.

There comes, then, the case of Paterson, the lamplighter. It has been said that the sum expended was very trifling—it was perfectly contemptible; but it is only more unfortunate, in one sense of the word at least, that about such a contemptible sum any question whatever should have been raised. It is also said that treating must be a practice, unless it is of such a kind that it can be taken as a positive immediate bribe as if it were so much value, for giving a vote. I cannot say that I am satisfied with that construction of the statute. The Interpretation Clause of the late Act undoubtedly is an interpretation clause of corrupt practices, but bribery comes in as well as treating. If treating be well made out, although you may not suppose that a man was influenced by it as he would have been influenced by a bribe (that is to say, that there are other feelings brought into play in consequence of a man being very handsomely treated in that way, and I can suppose instances of it), a solitary case will not, I think, set aside an election; and I have only to express my hope that in Greenock, hereafter, all men of all parties connected with the election will endeavour, absolutely and entirely, to avoid everything of the sort. I may say that I have found more difficulty about this matter, small as it is, than about any other case in the whole course of the investigation. The man was a person, from what we saw of him in the box, I think, capable of being moved by a very small amount of treating of that kind, and Mr. Hamilton Brown, who did it, was at that time engaged in canvassing. It was just within two days of the election, I think, and by that time Mr. Campbell Smith has told us that he was engaged in canvassing some voters; but upon the whole matter I cannot come to the conclusion that this was done with a corrupt intention of treating. I think it was a very rash proceeding. We did not see Mr. Brown in the witness-box, but he seems to have gone into the house and found a poor man there, who, he supposed, I daresay, would rather expect some kind treatment that could scarcely be called hospitality in his own house, and he gave him that, I should think, without the intention of thereby getting his vote. I must say that I can conceive other persons taking a different view of the matter. I think it is a point that balances very nicely indeed, and I have felt, I confess, some difficulty in deciding it, but the decision which I have announced is that to which, after much consideration, I have come.

The only remaining matter is one upon which I have already expressed what is the result of my opinion; namely, the matter of the meeting at the "Wheatsheaf." It seems to me that the meeting was accidental, and that that is its character, and that out of that character I think it loses the quality of being a corrupt proceeding. I do not think there was any intention to influence anybody at all, but that there was a general hilarity created by the termination of the election and its known result, and that out of that Mr. McLachlan and Captain Campbell were induced, suddenly, to get up a manifesto of their extreme joyfulness. It could not influence the election, for the election was over; but I do not think it was intended to act upon or reward anybody for anything which had taken place in regard to the election.

I have only, in conclusion, to announce the certificate which I must make to the Speaker

Speaker of the House of Commons in the matter. I find and determine that Mr. James Johnstone Grieve was duly elected, and duly returned a Member to serve in Parliament for the burgh of Greenock; and I shall further report that it has not been proved that any corrupt practice has been committed by, or with the knowledge and consent, of any candidate at the election, and that there is no reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the election.

Upon looking over the whole matter with very much anxiety, I have not found any ground upon which I can avoid the ordinary conclusion of such an investigation, and I must find that the losing party is responsible for the costs.

Mr. Lancaster moved for the costs of the returning officer.

GUILDFORD ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Willes, 22nd January 1869.

Guildford.

Mr. Justice Willes.] THIS petition asks that the return of Mr. Onslow, as Member for the Borough to serve in Parliament, should be declared void on several grounds, some of which, though laid in the petition, have not been supported by any evidence, and others as to which evidence was offered, have been disposed of in the course of the case. Those which remain, I proceed shortly to dispose of now.

The ground which was first laid in proof was, that Mr. Onslow, by himself or his agents, had been guilty of treating; that is, of plying voters with meat or drink, for the purpose of ingratiating himself with them, and inducing them to vote for him. In order to establish that, witnesses were called for the purpose of showing that there were meetings of Mr. Onslow's supporters at a variety of public-houses for some considerable time before the election, and that at those meetings drinking went on, which, it was suggested, must have been paid for by Mr. Onslow, or some person standing in the relation of an agent to him, because some of the witnesses did not observe that it was paid for by the particular persons who drank, because in two instances witnesses who ordered the small quantities of drink, upon offering to pay, were told by the landlord that it was all right, and went away without paying. With respect to those two instances, however, it appears that the persons were not voters. With respect to the drink which was supplied, it was supplied in quantities which were not in excess of what people might casually order who attended meetings held at public-houses, each for his particular thirst, intending to pay, and not as a crowd of persons might do, who were present at assemblies where drink was supplied at the expense of somebody else. The general evidence of the drink at those public-house meetings, however, appears to be insufficient to establish a treating by Mr. Onslow, or by an agent of Mr. Onslow; and he having been called, and evidence having been given of what the real character of the meetings at the public-houses was, it satisfactorily appears that they were not traps for voters who were fond of drink, and who might be caught to vote for Mr. Onslow by being supplied with drink for nothing, but they were what Mr. White, who I suppose was the originator of them, would have no objection to have called debating societies; that they were, whatever they were called, branch committees, substituted for the committee appointed by the candidate, which, under the old style of carrying on elections, it was usual to have sitting during the election.

With respect to specific instances in which drink was ordered at the expense of somebody for others, paid for not by those who drank it, I think it now pretty clear that they have been reduced in the course of the evidence to the case of treating, by a person named Simmonds, of the workmen who were employed upon a particular building; I may pass by the King of Charlotteville (as Mr. Simmonds was called) with that remark.

There is one other case, that of Linagar. It is alleged that Mr. Onslow gave Linagar half-a-crown, with the direction to treat the company, but Linagar gave his evidence in such an odd way, and rang such changes upon the shilling he first alleged was laid down upon the table, and then the sixpence and the fourpence given him by some other persons who he said were present, and the half-crown that was given him when Mr. Onslow was going away in his carriage, with a direction under such public circumstances to treat the company, that one can hardly suppose that Mr. Onslow should have committed such a suicidal act under such circumstances; and Mr. Onslow's explanation, or rather contradiction, of the way in which the half-a-crown was given, namely, that it was given to pay for a glass of gin-and-water, and he expected to get the change, which he afterwards demanded, is entirely satisfactory to remove the evidence given by Linagar with respect to that transaction. As for treating the half-a-crown as a bribe, I did not understand that to be suggested by Mr. Overend; if it was, it is disposed of in the same breath as the case of treating which is supposed to hang on the same evidence. So much with respect to treating. There is no case of treating made out.

Secondly, it is said there was a case of undue influence; that a person named Wilson was unduly influenced, by being told that Mr. Onslow would get him turned out of his employment as a scavenger under the local board. Wilson may have talked over that case till he made himself and other persons fancy that there was something in it; but, taking Wilson's own evidence, and his manner in the box, it will hardly be expected that I should say anything more about the case than that I concur with him in what I collected was his own conclusion, that there really was no influence intended or understood by him at all. I must say, taking all his evidence together, I think his manner was anything but that of a man who had undergone such gross oppression as it would have been to do what is imputed in this respect to Mr. Onslow, and I think that that oppression is not made out by the evidence. Of course, if it had been made out, it would equally have defeated the election as the treating if made out.

The charges of bribery are the next to be dealt with, and that is the only class of objection to the election that remains. First, I may take Rogers's case. Rogers's case is said to take this form: Rogers, upon being canvassed by Mr. Onslow, stated that a sum of money was due to him in respect of the election of a candidate of the same colour as Mr. Onslow at the former election; that thereupon Mr. Onslow did procure to be paid, or really did pay, the debt due from Mr. Long, with some three or four pounds over, in order to induce the voter Rogers to give his vote for Mr. Onslow. That case has been so much observed upon in the course of the inquiry, that I do not think I need dwell upon it now. I am far from saying that there is not evidence that Mr. Onslow did use interest to get that debt paid. I must go that length, I think. There is evidence that he did interest himself to get that debt paid. I put that rather upon his own account of the matter than upon the statement of Rogers; but the bare fact of his having urged Mr. Long to pay what was due, if anything was due, in order to set Rogers's mind entirely free from any influence in respect of his supposed ill-treatment at the former election, though it might be evidence of an intention in Mr. Onslow's mind to influence the voter thereby, I think is not such evidence as I can safely act upon. Then, with respect to that excessive payment of five sovereigns, it may be, as was suggested by Mr. Overend, that the mode in which Rogers gave his evidence was due to the man's illness or distraction, or confusion; that it was not due to any cause which would interfere with his credibility; certainly my impression at the time was that Rogers's evidence, considering the manner in which it was given, was not evidence which it would be safe to rely upon, except in so far as it is confirmed, and I do not think that it is confirmed, by the part of Mr. Onslow's evidence properly commented upon by Mr. Overend, to the extent necessary to establish bribery. I do not say that it was a case which it was wrong, even at the end of the case, to comment upon and to dwell upon; but the result of my consideration of that case is, that I cannot, in the case of an election in which, as a general rule, I must infer that there was no bribery, and do infer that there was no bribery, on the part of Mr. Onslow of this vulgar kind, come to the conclusion that that 5*l.* came from Mr. Onslow, or from one of his agents. It is a circumstance which throws some light upon another part of the case, if Rogers were believed, as seeming to show that there was some fund from which money did come, though in dribblets, on behalf of Mr. Onslow's side. That is the extent to which I think the evidence in Rogers's case goes; I am not satisfied to act upon that as a case in which bribery was made out.

Then there is Smith's case, in which it is suggested that Mr. Williamson, who is a tradesman in the town, in his boasting of having made a good bargain, by which he was to have 300*l.* benefit, told the witness, to use his own expression, that he was to have "a tenner" if he voted for Mr. Onslow. I pass that over, by saying that that transaction makes a different impression upon my mind from what it did upon Mr. Smith's, if Mr. Smith really thought he was to have 10*l.* from Mr. Williamson if he voted for Mr. Onslow. I do not think that was the way in which the transaction is to be viewed. I have already said this morning, if Counsel wished Mr. Williamson to be called, I should send for him; but it does not appear to me that that is a case to which any real importance is to be attached. I am rather surprised at Mr. Smith supposing that it was intended that he should have that sum.

With respect to Sutcliffe's case, in which Mrs. Gyatt was alleged to have offered him 5*l.* to vote for Mr. Onslow, the proof of Mrs. Gyatt's agency failed, and, furthermore, she was called, and gave an account of the transaction which made an end of the matter.

Then came Bellchambers' case, and Bellchambers was the one spoken to by Miss Jane Green. Bellchambers himself, being called, denied that he had been bribed (4*l.* I think was the sum mentioned), or that 4*l.* or any sum had been offered him. The most that Miss Green's evidence amounted to was, that Bellchambers told her that he had been offered 4*l.* That is a state of evidence in which, if Miss Green be right that Bellchambers did state that he had been offered 4*l.*, his statement behind the back of Mr. Onslow ought not to bind him. There was a further piece of evidence with respect to that, given by Frederick Cutts, of something that passed at the committee-room. He went into the committee-room and heard a conversation about 4*l.*, and about Bellchambers. I cannot say (there being the opportunity of asking Mr. Onslow and his agent about that, and no questions having been asked) that I ought to attach importance to what Frederick Cutts overheard. It is a very slippery sort of evidence, the evidence not of what was said or done by the party, but the evidence of a person who casually goes into the room and hears a conversation, which resulted in a statement, "he must not be lost," and "we cannot afford to lose him"; and upon that I am to suppose that the persons who went to bring Bellechambers to the poll, if they did go to bring him to the poll, went not only to induce him to come, but also to bribe him. That is an inference entirely too remote, Bellechambers having been called, and having positively denied that he was bribed, or that any promise was made to bribe him.

Then there is Poulter's case, with respect to the chest of drawers; I think, weighing the evidence of Poulter with his own statement, that no bargain was actually made; against the evidence of Mr. Onslow, I must say I think Poulter's kicks the beam.

I think I have now gone through all the cases, with the exception of the case of Corson and the case of Glyn. They stand very much upon the same footing, though Corson appears in a better light than Glyn, because Corson was consistent throughout. He appears to have promised, as Glyn also did, to vote for Mr. Onslow, and he appears, so far as the evidence goes, to have kept that resolution throughout; whereas Glyn either changed his mind, or represented that he had changed his mind, under the influence of his wife in the letter to Madame Postelle.

I speak of them as the case of Corson and Glyn, having made that distinction between them to which Corson is entitled. It appears that they were persons who were employed upon the Ordnance Survey, and that they were properly upon the register of voters preceding the election, and being so they had the power of voting. They had before the election ceased to reside at Guildford; not temporarily left Guildford, as some of us have left our homes, without changing their residence, but they had actually ceased to have any residence in Guildford, and they had gone away to reside at Chester; they had no residence, except at Chester, at the time of the election, or at the time when they were written to by Mr. Onslow, to come and vote at the election. They had no right, and were not entitled to vote at the election. Mr. Onslow stated that he was astonished, I think he said utterly astonished, at learning that that was so. However, that astonishment, I have no doubt, has ceased, because he will probably have had the curiosity to look at the 79th section of the 6th and 7th of the Queen, c. 18, which requires that: "No person shall be entitled to vote at any future election for a Member or Members to serve in Parliament for any city or borough, unless he shall ever since the 31st day of July, in the year in which his name was inserted in the register of voters then in force, have resided, and at the time of voting shall continue to reside, within the city or borough or place sharing in the election for the city or borough, in the election for which he shall claim to be entitled to vote," or within the statutory distance. The particular sanction for that in the statute is to be found in the 98th section of the Act, by which the Committee, upon a scrutiny, and now the Judge, amongst other things, is "to inquire into and decide upon the right to vote of any person who, being upon the register of voters in force at the time of such election, shall have voted in such election, or not being upon such register, shall have tendered his vote at such election, in case the name of such person shall have been specially retained upon such register, or inserted therein, or expunged, or omitted therefrom, by the express decision of the revising barrister, who shall have revised the list of voters from which such register shall have been formed; and also, that it shall and may be lawful for such Committee, to inquire and decide upon the right to vote of any person who, being upon such register, shall have voted in such election, so far as the same may be disputed, on the ground of legal incapacity at the time of his voting under and by virtue of any statute now or hereafter to be in force, or on the ground of any other legal incapacity at the time of his voting, which may have arisen, subsequently to the expiration of the time allowed for making out the list of voters from which the register of voters in force at the time of such election shall have been formed." It is unquestionable, therefore, that neither of those persons had a right to vote, and for an obvious reason, because it is intended that the Member who is sent to represent a borough, shall be elected by the residents of the borough; he is to be the Member of the residents of the borough; a person who has ceased to reside in the borough at the time of voting is not entitled to vote, and if he does so, he filches away from every voter who is resident in the borough a portion of his right, because he diminishes the effect of the vote of each person who, as a resident, is by law entitled to vote at the election; and though Mr. Onslow was not aware of that (and I quite believe him when he says that he was astonished to hear that), Mr. Quilley was aware of that; he stated in the box yesterday that he knew that those persons being non-residents, were not entitled to vote, but seemed to think that it was yet fair tactics to take their vote, upon the chance of a scrutiny not being prayed, so that the votes might be struck off. According to that doctrine, the non-residents might actually swamp the residents; and where there is a narrow division, and a small majority in a borough, as frequently happens, you might have a dozen non-resident persons, having no more right to vote for Guildford than I have, and no more pretence for it, except their names appearing upon the register, and who are declared by Act of Parliament not entitled to vote, turning the scale, and returning a Member for a borough where they do not reside. It was wrong for them to vote, because it is wrong to do a thing that a person is not by law entitled to do, and which infringes upon the rights of others. It struck me at first that there might be an objection to the application of the law with respect to bribery in such cases, because it occurred to me that possibly the person to be bribed must be a person who was entitled to vote; that when the Act speaks of "a voter," it must mean a person who is entitled to vote; but I think that is not so. I think that "a voter" is a person who primâ facie has a right to vote, and that seems to be expressly enacted, I think, in the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, the 17th and 18th of the Queen, c. 102, section 38, because it says, "The word 'voter' shall mean any person who has or claims to have a right to vote in the election." These persons are persons who ought not to have voted.

Dealing with this subject of election law, which is a novelty to one's mind, one desires to keep within bounds, and to use no expressions except those that are necessary to convey clearly one's thoughts. I have been thinking of a case in which I myself would have the franchise if I resided within the statutory distance; but by reason of not doing so, by that 79th section I am not entitled to vote; and I have been thinking what would pass through my own mind if somebody said, "Never mind, go up and vote, you may never be found out; and unless there is a scrutiny, you will get in your Member all right." I think I should say, "Stay, stay; in order to strike me out on a scrutiny, it may cost the person against whom I vote a thousand pounds. What right have I to put the risk of such a loss upon another?" I think if I were a candidate, or the agent for a candidate, dealing with the case of a person who was upon the register, but whom I knew not to be entitled to vote, if I were to apply to such a person nevertheless to come up and give his vote, I should rightly be classed with those who would not play false, but yet would wrongly win. They are persons who have no right to vote. I have thought it necessary to dwell upon that, because it certainly does influence my mind in the case. They were persons who nevertheless were within the Act of the Queen against corrupt practices, and the next question is whether a corrupt practice actually took place in what was done in the case of those persons, or either of them. I will take the case of Corson. What it is clear was done was this. A letter was written by Mr. Hanford to Corson, of which I will give Corson's account. His account of the correspondence between him and Mr. Hanford is this. For the present, I do not refer to Mr. Onslow's letter, because that is only material to consider with reference to the question of agency; at present I am upon the question of corrupt practice within the statute. Corson wrote to say, "Being put to considerable expense in moving from Guildford to Chester, I could not possibly afford any further outlay at that time; but in the event of my being called upon to vote at the election, I wished to have my expenses guaranteed."

Mr. Serjeant Sargood.] May I beg to ask your Lordship whether you have "been called upon to vote"—the shorthand writer's note differs a little there; "in the event of my being called upon to attend the said election."

Mr. Justice Willes.] My note is "to vote." Do you suppose he was to attend for any other purpose than for the purpose of voting?

Mr. Serjeant Sargood.] Excuse my calling your Lordship's attention to it.

Mr. Justice Willes.] What I have of his re-examination makes it obvious what it was. "I could not have afforded to come; and I would not have voted unless my expenses had been paid." Your attendance is requested. What for? To vote. My note, correct or incorrect in words, I must therefore take to be right in substance. "In the event of my being called upon to vote at the election, I wished to have my expenses guaranteed." In answer to that, he says he got a letter from Mr. Hanford, which is not forthcoming, and of which he gave this account, "that the election was to take place on a certain date, and that if I came on that day, and called upon him, my expenses should be paid." That is my note of Mr. Hanford's letter. There can be no doubt that putting those two letters together, Mr. Hanford did intend that he should vote for Mr. Onslow, of whom Mr. Hanford was a supporter, and that he did promise that his expenses should be paid; and it hardly requires the authority of Slade's case at this time of day (though it is in point, and is a decision of the highest court in this kingdom) to show that that was a promise that the expenses should be paid, conditionally upon Corson voting for Mr. Onslow. Is that or is it not within the prohibition of the 17th and 18th of the Queen, c. 102? That was the very question that was discussed in Slade's case, and it is not affected by the subsequent legislation, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 87, s. 1, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, s. 36. There had been a difference of opinion whether a candidate might or might not promise the voters their travelling expenses if they came up and voted for him; whether that was such a promise of money conditional upon voting, as to be bribery within the definition of the 17th and 18th of the Queen, and amongst others, the late Sir Frederick Slade, a man of unquestioned honour, and a gentleman of considerable experience in this branch of the law, supposed, and no doubt honestly supposed, that it was not bribery; and he, accordingly, at the Cambridge election, authorised such promises to be made to voters. He was afterwards sued for penalties. The case went through many stages, and finally it arrived in the House of Lords; where on the 2nd of April 1858, it was decided, as Mr. Overend has pointed out, and Mr. Serjeant Sargood could not dispute, that such a promise was a corrupt practice within the statute; and though that may seem hard at first sight, it is anything but hard. It seems hard only to those whose minds have not reflected upon practices which I hope have nearly ceased at elections, or will soon cease, but which prevailed at one time to an extraordinary extent; practices by which, under various names (we have heard one of them in the course of this case), gratuities were given to voters under under the pretence of paying the expenses to which they had been subjected, but which, in the event, amounted to nothing less than bribes to voters; and, amongst other means of giving such bribes for voting, was excessive payment for travelling expenses, such as appeared in many instances to have been given in the Beverley case, reported in Wolferstone and Bristow's Cases, page 187, where the candidate would unquestionably have been unseated for payments similar to those made to Corson and Glyn in this case, but for the fact that agency was not proved; and, singularly enough, this case illustrates the propriety of excluding shifts of this description for concealing gratuities to voters; I do not say on the part of Mr. Hanford, because I think he is free from an imputation of that kind. I cannot say that of the men who made the overcharge, because when they come to be paid their expenses, what is Corson's account of what took place? It cost him 14*s.* 6*d.* to come from Chester here; give him 14*s.* 6*d.* to go back, that makes 29*s.* Take it that it required three days to come from Chester to Guildford to vote here, though that is longer than is necessary, and give that which would not be allowed under the system before Slade's case, namely 4*s.* 3*d.* a day (I think there is one authority for allowing that), that would come to 12*s.* 9*d.*, which, with the 29*s.*, would make 2*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* Allow 5*s.* a day for eating and drinking, which would be the allowance of a witness, and that would bring the amount to 2*l.* 16*s.* 9*d.*; not much more than half of what Corson calculated his expenses came to, and claimed at the hands of Mr. Hanford, and which he was paid, namely, 5*l.* Corson's explanation of the matter is, "I may have made it up over 5*l.*, but it was 5*l.* I think. Mr. Hanford told me not to stint myself, so as to be out of pocket. I thought I might as well charge first class" —he having travelled third. Whether you look, therefore, at this in a legal light, in respect of whether such a promise as was clearly made by Mr. Hanford, conditional upon coming up from Chester and voting, was within the Act of the Queen; or whether you look at it in a practical light, and judge of it by the result, it is quite obvious that each of those men received a sum of money beyond their expenses for coming up to vote at a place where, moreover, they had no right to vote. Therefore, those were persons who were within the Act, and there was in respect of them that which the Act calls a corrupt practice. Is that corrupt practice traced to Mr. Onslow, or to an agent of Mr. Onslow's? Now, with respect to that, there is evidence on both sides. The onerous duty has devolved upon me of weighing that evidence, and of seeing what is the just conclusion to be drawn as to whether the promise was made under such circumstances as to vitiate the election. It is unnecessary to go into any inquiry here as to general bribery; that is out of the question. I see no evidence whatsoever of the prevalence of bribery at the election, and nobody has suggested it. General bribery, the prevalence of corrupt practices, whether by the Member, whether by his agent, or whether by any undiscoverable person, bribery so general, that the Court should be satisfied that there was no free election, that there was only an apparent choice, and not a real one by the electors, would vitiate the election. I hope nobody will mistake, and suppose that because these inquiries turn happily upon individual cases, and upon whether those cases are traced to the Member or to an agent of his, that general corruption, quite apart from acts of the Member or his agent, would not have the effect of vitiating an election. It clearly would, because it would show that there was no pure or free choice in the matter; and that what took place was a scene and not a reality. However, that is out of the case here. There may also be bribery so large in amount as in itself to furnish evidence (and of that a remarkable instance has recently occurred within the knowledge of us all) not indeed of general bribery, but of bribery coming from a fund, with which it is impossible, as a matter of common sense, not to conclude that the Member, or at least an agent of his, was acquainted. In that case, the proper result would be the vitiation of the election; because the bribery being of such an extent, the probability was so strong that it must have come to the knowledge of the Member, or an agent of his, that the Court ought to conclude, at least, that it was with the knowledge and connivance of an agent, and that the election ought to be vitiated upon that ground. That, however, also is out of the question here. The inference, from the largeness of the payments made on account of the sitting Member, cannot be resorted to, because with the exception of the 5*l.* stated to have been paid to Rogers, and the sum of 10*l.* distributed between these two individuals, there is no evidence of a fund from which corrupt payments were made. Therefore, one must deal with this as a case in which it is necessary to establish, and the question is, whether that is established, that an agent, for whom Mr. Onslow is responsible, did make the conditional promise of payment. The person who made the payment was Mr. Hanford, and he did so in concert with Mrs. Hughes. Of course, Mr. Hanford could not be excused for what he did by acting under the directions of that lady. The only reason for mentioning her name is because the fact of her interference did at one time give very considerable significance to the act. Now, what is the evidence upon the one side and upon the other on this question on which the fate of the election depends? The evidence to show that Mr. Hanford, in doing what he did, was acting by the instigation of Mr. Onslow, is not such as I am called upon to pronounce a judgment upon. I see no evidence that could at all fix Mr. Onslow, in the sense of bringing him within the more penal clause of the Act of last Session. I therefore limit myself to that which is the practical question, whether there is such evidence that I ought to come to the conclusion that he is answerable for this act through his agent. The evidence of that is of this sort. Mr. Quilley was unquestionably the agent of Mr. Onslow in the election, so was Mr. Russell. Corson and Glynn stated, that upon informing Mr. Onslow that they would vote for him, they stated that it was likely that they might remove before the election;

but they were asked by Mr. Quilley for their address, or gave him their address. The information was given to Mr. Onslow that they would be likely to be away, and their address was left with Mr. Quilley. They removed to Chester, and the election being soon expected, upon the 4th of November this letter was written by Mr. Onslow, addressed to Corson: "My dear Sir,—We expect that the election will take place on or about the 15th of the month, but as to the exact day we shall let you know. I venture to inform you of this that you may know about the time I shall expect to see you. I am, yours, faithfully, Guildford Onslow."—That letter was dated from the committee-rooms at the "White Lion." The address is in Mr. Quilley's handwriting. That letter does not come within Slade's case; it is a request that they should come; it says nothing about the expenses. That of itself is not sufficient to fix Mr. Onslow, and I do not think Mr. Overend even suggested, that standing alone, that letter had any such significance as to be within the statute. It is clear to my mind that it has not. It only raises a suspicion that it might have been thought probable that those men would not have come without their expenses, a suspicion which one ought not to act upon. That letter having been written to Corson, he soon after wrote back an answer; the answer was, he says, addressed to Mr. Onslow. That letter I have already referred to. It was, according to Corson, a letter stating that he had been put to considerable expense in moving from Guildford to Chester, and that he could not possibly afford any further outlay, and would expect to be guaranteed his expenses in the event of his attending or voting. The language seems to import the same thing; attending effectually; attending for Mr. Onslow's purpose. That letter was written, according to Corson, to Mr. Onslow. Glyn appears to have relied upon Corson's letter; he does not appear to have written a distinct letter of his own. Corson receiving no answer from Mr. Onslow, soon after received a letter from Mr. Hanford, in effect, stating (I need not recite it further), when the election was to take place; and if he came and called upon Mr. Hanford his expenses should be paid. Upon that he did come to Guildford, and he did vote; he met Mr. Hanford in the street, went with him to the newspaper office, and there gave the account of his expenses, which I have already observed upon, and received 5 l. He did not see Mr. Onslow or Mr. Quilley, or apparently anybody else connected with Mr. Onslow; he only saw Mr. Hanford in the matter, and I think Mrs. Hughes. I think there was some cross-examination as to the amount of his expenses not having been sent in. I do not know that anything much hangs upon that; it is perhaps a circumstance that may be referred to as forming part of the evidence on that matter. Now, Mr. Hanford is the person who takes this course, and Mr. Hanford is on Mr. Onslow's side, and was an active supporter of his for some time before the election. Was he a supporter in the sense which would make him an agent, or which would supply evidence of his agency? It appears from his statement, and that of Mr. White, that district committees—I must call them committees, because they were committees—they consisted of persons to whom the conduct of the election in the district was committed, and they did attend to it just as a committee would called by the old name; there was more talking at them than probably would have taken place at one of the more old-fashioned committees; I think Mr. White said that they had the effect of developing some very fine Parliamentary eloquence; but with the exception of that, if that be an essential difference, I observe none between them and what would ordinarily be called a committee, except that the committee, as so constituted, had several heads, whereas an ordinary committee would have but one. Mr. Hanford was in the habit of attending, from time to time, at those meetings. He has not proved, and he denies, himself that he was a committee-man either at the general committee or at those district committees; and the account given of his interposition by Mr. White was, that he, Mr. Hanford, having the gift of eloquence, used to be invited to attend at the meetings, and used to address the audience there. I think the result is, you have it that a person who was very desirous that Mr. Onslow should be returned, and who was very active in the cause, and who was in the habit of attending and making speeches at the committees, but who was not a member, according to him and Mr. White, of the body acting either upon the general committee or upon those local committees, was the man through whom the promise and that payment were made. As a rule, it appears to me, that an authority from the candidate or his agent to canvass or procure votes on his behalf, is the test of agency. I do not limit the agency within those bounds, because it is quite obvious to my mind, especially from the astute remarks of Mr. White, that agency may, under the new system, assume a novel form, in which it will be necessary for the Court to recognise it; but as a rule, and I do not feel disposed to make exceptions to rules without seeing very clearly that the exception is not within the spirit of the rule; as a rule, agency to bind the Member would be agency to canvass or to procure votes on his behalf. Such agency is not proved on the part of Mr. Hanford; such agency he denies; he says he had no agency of that description. I believe that these are the circumstances on behalf of the affirmative of Mr. Hanford being an agent, and they are accompanied by the remarkable fact of 10 l. being freely paid out, with an encouragement to the voters not to stint themselves in their account, taking Corson's evidence, paid out by persons, who, whatever other interest they might take in the election, could hardly be expected to expend so much money even on the part of a favourite candidate. That was a case affording, it appears to me, considerable, if not strong, inference, as it stood, that Mr. Hanford must have been set to work to do this by some agent at least of Mr. Onslow. Now, however, I must take the evidence on the other side; because, whilst this is the inference that might be drawn from the case unanswered, I must take care I am not prejudiced prejudiced by the first word, and I must carefully consider also what was brought before the court on the other side. On the other side, in answer to that inferential case, Mr. Hanford and Mrs. Hughes were brought forward; and though Mr. Overend, for the Petitioners, felt himself bound, no doubt exercising a proper discretion, to put Mr. Hanford and Mrs. Hughes into the box, and indeed he lost nothing by it, because they must have been called on the part of the Respondent if they had not been called on the part of the Petitioners, I treat them as witnesses on the part of the Respondent. Mr. Hanford and Mrs. Hughes being called, Mr. Hanford denied first, generally, that he was ever present at the committee at the "White Lion;" he denied, in effect, his being a member of what could be called a committee at any of the other places, and Mr. White corroborated him that his attendance there was as a speaker, and that that was the only part he took in the matter; he admitted having received various circulars which I have read, and which, so far as they relate to the formation of the executive committee, I think end some time in September, but which, with respect to the district committees and the power to introduce an elector, or even a friend if he thought proper, ran up close to the time of election. Though he admitted having received what I may call the circulars, he denied, and there is nothing to countervail that denial, that he did receive any authority from Mr. Onslow or any agent of his to canvass on his behalf; and moreover it appearing that Mr. Onslow did issue authorities to canvass, or to continue the canvass on his behalf, to other persons by circulars, one of which was produced, dated the 9th of November, Mr. Hanford stated that no such circular did come to his hands. With respect to the particular transaction in question, he says that he was not set agoing by any person who has been connected with Mr. Onslow; that he was not set agoing by Mr. Quilley or Mr. Russell, who made visits to Mrs. Hughes about the time that this transaction took place (which by-the-bye I ought to have mentioned as part of the evidence to sustain the affirmative); that he did not act under the instigation of Mr. Onslow or Mr. Quilley, or any person connected with Mr. Onslow, but that having learnt from a corporal in the Engineers, whose name he gave as Laing, that those men would be willing to come to Guildford if their expenses were paid, and learning their address, not from Mr. Quilley, with whom they had left it, but from the corporal, who would naturally know of it, he mentioned to Mrs. Hughes the fact that those two persons whose names were on the register were at Chester, and that they would be willing to come up if their expenses were paid or were guaranteed. Upon that he says, Mrs. Hughes told him to write to them, and that he did write to them a letter, stating that their expenses would be paid if they attended the election. Then Mrs. Hughes was called; Mrs. Hughes says, "My husband, who was a supporter of Mr. Onslow, had shortly before died, and was only just buried, and it is true that I, out of my own heart, when I learned from Mr. Hanford that the men would come up and vote if their expenses was paid, told Mr. Hanford I would pay them myself; I did not know at the time how much it would be, but I did direct the writing of the letter." She said, it is true that Mr. Russell and Mr. Quilley called upon me, Mr. Russell before the election and Quilley soon after; she thought after the election, but she says that nothing passed with them or any agent of Mr. Onslow with respect to the matter; and she stated (and so far as language went, she was unshaken in her statement) that this was an act to which she and Mr. Hanford were parties, and that it was not an act suggested by any agent of Mr. Onslow. Mr. Onslow was called; he denied receiving the letter of Corson, stating that his coming would be conditional upon his expenses being guaranteed; he says that there were other out-voters; he denies that he gave any authority to pay the expenses of out-voters, or to promise the payment of expenses of out-voters; so much for Mr. Onslow. Mr. Russell, the agent for the general management of the election and for election expenses, was called; he did not interfere much; he also states that he knew nothing of the matter. Mr. Quilley was called; Mr. Quilley, certainly I thought in the first instance, meant to say that he knew nothing of Mr. Onslow's letter to Corson, but if he meant that (that was the impression upon my mind, it may be an erroneous one) he certainly was mistaken, because the letter to Corson was directed by Mr. Quilley himself; he denies that he had had anything to do with promising to pay the expenses of those out-voters, or that he, or anyone to his knowledge, or with his authority, had had anything to do with promising to pay the expenses of the out-voters. He was asked about his knowledge that those people had a right to vote, and he obviously was quite aware that, having ceased to reside, they had no right to vote; I do not choose to make any further remarks upon that part of the case. He was asked whether he expected those men to come up without having their expenses paid, and he said "No, I thought somebody would pay them, I did not know who; I abstained from informing myself who would pay them; I chose to be within the law, and I did not inform myself upon the subject; I know nothing of Mr. Hanford paying them; I never suggested that he should pay them, and I know nothing of the means by which he did come to pay them." I believe that is a summary of the case upon the one side and upon the other. There are coincidences so strong in the date at which those men heard from Mr. Hanford, as compared with the date of Mr. Onslow's letter, and there is an improbability so strong that Mrs. Hughes should have paid that 10*l.* out of her own pocket under the circumstances, that it is exceedingly difficult to believe that the transaction could have been, as it is represented to have been, by Mrs. Hughes and by Mr. Hanford; but whatever that difficulty may be, I cannot exclude from my mind, that whilst upon the one hand there is evidence of exceeding strength, and upon which I must have acted had not those witnesses been called upon the part of the Respondent, whilst there is exceeding strength in the probabilities of the case in support of the affirmative; I cannot adopt the affirmative without believing that at least two persons have been guilty of perjury; I cannot bring my mind to that conclusion; I must, in order to arrive at the affirmative conclusion which is founded upon inference only, and does not depend upon the direct testimony of any witness, reject the positive evidence of two persons, and I must believe, more or less, that at least two other persons, certainly one, is concerned with those two in keeping back the truth.

I am strongly impressed with this case as being one which was most proper to be investigated, as one which not only saves this petition, in respect of more than one circumstance connected with this branch of inquiry, from being designated as either a frivolous or a vexatious petition, but which entitles it to be considered as a petition founded upon such strong prima facie grounds, and attended with such reasonable and probable cause for pursuing the inquiry to a termination, that if my Brother Sargood should be instructed to call upon me to visit the Petitioners with costs, I shall certainly not be prepared to accede to that application. I rather suspect that, in the result, the conclusion at which my mind has arrived, not without great misgiving, at the first complicated question of fact, which has been brought before me in the course of these new inquiries, but with, I hope, a determination to arrive at what I really believe to be a just conclusion upon the evidence, will be unsatisfactory to both parties. If it be, it is not my duty to satisfy them, but to decide between them.

The result is, that I determine that the Member whose return is complained of by the petition, was duly elected and returned.

Secondly, that no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any candidate at such election.

Thirdly, upon the evidence before me, it does not appear that corrupt practices have, nor that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have, extensively prevailed at the election.

Fourthly, that two persons named James Corson, No. 61, and John Glyn, No. 93, whose names were upon the register of voters for the borough, but who had ceased to reside, were induced to vote for the sitting Member, by a promise of their expenses made by Robert William Handford, and that after their voting they asked and received from him, in pursuance of that promise, each 5 l., being a sum exceeding their expenses respectively.

It did not, however, appear that Handford knew of the excess, or meant corruptly to reward them.

With respect to costs, I must order that each party bear and pay his costs of this petition.

Hereford.

HEREFORD ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Blackburn, 15th March 1869.

Mr. Justice Blackburn.] I do not think that I need take any further time to consider, because I have had an opportunity of looking over the notes, and having had my attention called to a considerable part of the evidence now on each side in detail, I am now as fully prepared to express my opinion upon this case as I should be at any other time.

First of all, I will state at once that there has not been any attempt to show that the candidates, personally, have been parties to anything that has been wrong here whatever, and, indeed, the evidence leads me to the conclusion that this is one of the cases where it is not so much the fact that the candidate comes down to the borough, as that the local interest in the borough brings forward the candidate, so that this really is, as it seems to me, a case in which the candidate is standing on the local influence, and for those who bring him forward, and who are active for him in that way, the candidate is as much responsible as if they were his agents; but, perhaps, it is a more accurate phrase to call them his constituents than to call them his agents, though "agent" is the phrase which has been always used, and which we must therefore take.

Now, first, there are complaints made here on the ground of bribery, on the ground of undue influence, and on the ground of treating. As to those complaints relating to bribery, I think that no case of bribery has been made out in a way which would at all justify me in acting upon the belief that bribery has been committed by an agent of the candidate. I qualify it in that way, stating it simply, that I do not think it is made out in such a way as would justify me in acting upon it, because there is evidence, and evidence of great suspicion I think, and in reference to two cases of very considerable suspicion indeed of it, but not such as would justify me in acting upon it.

I allude, in the first place, to O'Hara's case, where the evidence is this: O'Hara, it is perfectly clear both sides agreed upon that, had avowedly said that his vote was for sale; he himself says that he said so, and Mr. Bosley says that he did say so to him. Then there comes a discrepancy between him and Mr. Bosley, in which there is the positive evidence of each opposed to that of the other. O'Hara says that Mr. Bosley said, "I can give give you nothing myself, but I will send some one down to you." Mr. Bosley said that instead of that, he became very angry with him, and said with an oath that he would not give him a sixpence. There is a direct conflict of testimony between the two, and we must go on and see what happened afterwards. Mr. Bosley did not conceal at all that O'Hara said this; indeed, it must have been pretty well known, probably, not only from what Mr. Bosley said, but from what the neighbours said also, that O'Hara's vote was for sale. Later in the day O'Hara does poll, and does poll for Mr. Bosley's side, and at the time when he does so poll there was a fly at the door, and there is no doubt that there were various people about him trying to influence him, and there is no doubt that he was seen to come out and go into the fly, and go and poll. The woman Morris, who was present at that time, says that she saw a person in light clothes. She mentioned Arnold Jackson who she said used the phrase, "If he would not go for his church, let him go and be damned," which Arnold Jackson said he did use. That being so, and there being a man in light clothes undoubtedly there, Mrs. Morris swears that she saw something which she thought was gold put into O'Hara's hands; O'Hara had at this time, it must be observed, come out of the house, and had begun to go towards the poll, and if the money had been put into his hands at that time, it is certainly an obvious remark that those who were bribing him were marvellously indiscreet, because having had the opportunity of giving him the money inside, they did it when he was outside, and when the act would be seen by witnesses. That it would have been an indiscreet thing is obvious, and it is not improbable that a woman like Mrs. Morris, who entertained a strong suspicion, might have fancied that such a thing did take place. Then, after this, O'Hara himself is called as a witness; he is called under circumstances which totally deprive one of the power of believing him. He may speak the truth, but it is by pure accident if he does. It appears that after this he was asked if he would give evidence (I do not blame those who asked him), and the end of it is that he promises to come and give evidence, and he gets a payment of 5 l. down, and a promise of 5 l. more when the evidence is given, and I think I do O'Hara no injustice in saying that, as by his own account he was ready and willing to sell his vote, at the same time I think he was ready and willing to sell his evidence also, I cannot trust him at all; that is sufficient to say. When I come, therefore, to contrast his evidence with Mr. Bosley's, I must believe what Mr. Bosley positively swears against O'Hara's statement. If I could believe for a moment that Mr. Bosley said, as O'Hara swears he did say, that though he would not give him anything himself, yet he would send some one down to him, I would at once come to the conclusion, without more, that those who did go down, and did see him, at the time when he was about to vote, did come from Mr. Bosley, and that they moreover spoke in a way which Mr. Bosley would not himself have done; but there is more. I have Mr. Bosley's positive oath that nothing of the kind happened, and I think every one must perceive that I cannot act upon the evidence of such a man as O'Hara against the evidence of a man in Mr. Bosley's position; consequently I cannot act upon O'Hara's evidence.

Then, too, we have had every one that could possibly be brought to speak to the man in the light clothes; I thought at first that the man in the light clothes could be traced, but it was not as I at first supposed, that a fly drove up with three or four people in it and carried the man off, in which case they must have known who this person was, but it seems that the fly was plying there, and when Harley (according to his own evidence which as he was unwell was taken by commission) went into the place, and brought him out, Harley's evidence is that he went in alone, then when he got into the fly, others, Arnold Jackson and Nicholas the plasterer, get into the fly, and also a man in white clothes gets into the fly. Nicholas and Arnold Jackson are both called, and both say that they got in in this way that I have described, and that there was a man in light clothes who got in also, but that they cannot remember who it was. Taking that, and remembering that when O'Hara swears that the man in light clothes went in and gave him money inside, and that that is in direct conflict with Mrs. Morris, who says that she saw him give O'Hara the money outside, and is in direct conflict also with Harley, who says that he went in alone, as I have already said, O'Hara is not to be trusted. I think that, although undoubtedly there is evidence which, if I could believe O'Hara, would convince me that there had been bribery, when I have these oaths against his evidence I cannot possibly act upon his evidence against the weight of the evidence, which is upon the other side.

Then there comes the next case which Mr. Price relied upon, Morris's case. There is no doubt that Mr. Russell did go up the street, coming out of a public-house in Gaol-street, talking with Daniels at that time, and that then, Morris, who was in the public-house, did come out and speak to him. There were two people who were there and saw what took place, and they tell the story, as to which there is very little difference between them. They say that they saw them speak; that they saw Mr. Russell pull something out of his waistcoat pocket, and show it to Morris, who laughed, and shook his head. Then they go on to say, that after that Mr. Russell put his hand in his pocket, and pulled out a handful of silver, and gave it to Morris. That, undoubtedly, called for an answer, and some evidence to show that that which was given was not money, or else one would draw the conclusion that it was given for a vote. There we have Mr. Russell's denial and Morris's. Then Mr. Russell states that he was walking with Daniels, talking about other voters, and about people who wanted a glass of grog before they would vote, matters which were not pursued, and are, therefore, only of slight effect as to treating, as they show what might have been in people's minds at that time. They state this, and they also state that Morris, who had already pledged his vote, did come out at the time when they were talking about the state of the poll. But they say that what he was shown was the state of the poll on a card, and that he was asked to go and poll immediately. I think it very likely indeed that Morris might laugh and shake his head. Then (though he does not say so), he evidently preferred staying in the public-house for some time longer, before he went to poll. All those three totally deny that any money passed for any purpose at all. Therefore, I am induced to think either that the men, who say they saw it, fancied that there was money given, which is not an impossible thing to do, at the same time making an honest mistake, or that the three persons, William Russell, Daniels, and Morris, deliberately swore a falsehood. Both those things are quite possible; but I think that the balance of probability is greatly in favour of the Respondents, and that, as in O'Hara's case, there is nothing upon which I can act; indeed, I would go further, and say that in this case I think if it were necessary I should act affirmatively upon the belief that money did not pass.

Then Merrick's case is relied upon. Then there is something again to be considered as to what really did take place. Merrick, undoubtedly, wanted to be paid his day's wages. Charles Turner, who was with him, seems to have thought that there was no harm in that, and said that he would try and get them for him. Charles Turner took him to the committee-room where the tickets were being given out, and there is no doubt that there he did ask somebody for his day's pay. Now, he says that the man whom he asked was the person who wrote out his ticket. It appears that he did not know the people who were there at all, and he was first told by Turner that William Russell and James were there, and he thought from that that it was William Russell who had written out the ticket, and said that he should have his money; but afterwards, being told that it was a mistake, and that it was Mr. James who spoke to him, he altered his account of the matter, and told us here that it was Mr. James. An imputation is thrown out that Turner had deceived him in that respect, and that Mr. William Russell was really the man. But it should be observed that Merrick, when giving his evidence here, was distinct and positive that it was Mr. James who did it, till he was cross-examined upon it, and when cross-examined it appeared that it was from hearsay that he said it was Mr. James, and that he stated so because of what Turner had said; but that only amounts to an inaccuracy in statement. I do not think it imputes an intentional misrepresentation to him. It is not by any means so easy a thing to tell a story so as to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, as one might think who has not tried it; it is very difficult to be precisely accurate. Then although Mr. James says that he cannot remember the case, it appears that he wrote the ticket, because it is in his handwriting, but his recollection is, that a good many people asked him for their day's wages, and that his universal answer, right well knowing the consequences of doing what they asked, was "No." This much struck me as certain, that when Merrick went out he did not think that he had got his day's wages secure; he was not satisfied, and he and Turner again went to Mr. Bosley, and asked for them. Now Mr. Price made a great deal of this; that in the story as it was written down for his instructions (which no doubt was the story as Merrick told it, and as Merrick stuck to it here), it is stated that he went and asked Mr. Bosley for his day's wages, that Mr. Bosley did not simply say that he could not promise him at all, but that he went on in effect to say this, "If others do not pay you, I will pay you; I will see you satisfied." And that then Merrick says he was not satisfied at all with this, and did not like it, and that then Mr. Bosley turned round to Turner and appealed to Turner as to whether Mr. Bosley's word was not good for the 5s. or 6s., to which Turner, according to him, said, of course it was good for a thousand pounds. Now this was all written down as Merrick now tells the story. Turner denies it, and tells the story differently, and whether he or Turner is correct on that, of course would be an important matter to consider. Then, in order to show that Turner was not correct in his way of telling the story, the Petitioners' counsel tried to prove that this Turner had previously made a different statement, and they properly tried to do so, because where you do call a witness who has told you, I will prove that a thing is black, and who, when he is called, proves that it is white; you cannot, it is true, make his evidence show that the thing was black, but you may show that, having previously stated that it was black, he is unworthy of credit in having said that it was white. To that extent you may contradict your own witness. Here, if it had been shown that Turner had deliberately stated that Mr. Bosley did say all this, and had added, "I will come and swear that he did," and then, for some reason best known to himself, comes and denies the statement, so that he either is telling a falsehood here on his oath, or was telling a deliberate falsehood before, that would, of course, have shaken his testimony in that matter altogether. But it appears that the way in which Turner's evidence was taken was merely this: that he was brought into a room, and then there was read over to him Merrick's statement, and that there was said to him, "Here is Merrick's statement as to what took place between you and him; now just listen to it and see if it is accurate." The story was read through to him, and he was asked if it was accurate, and he said there is some which is not; he was asked to mention the parts that were not accurate, and he did not mention this particular conversation with Mr. Bosley amongst the things that were inaccurate. I have already spoken of the difficulty there is in answering a question of that sort, and I do not think that that shows that Turner was necessarily speaking a falsehood at that time, and therefore I do not think it justifies the remarks which Mr. Price made upon it. Then we have Mr. Bosley's statement of what took place, and Mr. Bosley says he distinctly told him that he would not promise him. I think, taking the matter matter altogether, there is a probability that, although Mr. Bosley at that time told him that he would not promise him anything of the sort, he did not so distinctly state that he should not have it at all, as it would have been desirable and proper he should have done. I think, myself, from the manner in which the man acted afterwards, and from the whole evidence taken together, that, although Bosley took care not to promise anything, he did not take quite sufficient care to make the man quite sure that nobody else would give him his wages; he did not say "I will pay you the wages myself," because that would be bribery. I think the probability is that he did not say that, but I think that he did not take sufficient care to make the man understand that no one else would give him his wages. Still, that falls very far short of bribery; here, again, unless I am satisfied that Bosley really did promise him money, it is not bribery. If Merrick is right in what he states, he did promise him money, and it is bribery; but if he did not promise him the money, it is not bribery; if he did promise the money, then I must again say that Mr. Bosley and Turner are both speaking what is untrue. Where there are two people in a respectable position who differ from a third, though there may be inaccuracy to some extent on either side, I cannot say that the two are guilty of falsehood, and I therefore cannot act upon that case.

Then, as to the other matters which there were offers or negotiations about, taking Mrs. Stanley's case for instance, my belief is that the man was only there to see whether her husband's vote was for sale or not, because I do not find any one offering a price for it. I do not find anything in that case that would lead me to the conclusion that he was offering a price for that vote; he may have been wishing to ascertain whether he could not fix the Conservative side, if their candidate got in, with bribery. He may have been doing it one way or the other, but I see nothing there that amounts to his offering a price for that vote.

Then there is the case of Hughes and the man Bethel. There is no doubt whatever that Hughes is a most disreputable person, and I am sorry to see that the franchise has gone so far as to bring such persons within it; a man who keeps a brothel, and who says that he was offered 2*l.* for his vote, and would not take it because he intended to get 5*l.* No doubt he was there, and his vote was for sale. Bethel's own account about it is, that he had gone so far as to say that if he were in distress he would lend him 2*l.*, which probably would have been if carried out, another word for giving him 2*l.* But then the matter went off. Now, if money had actually passed, that would have been a complete case of bribery. If there had been a clear offer of 2*l.*, that also would have been a case of bribery. But there is always a very great difference, in my mind, between the proof of agency which would fix a person for executed bribery, and the proof of agency which would fix a person for an offer or chaffering for a bribe. Now, I do not think that Bethel is shown to be a person of such trust and position that an offer on his part would fix the candidate and vacate the election. I think that if there were an offer from a man in such a position as Mr. Bosley, that certainly would do it. There is always a great difference, in my view, in the degrees of agency. As you go lower down, you require more distinctly to show that the act was done by a person whom the candidate would be responsible for. As you come higher up, it is more as if the candidate had done it himself. I think that for such a purpose as fixing a candidate for the chaffering for a vote not actually carried out, you require more complete evidence of agency than you would require for an offer actually executed.

The other cases were not relied upon, and really there was nothing that amounted to evidence upon them. Those which I have stated are the bribery cases, and those are cases, as I have already pointed out, upon which I cannot act.

Now there comes the other matter, which is the really serious matter in the case; and that is, as to the treating. Now, upon that the terms of the Act of Parliament regulating the matter now are clear and distinct: "Every candidate at an election who shall corruptly" (the word "corruptly" means contrary to the intention of this Act, with a motive or intention by means of it to produce an effect upon the election; not going so far as bribery, but with a motive thereby to influence the election), "by himself or by or with any person" (I pass over some words), "directly or indirectly give or provide, or cause to be given or provided, or shall be accessory to the giving or providing, or shall pay, wholly or in part, any expenses incurred for any meat, drink, entertainment, or provision to or for any person in order to be elected or for being elected, or for the purpose of corruptly influencing such person, or any other person, to give or refrain from giving his vote," shall be deemed guilty of treating. Now, in that case, as well as in others, a candidate is responsible for the acts of his agents when they are so far agents that what they were doing they have been employed or authorised by him as agents to do; he is answerable for their corrupt acts although he may be no party to them. Then comes a question, which is always a very difficult one in such cases; it is a double question. One is, was the meat, drink, and entertainment given with what the statute calls corruptness? I have already said my explanation of that word is, given with the intention of influencing the election—with the intention of influencing an election generally, as by acquiring popularity, or with the intention of influencing a particular voter to vote or refrain from voting. Another question is, is it given in such a way that the agents of the candidate, those who can be considered as identified with the candidate, were, in the comprehensive language of the Act, either the persons who gave it or were accessory to it? That, of course, raises a very difficult question. What is the degree of agency? What is the relation between a candidate and a particular person which would make the candidate responsible to the extent of losing his seat if that particular person has given meat or drink corruptly?

Here we have both questions raised on the two great points to which I have recently directed the attention of counsel. The most important case, the great case, has reference to what took place at Mr. Harrison's breakfast, and there I need not say that, as I think, it would be idle to attempt to go through the evidence to show that I am justified in coming to the conclusion, that what Mr. Harrison did give there was given with the intention which the statute calls corrupt, namely, with the intention to produce an effect upon the election. The town is invited, everybody is invited to come who will on the morning to have drink there, and there are breaks and vehicles to carry the people to the poll, and they are actually driven to the poll; and really it struck me that the attempt to say that that was not done with the purpose of influencing the election was not very candid on the part of the witnesses, and did not convey a very high compliment as to their estimation of my common sense. I can entertain no possible doubt upon that point.

Now comes the other important question, which is, the amount of agency. That is a difficult question of law and of fact. I have never been able myself to get a precise definition that satisfies my own mind of what is the degree of relation that would constitute a man an agent. Almost everything is evidence of it tending that way, and all that one can do, I think, is to look at the particular acts that are done, and to remember the reasons for which the Parliamentary law differs from the common law in that respect. In the common law a man is not responsible for the act of his agent, except where it is done directly according to an authority which is given to him. In Parliamentary law it is otherwise. A candidate, who has really meant that his agent should not commit a corrupt act, is nevertheless responsible to the extent of losing his seat if the agent does commit a corrupt act. And for that difference in the law so established by Parliamentary Committees formerly, and now recognised by statute, it seems to me that there are two principal motives. I will not say that they are the only ones, but they are two principal motives. It would not be possible to unseat a person for corrupt practices if he were permitted by the means of persons who acted for him, or who brought him forward, either one or the other, to obtain the benefit of their aid, if he were not to be also responsible to the extent of losing his seat for the corrupt practices that were done by them for his benefit. That is one of the great reasons for which, as a matter of public policy, it was thought necessary, in order that it might check corrupt practices, to establish that principle. Another, and a very considerable reason no doubt, was that in all elections where extensive corrupt practices, bribery and the like prevailed, great care was always taken that the candidate should be ignorant about it. The men who had corrupted, who paid money, carefully kept the candidate from knowing anything about it till after the election was over; then they would come forward and say, "Of course, when I advanced this money I took care that you should not know of it. I have spent 5,000 £ or 6,000 £ on your behalf, and now, as a matter of honour, you must repay me, because I was acting for you." And from the loose morality which formerly did prevail at elections, and which I do not say is completely got rid of, candidates did think themselves bound in honour to pay, and did pay. Consequently the Parliamentary election law became established, that a person was responsible for the acts of his agent in that way; and the question very much was, was that agent, when doing the thing in such a position that there would be that claim on the candidate, according to the false morality of Parliamentary election matters, to recoup him for what he had done. Now, those are two reasons for the Parliamentary law differing from the common law. They were not the only ones, but they do give two very good guides and assistances. And I apprehend that in a case where corrupt practices are shown which the candidates themselves are not cognizant of, you must bear these two principal reasons in mind; and then exercising what may be called common sense you must see, does the particular corrupt act come within the rule as an act done by an agent. If it does not, then, though the person may have been canvassing the town, or speaking on one side or the other, still we could not say that the candidate should be unseated on that account. Every bit of canvassing and acting for a candidate is evidence to show agency; but the result cannot depend upon any precise rule that I could define. It comes to be a question of degree, of more or less, and of common sense. It happens that from the nature of things when you come to a question of degree, of more or less, and of common sense, and leave it in that way to a jury, if there were a jury, the jury would determine it sometimes in one way, and sometimes in another. Unfortunately, where judges are obliged to be judges of that question of degree and of common sense, there is an unavoidable uncertainty, because it is quite clear that the common sense of one judge will differ from the common sense of another. To use the old simile that was used by Mr. Selden many years ago, and which is none the worse for being old, the standard of common sense as determined by a judge's common sense would be as uncertain as a measure of length, the unit of which should be the judge's foot, because one judge's foot would be longer, and another's would be shorter. We cannot help that. I wish with all my heart that the Legislature would find out some test to relieve us from that uncertainty. I can only say I have not been able to invent a test; and if I could, I would not make it law. I should be excessively glad if any one else having the power to make it law, would invent it.

That being so, let us see what we are to say as to whether Mr. Harrison's breakfast is shown to have been known, and to have been done in such a way as to be fairly considered an act for which the candidates should be responsible. And remembering that in this case, as I have said before, the candidate must be considered as brought forward by the local local people rather than the candidate coming forward and standing himself, we have first of all what Mr. Harrison was himself. He is not a voter. I do not think it has been affirmatively proved that he was any more in direct personal communication with the committee than this; that he did go to Edwards at the committee-room on two occasions; that he saw Edwards there, and that he having given Edwards a list of the names of the people connected with the railway, and of those in his own employment, Edwards gave him a list of the names of those who were voters; and I come to the conclusion from that, that Harrison got that book, and that Edwards gave it to him with the intention that Harrison should ask these men for their votes. Then, of course, Edwards filled a very subordinate position, and I am not by any means prepared to say that if Edwards in his subordinate position had asked a person to canvass that would make the candidate responsible for what that person did. It appears also, however, that Mr. Bodenham, who certainly was almost the head of the affair, did ask Mr. Harrison to canvass two particular persons, and wrote to him to that effect; and that goes further to say that Harrison was asked to canvass; but I do not think that being asked to canvass two distinct and specific persons would make him a general agent, so that for anything else he might do the candidate would be made responsible. But then we have to deal with a much more serious matter—that he is seen in company with Mr. Bosley, who is certainly one of the leading men who bring forward the candidates, and one of the persons for whose acts they would be responsible. To what extent Bosley knew that Harrison was acting we have not very definitely shown. Mr. Bosley himself was not pointedly asked upon it; and if, at the time, my recollection had served me, I would have asked him the question myself. I suppose that neither side liked to ask the question for fear they might get an unfavourable answer, and I take some blame to myself for not recollecting that. What Mr. Bosley did know about it we do not distinctly know; but this much does appear, that Mr. Bosley did speak to Mr. Wyllie as to what Mr. Harrison had done, in such terms as to draw forth from Mr. Wyllie the very glowing letter we have heard of, in which Mr. Wyllie thanks him for his services; and that for some reason or other somebody did so speak to Mr. Bodenham, upon which Mr. Bodenham did the same thing to Mr. Clive, though Mr. Clive, having received his information from a lawyer, in a very business-like manner wrote a cooler letter than Mr. Wyllie's. We have this very clearly that in both cases Harrison's services were, on the very day of the election in the one case, and in the other case the day after, acknowledged by the leading men, and that for those services he was thanked in letters from the candidates themselves. That goes a considerable way, though it is not conclusive, to show that Mr. Harrison had been by them adopted as an agent to a great extent. Then we have this, that he had gone on one occasion with Mr. Bosley (that in itself is not very much), he had been in company with Edwards when he was asking the railway men for their votes; and it was exactly the railway men whom Mr. Harrison would be likely to influence.

Then comes what took place at the breakfast. The invitation seems to have gone forth to everybody and everybody's friends; it was the whole town, and everybody that liked to come was to come; that is really what it comes to. We have it shown that Edwards invited people, and brought them up; that Williams, of the "Sawyers' Rest," who is a committee-man, invited them, and brought them up; that Rowlands, a committee-man, though not a very active one, brought them up; Henry Davis, who has been marked as being a captain, was also shown to have brought them up, and Lloyd, who is a committee-man, was shown to have been there; and probably there were others. John Russell was there at the time. John Russell I do not so much rely upon, for although he had been originally appointed a captain, yet, at the first meeting at the "Saracen's Head," he seems to have been the worse for liquor, and after that, according to his own account, he kept aloof from them, and he seems to have taken offence; and according to Bodenham's account he kept aloof from Mr. Russell. I do not think that any active agency has been shown on his part for which he was peculiarly responsible. I do not say that any one of these things would satisfy me that Harrison was an agent. Taking simply the fact that he gave this breakfast, or merely that he had gone with Mr. Bosley to canvass, I do not say that that would satisfy me, though it goes strongly to prove it. Nor would the fact that Bosley had spoken of him afterwards as having done such good service; nor yet do I say that the fact that Williams being a committee-man brought people to his breakfast would satisfy me; nor yet that Edwards, who had been employed about these railway men to some extent, brought people up to the breakfast; nor yet that Lloyd was there, nor yet that Henry Davis was there. No one of these things by itself satisfies me that Mr. Harrison's breakfast was one for which the party who were bringing forward Mr. Clive and Mr. Wyllie are to be considered responsible. Yet taking them altogether, a number of little pieces of evidence do produce an effect upon my mind which leads me to say that, according to the usual rules in Parliamentary matters (that this which is certainly an act of corruption is so clearly brought home to the agents and persons in authority as to constitute them accessories to it, and for which the candidates ought to be responsible), I cannot do otherwise than come to the conclusion that this act is one which avoids the election. I am very sorry for both Mr. Clive and Mr. Wyllie, who had no intention to sanction anything which was corrupt. I am sorry also for many of the leading persons connected with them, for I have no doubt that both Mr. Bodenham and Mr. Jay, the unpaid agents, wished very much to prevent such occurrences, and were very much annoyed at them. Still I cannot say that that should affect my decision here.

Then there remains to be considered a matter of much less consequence, and which need not be dwelt upon so much, namely, what Mr. William Russell did, and what he is shown to have done, which is, that being a town councillor he did upon the day of the election for the town council, when there certainly had been something of a formal contest, give money to such of his friends as had come to the election to support him, which it would appear was a bad practice prevailing in the city. Such a thing, if it were done in a Parliamentary election, would at once be considered bribery, and would avoid the election. I trust that the Legislature will take steps to prevent its being done in future at municipal elections also. Here it comes to be a question of fact; was the money that was paid to men for their wages for coming to the municipal election, intended to produce the effect of inducing those men to vote in a particular way at the Parliamentary election? In a case which I tried at Taunton, there were very analogous payments made for the registration, and the evidence satisfied me that that money was given with the intention to induce the voters to vote in the Parliamentary election. In the present case there was a smaller scale, and there were fewer of them, and the day's wages seem to have been given without reference to politics. I think most of the witnesses who were called were men who actually did vote upon the Conservative side, and moreover seem always to have intended to do so; they were not bought over, nor were they told that they were behaving ill or treacherously, or anything of that sort, in voting on the Conservative side; and, consequently, I come to the conclusion that so far as regards the payment of the money, though a very wrong and improper practice, it could not be considered as purchasing a vote; it was not (putting it in homely language) saying, "If you will vote yellow at the municipal election, I will pay you for it, and then I shall expect you to vote yellow at the Parliamentary election also." I do not think that it amounted to that, and consequently it is not bribery.

Then comes what took place at the "Greyhound Inn." That seems to be much more unconnected with the municipal election. There I think that if that stood alone I should pause and hesitate. I should be afraid almost to act upon it if it stood alone, but my impression is that if it stood alone I should on that ground also vacate the election; I do not say that I would have done so if it had stood alone, because I should have hesitated a good deal; but I think I should, for this reason. It appears that when a Parliamentary meeting was held at the public-house (and all these Parliamentary meetings at public-houses have been followed by treating afterwards, and that is one of the reasons why they should not be held there), Mr. Russell having been at that meeting, came down to where there were people, some who had been at the meeting and some who had not, but people who were all more or less connected with voters, and he did give them a quantity of drink. He states that his reason was that they asked him for it, because he had just been appointed councillor for the ward; but it is impossible not to see that any such thing given at that time, by a leading partisan and supporter of the candidates whose meeting had just taken place, must have had a tendency to influence the votes of those persons. Mr. Price pointed that out in his argument very well, and I think he was quite justified in arguing that it must have had that tendency, and I think it is scarcely possible to believe that Mr. Russell was not aware of that tendency. I therefore think that if that had stood alone, I should have been obliged to come to the conclusion that Russell did intend, as a natural consequence of giving that drink, in that manner to influence the election. However, had it not been for the matter of Mr. Harrison's breakfast, I should have felt very much difficulty about it. It is very possible that if I had found such important consequences as the determination of an election to depend upon it, I might not have avoided the election upon that ground; but at present the result I think is, that owing to these two acts the election is to be declared void.

There is one thing further to remark upon. As a general rule, I have in every case considered that the costs of the election ought to abide the result. As a general rule, that is right, and it is particularly right where the petitioners have been successful in avoiding an election, and have therefore done a public service. But in this particular case there is a reason why I think that I cannot do it. When the Parliamentary Election Committees sat they were a tribunal which met on the particular case for the first time, and nothing could be done till they met. The consequence was that they had no control over what happened before, and then the petitioner came before the Parliamentary Committee with such a case as he pleased; and for the first time, when the counsel for the petitioner got up and spoke, the respondent heard what cases would be brought against him, what were relied upon, what votes were to be impugned, and so on. It was also a consequence that followed from that, that a very vicious practice arose on the part of those connected with Parliamentary elections, that they never got up their case or considered their case. Counsel went before Parliamentary Committees with a loose statement that such and such people were likely to say something, and they were instructed from hour to hour and from minute to minute as they went on. A Parliamentary Election Committee was a tribunal which did not sit constantly, and therefore after the particular occasion had no power to control other cases. Those evils afforded a great reason, as I believe, why Parliamentary Election Committees did not give general satisfaction. I think that they were quite as competent to decide the questions of facts submitted to them as the Judges are; but I do not think that they were so competent to bring the matter to the proper point. Now, in making the rules we took those things into consideration; we had this before us, that it was the very essence of justice and fair play that every man who was accused of anything should have due and sufficient notice of what it was that he was accused of, and of that only, so that his attention should not be distracted to immaterial matters, but that he should really know what it was of which he was accused.

accused. For that reason, and for that purpose, we have established the practice that particulars should be given, stating what it is that the Respondents will be required to meet. Those particulars were not required to be given long before. Three days before the time came, the other side might know what they were to meet, so that they might then be prepared to meet the case, and might not waste time and trouble in hunting up different matters on which the Petitioners did not rely; the object being, as I have already pointed out, partly to secure fair play and partly the saving of waste of costs. And a very important further point is, that 15 working days' notice of trial having been given, and it not being required till the twelfth of those had gone by, that the Petitioners should give those particulars; they should make use of those 12 days in ascertaining and sifting their evidence; that they should really conduct the case as we do in an ordinary trial, with as much as can be done towards fair play and precision.

These being the objects, and the particulars being required for those objects, how have they been complied with here? 184 cases of bribery have been put down, which the Respondents must have had to look into. Of those there are five on which evidence has been given, and of those five the Petitioners have not succeeded in establishing one to my satisfaction. There are five cases that have come to nothing, with 184 charges in the particulars. It is obvious that that could not have been done except for the purpose of baffling the objects of giving the particulars; and it is obvious that it must have given the Respondents a great deal of unnecessary trouble.

Mr. Price.] Will your Lordship allow me to mention that all the municipal bribery cases were included?

Mr. Justice Blackburn.] Then, it is not so large a proportion as I thought it was; though undoubtedly it was stated by Mr. Powell, and I never heard it disputed till this moment, that the proportion was so. It is impossible not to see that the Respondents must have been put to a great deal of useless trouble and useless expense in getting up the defence. It is justice to the Petitioners to say that, although I have not known quite so gross a case as this before, yet generally the particulars have been used very much as if they were intended to give no information at all; and the only way to check that is to say, that where that is done we shall follow the spirit of the Act of Parliament, which says that the costs shall be in the discretion of the judge, who shall direct how they shall be allotted, bearing in view whether or no there has been useless expense and vexation caused; that is the meaning of the Act. That being so, I can only say, that though here the Petitioners have succeeded, I do not think that it would be right to make the Respondents bear their costs. The Respondents having failed will not get their costs. In this particular case, and under the particular circumstances, I direct that each side bear their own costs.

Mr. Price.] All I wish to ask your Lordship is, whether you would make a distinction as to some of the costs. We proved some of the treating.

Mr. Justice Blackburn.] No, I cannot do that. If we attempted to separate the costs it would require very much investigation, and I cannot do it.

KING'S LYNN ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Baron Martin, 17th March 1869.

King's Lynn.

Mr. Baron Martin.] THIS is a petition of William Armes and George Holditch, which alleges that the Honourable Robert Bourke, by himself and his agents, was guilty of bribery, treating, intimidation, and corrupt practices at the last election, that he was not duly elected, and that the election was void. To avoid this election I must be satisfied that Mr. Bourke, either by himself or by some person for whom he was responsible, committed an offence within the 2nd, 4th, or 5th sections of the Corrupt Practices Act. It is supposed by some that if anything is done wrong in an election, the judge has some discretionary power to declare the election void, but it is an error. The judge has no such power. The judge is as much bound by law in trying an Election Petition as if he were trying an ordinary case on the criminal or civil side at the assizes; and is bound to ascertain that the act which is complained of is an act which, either by the common law invalidates the election, or one which this Act of Parliament, construed together with two other Acts, declares to have that effect. In this case there has been no general bribery.

King's Lynn.

It is not alleged. There has been nothing of that which has been proved to have taken place at some others of these inquiries; there has been nothing of what may be called general treating. I have already said that I have no reason to suppose that Mr. Jackson stated anything incorrectly, nor do I impute it to any other person. With regard to two of those persons who spoke of drinking at public-houses, they state that it was at meetings of the Loyal and Constitutional Association. I have no doubt that their evidence is true; there is cogent evidence that the meeting at which Mr. Jackson was present was one of the same kind; Mr. Jarvis and Mr. Bourke both stated that they had no meetings of the sort, that they called no such meeting, and gave no drink at all. The truth is that there were meetings of this association, to which Mr. Bourke went for the purpose of stating his views and to obtain their support; and there is nothing in the Act of Parliament, that I am aware of, which renders him responsible for the acts of that association. It is said by Mr. Jackson that he believes Mr. Bourke gave some money, but I think Mr. Jackson is in error. I do not believe he wilfully misstates it, but Mr. Bourke says that he did not give any money, and he must know best whether he did or not. It was only that he saw him move his hand forward, he did not see what the money was. But, for the purpose of rendering the election void by such an act, it must be proved that it was corruptly done. The Act of Parliament is distinct upon it. It is differently worded from the 2nd section, which has regard to bribing, that is, bribing in money, or by a valuable consideration. The act of treating must be done corruptly. I am not prepared upon this evidence, even if it were true that this money was paid by Mr. Bourke and Mr. Thew, to say that Mr. Bourke is responsible for what took place at that meeting held three months or more before the election took place. It is a common act that people do; people will treat their neighbours, and, except I have reason to suppose that there was something at the time wrong in Mr. Bourke's mind, that he meant to act wrong, I am not prepared to say that in giving beer to persons at a meeting so long before the election, indeed before Parliament was prorogued, that he did it corruptly.

This is the eighth Petition which I have had to try, and I have uniformly acted upon this principle, and I will continue to act upon it, because I am satisfied that it is a right principle, that if a man honestly comes forward to contest a place, and is desirous to avoid bribery and treating, or anything that would infringe upon the law, and if he does his very best to avoid it, and he is sought to be unseated by reason of a mere isolated act, the evidence of that act should be cogent and beyond doubt. Mr. Bourke, I think, must have known if anything wrong was going on, but he has sworn, and I believe him, that to his knowledge no illegal practice whatever took place. I adopt what has been said by myself, as well as by the other judges, that if there be brought home to an agent of Mr. Bourke's, a person for whom he is responsible, a corrupt act done within the meaning of this Act of Parliament, he must be unseated; but I would not unseat a man for an act done by an agent which he has forbidden—unless it were clearly proved to be affected by the act of an agent such as we have heard of to-day, an isolated solitary act—I should require to be satisfied beyond doubt that it did take place. I would take care that I made no mistake, and I would not unseat a gentleman except the act of the agent was established with as much certainty as a fact could be established. I believe that to be a just and right principle.

Then, what are the acts alleged here? I may take the case which was mentioned last, with respect to the wine. It seems that a person named Mason had a sick wife, and that he had formerly lived in the service of a Mr. Bowker, and that Mr. Bowker one day went to his house, and probably what the girl says is substantially true; but, in fact, the wine was never sent. According to the evidence of the girl, the two bottles of wine that had been sent had both been sent before. Very likely some conversation of this sort took place, but Mr. Bowker thought better of it, and did not send it. Moreover, the conversation was with the wife and not the voter, and I cannot think that Mr. Bourke can be unseated for this.

Then, again, it is said, truly enough, that Mr. Miller (whose case seemed to me to be the only one that required an answer) has been contradicted by Thomas Smith, Robert Taylor, and George Lubbock. With regard to Thomas Smith, he was as unsatisfactory a witness as ever I heard examined. I do not want to impute to the man that he came here to perjure himself. He is a man that is speaking of conversations; and of all things people give most diverse accounts of conversations. The man was examined this morning, and I should say that upon Smith's evidence alone I should be sorry to unseat any Member.

Then, again, with respect to Taylor and Lubbock, and their story with respect to Mr. Miller, that he would provide for some boys, that was a mere conversation, a statement of what the man would do, Mr. Miller has positively denied it. Mr. Miller, I understand, is a brewer in this town, and a man of respectability. And when a man of this sort comes forward and swears most positively that that which is stated to have occurred did not occur, as I have already stated, I will act upon the principle of being satisfied, beyond doubt, of the corrupt act.

I believe that the only other matter upon which it is necessary to make an observation, is the presents of hares. There is no pretence for saying that Mr. Bagge had entered into any engagement or promise to give those hares; but after the election was over he sent hares to a number of people who voted for Mr. Bourke. Where was the agency of Mr.

Mr. Bagge with respect to that? What is there to show that there was an agency in him after the election? Assuming him to have been a canvasser for Mr. Bourke, and to be his agent during the election, his agency ceased when the election was over. I have stated that as my opinion before; but if it were necessary in this case, I would reserve it for the Court of Common Pleas, if the facts raised it. But the facts do not raise it. I agree with my brother Parry that it comes more within the 2nd section than within the 4th. The treating within the 4th section seems to me to be more directed to the actual giving of refreshments or entertainment. It seems to me that he is correct in saying that it is more like a "valuable consideration." But assuming that those hares were a valuable consideration, to make the act affect the election, it must be to influence the vote. What reason is there for supposing that it was done to influence the vote, or done malo animo, for a gentleman, the owner of property in the neighbourhood, to send a hare to a person to whom he felt grateful for voting for Mr. Bourke? I do think that to arrive at such a conclusion would be beyond all reason, and that not a jury in England would come to the conclusion. It is a thing constantly done as an act of kindness. You cannot call it exactly generosity, but it is a thing which gentlemen do to people to whom they conceive that they are under an obligation; and if a man considers himself under an obligation to a voter who has voted at an election for the candidate for whom he was interested, there is, I think, nothing illegal in it.

I am of opinion that the objections to Mr. Bourke's election fail, and it will be my duty to report to the Speaker that he was duly elected.

I have also to report on two other matters. No candidate here seems to have been guilty of any corrupt act, and of course I shall so report. There seems to be no general corruption in the borough, at least I had no evidence of it. If it exists, it has not been brought before me, and I shall so report.

It seems to me that in this matter the costs also must follow the event. There is a misapprehension with respect to costs. It is supposed that imposing the payment of costs is a sort of punishment. It is nothing of the kind. There is no punishment in it, nor is it intended to be a punishment. The law does not mean it as a punishment. But a petition has been brought against Mr. Bourke, which has failed. Mr. Bourke has been put to expense by reason of it, and it is but reasonable that he should be indemnified against that expense. It is merely an indemnification of the expense that a man has been put to by reason of an unsuccessful suit, and there is nothing in this case to except it from the ordinary rule.

LICHFIELD ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Willes, 30 January 1869.

Lichfield.

Mr. Justice Willes.] THIS is a Petition praying that the election of the Member for this city, held in November last, should be declared void upon several grounds. The grounds relied upon before this court have been bribery, treating, and undue influence; and in disposing of the questions raised by the Petition, it is necessary that I should deal with each of those allegations in its order.

As to undue influence, which I shall take first, no evidence whatever has been brought before the court. I speak of undue influence in its proper sense, of using any violence, or of threatening any damage, or of resorting to any fraudulent contrivance to restrain the liberty of a voter, so as either to compel or frighten him into voting or abstaining from voting otherwise than he freely wills. That is the proper definition of undue influence dealt with, in terms which I need not more specifically refer to, in the 5th section of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, the 17th and 18th of the Queen, c. 102. I say no evidence has been produced, not overlooking the latent possible force of the men from Walsall, and the alleged men from Burton, which however did not develop itself into either violence to any of the electors, or intimidation towards any persons concerned in the election. I must conclude, therefore, that of undue influence, properly so called, no evidence has been produced; and judging of the average of the Lichfield people whom I have seen in the witness-box and elsewhere in the course of this trial, I should think that they are about as little likely to use undue influence in the sense in which I have been dealing with it, or to submit to it from others, as any people in this kingdom. There is no evidence of it whatsoever.

The next head of charge with which I shall deal is that of treating; and I may observe with respect to treating, that that has, so far as my reading of the law is concerned, always stood upon a different footing from the more odious offence of bribery. Of course a man may be bribed by the promise of meat and drink; but the ingratiating of a man with others by giving them something to eat or something to drink, to be consumed upon the spot, is not looked upon in the same odious light as bribing by money or with a promise of future reward; and it may be doubted, although that is now interesting only as matter of history, whether treating in the sense in which I have been speaking of it, ingratiating by mere hospitality, even to the extent of profusion, was struck at by the common law. It is, however, certain that it is now forbidden, under penalties, by the Act of the Queen to which I have referred, wherever it is resorted to for the purpose of pampering people's appetites, and thereby inducing them to vote, or to abstain from voting, otherwise than they would have done without their palates being tickled by eating or drinking supplied by a candidate. And there can equally be no doubt that by the 36th section of that statute, any candidate who, either by himself or by his agents, resorts to treating as a means whereby to be elected a Member of Parliament, not only spends his money at the time, but does so with the certainty that if he is detected himself in having authorised or resorted to treating, or if any one of his agents, even without his knowledge or authority, should have treated electors with a view to obtain their votes, or to induce them to abstain from voting, a seat gained under such circumstances, even though the majority be not composed of persons who were so treated, is forfeited; and the election will, upon substantial proof of treating, in a proceeding of this description, be set aside.

Was there proof of treating here? In order to prove treating it must be shown, not merely that eating and drinking went on during the election, and went on under the eyes of the candidate (eating and drinking must always go on), but it must be shown that the eating and drinking was supplied at the expense or upon the credit of the candidate, either by his authority or by the authority of one or more of his agents in order to influence voters; and the question is whether that has been proved here. An effort to prove it has been made by showing that at a number of public-houses, which it is unnecessary to enumerate by name, and which may be described generally as the "Turk's Head" and others, the sitting Member, Colonel Dyott, attended, and addressed the electors; and that upon the evenings when he so addressed the electors drinking went on, a hat was sent round, collections were made, and persons drank, some of whom did not put anything into the hat. But I must observe, in the first place, with respect to that evidence, that it is not proved that there was any such drinking by collection whilst Colonel Dyott or any of his agents were there, in a sense to fix him with having inferentially contributed to the drinking that was going on. I must secondly observe that, with respect to two of the witnesses who were called, and who spoke principally to the treating of persons who did not pay, who may be taken, probably, as specimens of the class of witnesses to that head of the case (I speak of a person named Smith, and another person named Spanswick), they were no voters, and they were strangers to Lichfield, showing at least that no favour was shown to voters in the matter. I must further observe that the landlords of these public-houses were called, and one after another denied that drink was supplied which was not paid for at the time, and denied that they received any money for that drink from Colonel Dyott or any of his committee or agents for whose acts he is answerable; and with regard to the instance in which the four sovereigns are said to have been paid by Coxon, who for this purpose would have been the agent of Colonel Dyott if he had paid the money, and whose act, if he did so, would unquestionably have made the election void, the fact of his having made that contribution was spoken to by the witness Smith only. That was contradicted not only by the landlord of the place, but also by an independent witness who was called on the part of the Petitioner, named Heber Webb. They both proved all that was found in the hat in the shape of gold, upon the evening in question, to be two half-sovereigns; and Coxon being himself called, denied the charge emphatically, and in a manner which makes me entirely believe him (notwithstanding it was more emphatic probably than the occasion required), and therefore that specific contribution is entirely negatived. With respect to the contribution alleged to have been made by Mr. Graham, the clergyman who presided on one occasion, that rested upon inference of a very slight character, and that gentleman having been called himself, denied having made any such contribution; and Colonel Dyott and the gentlemen whose names were mentioned as being his agents having been successively called, denied that they had authorised any treating whatsoever at any of those public-houses, or had in any way contributed to the drinking which was going on. Moreover—and this is a fact of importance, because it gives the details of the reckoning itself, for which Colonel Dyott and his agents were content to be answerable to the landlords of those public-houses—the bills which they sent in, being produced, turned out to be bills for the use of their houses for the meetings which took place, at which the electors were addressed; none of them has any bill for drink, and each of them in turn, upon being asked the question, denied that he had any claim for drink unpaid for. Upon the whole, therefore, it should seem that the charge of treating is not made out—that there was no drink ordered by Colonel Dyott or by any of his agents for whom he is answerable, at his expense, or upon his credit, with a view to induce voters, by such drinking, to vote for him, or not vote. There was one case referred to, of the "Blue Bell," at which it was said there was not only drinking, but eating; and certainly, if the proof had at all come up to the opening which the learned counsel for the Petitioner, Mr. Powell, was instructed to make, and which I have no doubt his clients believed to be true at the time, this election could not stand. I speak of that alleged profuse hospitality, persons coming up to the election and being entertained, and overflowing into private houses, where rooms were procured for them because there was none to be had in the inn, and having tables set for them, I think it was said, in a gateway, because there was no room in the house itself. All this information, which must have been received from persons who gave exaggerated accounts to the agents for the Petitioner, which they are unable to sustain by their evidence in the witness-box, must have been the work of imagination. The persons who suggested that, I presume, talked over the matter with one another until at length they got themselves to believe that it was true, and then they communicated it to the persons who were concerned in getting up the evidence for this Petition. But when the matter came to be tested in open court, the persons who asserted that, and upon whose instructions it was brought before the court by the learned counsel, in the discharge of his duty, have not come forward, and it must be presumed because they were unable to substantiate the assertions which they made, and to those assertions, therefore, no credit can be given. With respect to another scene at the "Blue Bell," that which was actually spoken to, of certain voters having passed the night there, before the election, and having had drink, and having had something to eat in the morning, the drink stands upon the same footing as the drink at the other public-houses. With respect to the eating in the morning, that was stated by the landlord and landlady to have been supplied by them from their own provisions, without authority from the sitting Member, or any agent of his, and without any intention to charge for it at all. At first I thought that those representing the Petitioner were about to show that which one has learned has taken place at elections, that the landlords were running up a bill which they trusted to somebody, at some future time, paying them. And it is perfectly well known, that one of the shoals in the way of candidates at other elections has been that landlords, taking advantage of the occasion, have thought proper themselves, without authority, to supply meat and drink upon the chance that if the bill was afterwards sent in to the candidate who succeeded, he either, in the satisfaction of success, or because he did not desire to be failing in a payment which might lose him the good-will of the landlord afterwards, might possibly pay. Such payments have been made, and have endangered seats elsewhere. No such charge, however, can be laid justly to the door of the landlord of the "Blue Bell," or, so far as I can see, to that of any landlords who have been called as witnesses before the court. I must say I acquit everybody in the borough of any corrupt treating upon this occasion.

I lastly come to the question of bribery. With respect to bribery the law is perfectly clear, and one can only wonder that any person doubted, either through fear of what people call the technicality of lawyers (really the just limit to the jurisdiction of judges), or through hope that by reason of the difficulties which would be met with in proof before this new tribunal, persons, if any such there be, who have fattened upon the abuses that have existed hitherto at elections, might continue to do so with even greater impunity than before—I say one is astonished that, either through such hopes or through such fears, it could have been doubted that bribery would be pursued, under the new jurisdiction, upon the same principles as it was put down, or attempted to be put down, in the jurisdiction of Election Committees. Bribery at the common law, equally as by Act of Parliament, avoided an election where it took place. If there were general bribery, no matter from what fund, no matter by what person, though the sitting Member or his agents had nothing to do with it, that would defeat the election, upon the ground that it was not a proceeding pure and free, as an election ought to be, but that it was vitiated and corrupted by an influence which, coming from no matter what quarter, had defeated the proceeding, and shown it to be abortive. There is no proof of any such general bribery here. On the contrary, the proof shows an entire absence of any general corruption of that sort in this city of Lichfield.

With respect to the bribery of particular individuals, it is not enough to show that a stranger to the Member and to his agents bribed one or two persons. If that were permitted to avoid an election, any mischievous or hostile person could, by giving one bribe, defeat the whole proceeding, and gain the advantage of his own wicked act. But if you show that the Member bribed, of course it follows as a matter of justice he cannot hold his seat. If you show that the agent of the Member bribed, though without the authority, and even contrary to the express orders of the Member, the seat is forfeited, not by way of punishment to the Member, but in order to avoid the danger that would exist if persons who are subordinate to the Member in the course of the election are led away by their desire to benefit their superior, into illegal acts, the precise extent of which it is difficult to prove, a single one of which therefore, when proved, it is the policy of the law to hold, should have the effect of avoiding the proceeding. That a Member was so answerable for his agent at the common law—agent in the sense of conducting the election, not merely being authorised to bribe—is perfectly clear. It was so laid down as clear by Lord Tenterden, before the passing of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 36, which I have already referred to. That section, where it speaks of agents, must be construed by the light of the common law, and must be read as including agents authorised in the conduct of the election or to canvass, and not merely agents authorised to bribe. If there could be any doubt that such was the law, that doubt is completely set at rest by the 43rd and following sections of "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868," by the former of which, the 43rd, bribery committed with the knowledge and consent of the Member, subjects him for seven years to the disability of being returned to Parliament, of voting at any election, or of holding any judicial office, and would subject the sitting Member in this case, if it were proved against him, to be struck out of the commission of the peace, and subject him to discredit of a character as serious as it would be just. That 43rd section leaves the case of bribery by agents to be dealt with by those which follow, and the result is clear (and I have only been thus elaborate in stating the result of the law upon the subject, because of doubts that have been thrown out of late as to whether such was the law), that a single act of bribery proved either against the Member, or against an agent engaged in the conduct of the election, will have the effect of defeating the election. Has such an act been proved in the present case against the candidate, or against any one of his agents?

With respect to the candidate himself, it is said that he was guilty of bribery in one or other of four cases. The first is the case of Barlow, to whom it is said that he promised a place in St. John's Hospital. Is it made out that Colonel Dyott promised Barlow a place in St. John's Hospital upon the condition of voting for him? That depends first of all upon the evidence of Barlow; and next upon the evidence of Colonel Dyott himself, and his agent, Mr. Greene, who accompanied him. One has had the advantage of hearing Barlow examined, and also of hearing the account given by Colonel Dyott and Mr. Greene, and without going through the details of the evidence which has been given in court, and of which everybody who has listened to it has had the opportunity of judging for himself, I may shortly sum it up in this way, that Barlow, who was an old man in years, and failing, was very desirous of getting into St. John's Hospital. Mr. Greene, Mr. Dyott's agent, was the solicitor to the hospital; and Barlow hoped, no doubt, to get into the hospital, and desired it very much; and also, there can be no doubt, he knew that Mr. Greene had some interest at the hospital. This appears to be coupled with the fact, that in the conversation in which Barlow was canvassed, he did express a desire to be taken into the hospital, and that Mr. Greene gave an answer which rather put him off than promised him. I believe that those are the only conclusions of fact that can properly be drawn from the evidence; and it would be a stretch of inference quite unwarranted by the evidence as given to construe what passed, and which really amounted to nothing more than that Barlow knew well beforehand that Mr. Greene had an interest at the hospital, and that Mr. Greene knew well beforehand that Barlow would like to be taken into the hospital—to construe expressions which amounted to nothing more than putting in words what each of them knew before, into a promise made on that occasion, that he should be taken into the hospital if he voted, as he afterwards did, for Colonel Dyott. It would be a perversion, and a distortion of the facts, to hold that there was a corrupt promise made at the time upon condition of his voting.

The law cannot strike, it is in vain to attempt it, at the existence of influence. The law can no more take away from a man who has property, and a man who has the means of giving employment, the insensible but powerful influence which he has over those whom, if he has a heart, he can benefit by the proper use of his wealth, and by the proper distribution of his employment, than the law can take away from him his honesty, or his good feeling, or his courage, or his good looks, or whatever other qualities a man possesses, which give him an influence over his fellows. It is the abuse of influence with which alone the law can deal. Influence cannot be said to be abused because it exists, and because it is known to exist, and because it operates; it is only abused in a case of this kind, where an inducement is held out by a promise in the terms of the 2nd section of the Act of the Queen—a promise to induce the voter to vote or not vote at the election; a promise given upon the condition of voting would be an abuse of the influence, and would be a bribe. And it is not merely technical, it is good sense to say that you must have as good evidence of that promise illegally made as you would require if the promise were a legal one, to sustain an action by Barlow against Colonel Dyott, upon Barlow voting for him, for not procuring, or trying to procure, him a place in the hospital; and no jury would for a moment think of drawing the conclusion that such a promise was made in the present case.

With respect to Devereux, which is the next case, it is said in effect that Colonel Dyott promised him the place of a bailiff. I forbear repeating the general remarks I have made in connection with Barlow's case, which apply here. I should say that Devereux's case in proof was a weaker case than Barlow's, because assuming the facts even as opened to be true, whatever inducement Colonel Dyott may in the course of the conversation be alleged to have held out to Devereux, if you construe it in the most rigid way, and not merely as one of those conversations which I presume candidates are obliged to hold with talkative voters about the state of their family, and about what they wish and what they want, and how they are off, and so on (one of the mischiefs of canvassing is, I presume, that a man is obliged to act sometimes as if he had more interest than he really has in the private affairs of voters); if you construe it in the more rigid sense which I am not inclined to do, whatever was in Colonel Dyott's mind to do on the occasion, was withheld according to the suggestion on the part of the Petitioner by one of his agents interfering and saying, "You are going too far: stay," upon which it is said he did stay, and he certainly stayed with effect, because, if I mistake not, Devereux voted for Major Anson. It is quite obvious that I may pass that case without any further remark.

Then comes the case of the Sergeant-Major Rouse, and with respect to Rouse, you must take the evidence of Rouse and the evidence of Colonel Dyott together. This case has two parts; first, what took place before the election, and, secondly, what took place after. It is in respect of what took place before the election that this case must be dealt with; and what took place after can only be looked to so far as it reflects light upon what took place before. Was there any promise to Rouse to obtain him a place in the militia or the police on condition of voting, as he did, for Colonel Dyott? The evidence upon that, both the evidence of Rouse and the evidence of Colonel Dyott, is in the negative that no such promise was made. Is any light reflected upon the transaction by what afterwards took place, so as to disclose that such promise must have been made notwithstanding the denial of both parties? What took place was this, that on or about the 21st of December, a month after the election, Colonel Dyott sent a testimonial on behalf of Rouse, for the purpose of getting him a place in the Northamptonshire police. I pass that by with this remark, I detest the system of testimonial, I only look upon testimonials with a feeling (I use a mild word) of disregard. I have sometimes been astonished how persons of character and honour have one after another, like sheep following the bell-wether, put their names to Round Robins and testimonials in terms in which, if they were writing a private letter, they would not have expressed themselves. A good deal has been said about that testimonial; I shall not enter into its merits, I will simply say it does not satisfy me, looking at the evidence of Rouse himself, confirmed by the evidence of Colonel Dyott, that any such promise was made, as would amount to a bribe before the election.

Then comes the evidence of the barber. I hardly know how to deal with that case. I think what it comes to is, that so far as the barber is concerned he is an eccentric chap, and I should have thought a very troublesome one; and I should certainly have felt some discomfort myself if he had called at my house of a morning and wanted to see me, or to shave me, and I should have had some trouble in knowing how to get rid of him, because he is apparently excitable and talkative, as well as eccentric; he is just the sort of man you would like to be rid of, and would not like to be rid of in a violent way; your impulse would be to say, "Now do, for any sake, get about your business, and do not trouble me;" but you would not like to take him by the shoulder, and you would not like to say anything offensive to him, especially as he is a person who appears to have a very high opinion of himself. This person, suffering under a very bad carbuncle, was visited by Colonel Dyott; the colonel appears to have taken compassion upon him, and to have given him a bottle of port wine, which some people suppose to be the best salve for a carbuncle. He sent it in such a way that, if the barber is to be believed, the barber did not know from whom it came. If it were sent openly it would be said, here is a glaring bribe; being sent secretly, it is said, here is a consciousness of wrong. I do not know how a man who takes compassion upon another, and sends something good for him, without any particular bad intention in doing so, is to escape a remark upon the one side or upon the other. It does not appear to me to have been in the least meant as a bribe, especially coming to a person whose promise had before been given, and who, I think, was not at all affected by it. As for the cutting the butler's hair, I think that hardly weighs more than the material that was cut off at the time. I am bound, therefore, to say that this last case really made no impression upon my mind, and I regret if I appear to have spoken of it in a light way; no case ought to be considered in a light way in which there is a charge of the odious offence of bribery, or in which there is the honour of a gentleman at stake. I am bound to acquit Colonel Dyott personally, and I do so in the amplest manner, from any charge of corruption.

Now, I come to deal with the case of the agents; and in dealing with the case of the agents I shall take first that of Hall. Mr. John Valentine Hall is said to have bribed the Deakins, father and son, or one of them, and especially he is said to have bribed the son, with, amongst other things, a sovereign; and I must shortly sum up that case by saying that the father and son successively announced in the box that which, in whatever way it is understood, must redound to their discredit as long as they live. If they were speaking falsely, they have the discredit of having done so upon their oaths in a court of justice. If they were speaking truly, each of those persons was prepared to sell himself to the highest bidder at the election; he was prepared to sell the franchise which a man ought to exercise freely and honestly, for the good of himself and his fellow-subjects, in favour of the best man, for the most money that was to be had for it. We have their testimony against that of Mr. Hall, who appeared to me to be about as sturdy, straightforward, and honest-looking a person as I have met for many a long day; and I cannot for a moment doubt that Mr. Hall's evidence is true, and that the Deakins' evidence, as I suspected at the time, was untrue, and not to be acted upon. Mr. Hall explained that the sovereign was for the purchase of a pair of ferrets, which ferrets he has in his possession. Deakin, the son, would make out that it was given as a bribe, and that there was afterwards a pretence by Mr. Hall that it was given for the ferrets; that the ferrets were lent, and not delivered in pursuance of his duty to purchase them for Mr. Hall with the sovereign. That case is entirely answered.

Then there is the case of Johnson, with reference to Abraham Clarke, and the 2s. and the jacket. With respect to that, both Clarke and Johnson say that 2s. was given. I think it was opened that a suit of clothes was given. This shows how these things are talked over, and how persons get exaggerated notions of cases. It turns out that Johnson, finding that Clarke had been set upon by some of his political opponents, though not, it appears, in a way to do him very much harm, and that a complaint was made that the house was made dirty, and that Clarke's jacket was torn, gave his sister 2s. (she complaining very much) to clean up the house, and Clarke said, to mend the jacket. I must remember that while the judge sitting here ought to be strong to repress and to punish illegality, he must not be suspicious, and, above all, he must not be violent, lest he should lose the respect without which his decisions cannot be enforced. I think it would be suspicious and violent to act upon those cases, to act upon either the promise of an old jacket to a man like Clarke, whose jacket had been torn in the scene of violence, or the giving of the 2s. to his sister to clean up the house. I think calling those bribes would be calling things by their wrong names.

Williamson is the next agent, and he is said to have bribed Sandlands, the blacksmith. It appears that Sandlands was employed by Mr. Williamson to put on some tires; and it appears that when that particular work is being done a certain allowance of beer is given. That is not an uncommon or an incredible thing; and I do not suppose anybody doubts the evidence either of Sandlands or Mr. Williamson, that such a custom may or does exist. Those who employ people at disagreeable work know very well that they have to pay something extra, and make some allowance for the particularly disagreeable work, whether it be by land or water, and I entirely believe that there was an allowance to be made to Sandlands in respect of the tires; but instead of merely drinking the 2s. worth of beer, which he ought to have done, he appears to have run up a score of some 2l. If he did that by the authority of Williamson there would, indeed, be a case of suspicion, if not of proof, against one of the persons who is alleged to have been an agent of Colonel Dyott; but if you take Sandlands' evidence, that Mr. Williamson told him to have a pint or two for himself or his friends, when he liked (I think he said first a pint and then enlarged it afterwards to a pint or two), if I take that evidence and look at it by itself, and am called upon to come to a conclusion upon it, whether Mr. Williamson intended that the pint was to be repeated as often as Sandlands liked, and to whatever extent the money for it might go, I must decline, as a man of common sense, to come to any such conclusion; and when you have Mr. Williamson denying that that was so, and stating that his intention was merely to give the allowance which was usually given upon such an occasion, the inference of any bribery of Sandlands, either actual or intended, appears to me to be sufficiently removed.

Now, I come to the case of Mr. Hinckley. Mr. Hinckley is said to have bribed a voter named Rogers with 1l. This case has required, and has received, an anxious consideration at my hands. There are two questions; first of all, whether Rogers did, in fact, receive a sovereign from Ashley or his wife: whether Rogers' wife did, in fact, receive a sovereign from Ashley and his wife on account of Rogers voting at the election for Colonel Dyott. If that fact be made out, there would still have to be established that Mr. Hinckley was cognizant of the fact; because the single act of Ashley or his wife in giving a bribe to Rogers would, upon the principles I have already explained, not defeat the election of Colonel Dyott. That single act would strike the vote off the poll, and upon a scrutiny would entitle Major Anson, if it constituted one of a majority, to be rid of it, as being a vote corruptly obtained. But inasmuch as Ashley was not an agent of Colonel Dyott, and it was not part of a scheme of general bribery, Colonel Dyott's election would not be avoided, unless his majority consisted of that or of such votes. With respect to the first question, it must be admitted to be one involved in considerable difficulty. A variety of witnesses were called, beginning with Mrs. Ashley. I especially refer to the evidence of Mrs. Barker, from which it would seem that Rogers' wife showed a sovereign when she came back from Ashley's, and that she did not allow her husband to vote until she had that sovereign in her possession; and there is evidence, not of a satisfactory kind, as to how that sovereign got into the possession of Rogers or his wife, otherwise than by its having been given to them by somebody. There is the assertion of a sovereign having been obtained upon the Friday previous to the election; and there is the fact that no sovereign was obtained by Rogers on account of his wages since the Friday before that Friday. There is also the evidence of Ashley, Barker, and Woodhead; and I particularly refer to the evidence of those witnesses as to the sovereign having been mentioned on that morning as a consideration for Rogers' vote; as to its having been shown, and as to its having been boasted of. On the other hand, there is the denial of both Rogers and his wife that that sovereign was given; and there is the evidence of Ashley, the landlord of the "Britannia," who is stated to have given it through his wife; and the evidence of the wife herself, contradicting or denying that a sovereign was given, or that they knew anything of a sovereign having been given to Mrs. Rogers on that morning; and there is, moreover, the improbability, and it is a strong improbability, if Ashley resorted, as it is stated, to the contrivance of sending his wife, in his own place, when one would think that they might have gone into a corner of the room for the purpose of doing it, of sending his wife to the ashpit in the garden, there to give the sovereign to Mrs. Rogers, a circumstance which, if it were true, must have impressed upon Mrs. Rogers the importance of concealing the fact that she had a sovereign; there is the exceeding improbability of Mrs. Rogers going through the street, accompanied by Ashley, who followed shortly behind, proclaiming, as it were, by sound of trumpet, "I have been bribed; I have had a sovereign, and the person who bribed me is following me." That is an inconsistency in the conduct of two of the chief characters concerned, which must be taken into account in determining whether that sovereign was, in fact, given or not by Ashley. I leave the first question, and I come to deal with the second. If it be made out that the sovereign was given to Mrs. Rogers, is it further made out (because that is necessary in order to establish establish the Petition), that Mr. Hinckley, the agent of Colonel Dyott, was cognizant of the sovereign being given. With respect to that, it appears to me that the question must be determined upon the weight to be attributed to the evidence of Mrs. Ashley upon the one hand, and of Mr. Hinckley upon the other. If Mrs. Ashley is to be believed, Mr. Hinckley not only was cognizant of the fact, but Mr. Hinckley proclaimed the fact in the open day, and under circumstances in which he was likely to be, and was, according to her, overheard, told Rogers, upon Rogers saying he would not vote till he had the sovereign, that he should have the sovereign if he did vote. It is impossible to avoid that conclusion that either Mrs. Ashley, upon the one hand, is inventing, or that Mr. Hinckley, upon the other, is guilty of wilful perjury. I cannot adopt the theory that a person in possession of his senses could have his memory so shaken by the excitement of an election morning as to forget the fact that he had promised a sovereign to Rogers (for that is the theory) in consideration of his voting, and that he repeated and confirmed that promise in order to bring Rogers up to poll, and was a party to a transaction, the result of which was, that Rogers, through his wife, received the sovereign for voting. I must come to the conclusion, if I come to a conclusion unfavourable to Mr. Hinckley's testimony, that he was guilty of perjury. I am satisfied, whatever judgment ought to be formed upon the first branch of the case, that no such judgment ought to be arrived at in disfavour of Mr. Hinckley upon the second. I am satisfied that he is acquitted of this charge, the magnitude of which, in any point of view, could hardly be exaggerated; the magnitude of which would not have deterred me, I hope, if I had been satisfied in my conscience that Mr. Hinckley was guilty of that which is imputed to him, from declaring my conviction of the fact; but the magnitude of which has made it necessary that I should seriously consider whether the evidence amounted to conviction; and I am so far from being satisfied that it amounts to conviction, that I am convinced of the contrary.

It remains to deal with what has struck me, I own all through, as the most difficult part of this case; and that is, that part of it affecting Mr. Symonds, who was also one of the agents of Colonel Dyott. I do not say the most difficult point of this case in respect of the complication of the evidence, but the most difficult point of the case, because it appears to me that what Mr. Symonds did in one particular did go closer to the mind than anything that has come under my notice during the course of the proceedings as having occurred at the election. I deal first with the case of Baxter. With respect to Baxter's case, the facts are few. Baxter had been in the employment of Mr. Symonds. He had left that employment in the year 1867, under circumstances of which, partly because I do not wish to be the means unnecessarily or irrelevantly of reviving any unkind feelings that may have existed either in the mind of Mr. Symonds or of Baxter, but principally because it is not necessary, in the discharge of my duty, to do more, I abstain from saying more than that they were circumstances which made a very painful impression upon my mind. I wish that people could learn in politics, as they are obliged to do in religious matters, the duty of agreeing to differ when reasonable means of persuasion fail. I wish that they would learn to live and let live. I wish that it should be considered that persons when they are employed are employed to render a fair day's work for a fair day's wages, and that they do not sell their opinions but only their handiwork. However, I pass that by. The circumstances resulted, whatever they were, in there being some anger between the master and the man, and Baxter left Mr. Symonds's employ; Baxter unquestionably was anxious to get back into his employment, and there can be no doubt that that influence which I may class with those insensible influences which cannot be helped, which no law can control, upon which I have already observed, did exist at the time that Baxter voted at the election. Was there, in addition to that influence, a bribe in the sense of a promise that if he voted for Colonel Dyott he should be taken back into Mr. Symonds's employment? That he was taken back into Mr. Symonds's employment very soon after the election is certain, and we may even arrive at the conclusion without prejudicing the decision of the question that Mr. Symonds would not, or probably might not have taken Baxter back unless he had so voted. Still the question remains whether the promise was made to Baxter upon condition of his so voting. That promise was endeavoured to be proved by the evidence of Atterton. There can be no doubt that Atterton did see Baxter shortly before the election, and that he did suggest to Baxter how desirable it would be that he should get back into Mr. Symonds's employ; and how probable it was that Mr. Symonds, who appears to have thought and so far as one can judge of the man's appearance in the box, justly thought he was a good man, and desired to have him back, how probable it was that Mr. Symonds would take him back if he asked him. Baxter and Atterton deny that any promise was made, but if Atterton had authority from Mr. Symonds to make a suggestion in that pointed manner so soon before the election, nobody could find fault with a jury or with a judge, who came to the conclusion that there was a promise implied if not expressed. Did Atterton act by the authority of Mr. Symonds? That remains to be proved. It was left unproved upon the part of the Petitioner. It was left to inference, amounting to suspicion only, and upon such inference and suspicion I must decline to act for the purpose of defeating an election. Atterton and Symonds being called, denied that there was such an authority upon Atterton's part, and in the absence of that authority, the conduct of Atterton (blameable or not blameable, it is unnecessary to pronounce upon that now) is not traced home to an agent of Colonel Dyott by such evidence as to affect the election of that gentleman.

Then there is the other act of Mr. Symonds with respect to White, and upon that only does it remain to say anything. This case obviously turns upon a question of law; it does not turn so much upon a question of fact, though there is one, namely, whether the evidence is sufficient to satisfy my mind that the 9s. 6d. came from an agent of Colonel Dyott, and that it was sent with the intention of influencing the mind of the voter White. There is another question, namely, whether the letters which are stated to have passed between Mr. Symonds and White did amount, as did the letters in Sir Frederick Slade's case, to a conditional promise to pay the expenses in the event of White voting at the election for Colonel Dyott. In dealing with this case, it is impossible to exclude the fact (what the precise force of it ought to be may be a question of argument), that White did not vote for Colonel Dyott. As a matter of result, if the case is to be judged of by the result, White was not influenced. The letters which passed between Mr. Symonds and White did not induce him to vote for Colonel Dyott. The 9s. 6d. did not induce him to vote for Colonel Dyott; he voted for Major Anson. That, however, would not prevent a bribe from being a bribe, if such a bribe is established in evidence. A man who votes for Major Anson having received money for promising to vote for Colonel Dyott is guilty of bribery equally as if he voted according to his promise, and even if at the time he promised he had no intention of fulfilling it. A man must not palter with his conscience. If he takes a bribe to act upon it, he is unquestionably guilty, and his vote goes for nothing; and if he is convicted of it, he is justly disabled, under the 45th section of the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868, for seven years. Was there a bribe in this case? The law upon the subject of the payment of expenses to electors is to be found in the case so often referred to, that of Cooper v. Slade (6 House of Lords Cases, 746); and if the letter sent by Mr. Symonds did amount to a promise that the expenses would be paid if White came and voted for Colonel Dyott, the bribe was complete at the time; and it was not the less complete because the voter was one who never ought to have voted at the election at all, because he had ceased to be resident, and had by the Act the 6th of Victoria, chap. 18, sect. 79, ceased to have any right to vote at the election. Upon this question, whether the second letter written by Mr. Symonds did amount to a conditional promise, there was not much argument, and upon consideration I think properly. In the absence of the letter and in the conflict of evidence between White and Ball on the one hand, and Mr. Symonds upon the other, especially considering that Mr. Symonds had had the advice of Mr. Greene, who was perfectly aware of the law upon this subject, I think it would be wrong to come to the conclusion that the letters did amount to a conditional promise, and I must set that part of the question aside. There remains, however, to consider the effect of the payment of 9s. 6d., and whilst upon this point I must observe, and it is right I should do so for the guidance of those who have to deal with like cases in future (I do not mean upon the bench, but in conducting elections), that Sir Frederick Slade's case having been decided on the 17th April 1858, in that same year the matter was considered by the Legislature, and an Act was passed which allowed the candidate to provide conveyances for the voters to the poll, but which in express terms says "It shall not be lawful to pay any money or give any valuable consideration to a voter for or in respect of his travelling expenses;" and for an obvious reason, because of the extreme danger of over-payments being made under the guise of expenses, and the side-door to abuse, that the allowance of such a practice, even to that extent, would open.

Then the remaining enactment upon the subject is to be found in the Act of last year, the new Reform Act, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, s. 36, by which leaving the question of giving a lift to the poll to a person in the borough untouched, it is made unlawful to pay either to the voter or to any person from whom conveyances are hired, any money on account of conveyances to the poll; and the exceptions are only in cases of boroughs of large extent, like counties, where it might be unreasonable to expect that the voter would pay the sum to come up and vote himself; in boroughs the non-residents are either so few, or being disentitled by the section I have already referred to, are not regarded by the Legislature; therefore, if that sum of 9s. 6d. was sent by an agent of Colonel Dyott, with the intention of inducing White to come up and vote for that gentleman, it was a bribe within the 17 & 18 Vict., and would have the effect of avoiding the election. The only remaining question is, whether it is proved in point of fact that it did come from the agent of Colonel Dyott. Upon that point the evidence consists upon the one hand of inference from the fact of a correspondence having taken place between Mr. Symonds, who was the agent, and White; and from the fact of the second letter of Mr. Symonds, which is lost, coming simultaneously, or nearly so, with a letter anonymous, but containing a slip, "vote for Dyott," and the 9s. 6d. The inference to be drawn from that, in the absence of evidence to rebut it, would be obviously that it must have come from some person in the same boat with Mr. Symonds, and so, probably, therefore, from an agent of Colonel Dyott, and that it ought to be concluded that it came from such a source. That inference however is met on the part of the respondent with a positive denial by Mr. Symonds, and a circumstantial one, accompanied by the explanation that he knew it was illegal to send the expenses, and therefore abstained from doing so; and it is also met by a denial on the part of Colonel Dyott, satisfactory, so far as his knowledge is concerned; and on the part of Mr. Greene, more or less satisfactory, considering that I must come to the conclusion that he hardly liked to make too minute inquiries into the matter, but so far as his knowledge is concerned, and that a knowledge derived from having the management of the election on the part of Colonel Dyott, a denial that it came from him, or from any person connected with Colonel Dyott, to his knowledge.

Is it so improbable, putting the whole evidence together, that that 9s. 6d. may have been paid by some indiscreet or ignorant friend of Colonel Dyott's, not an agent, as actually took took place in the case tried before me last week at Guildford, that I ought to fix upon the sitting Member a responsibility for an act which is only traced to him by inference, and the actual effect of which was, as it appears, to produce a vote for his opponent. I think, considering the solemnity and weight which ought to be attributed to an election, so far as one can judge in all its substantials, regularly and properly conducted, and to the amount and weight of evidence that ought justly to be required in order to disturb a transaction of that description, looking back also to the precedents which exist as to the action of election committees in cases of this description, and finding none which would justify me in going the length of avoiding the election upon the ground that there is sufficient evidence to trace the payment of 9*s.* 6*d.* home to an agent for whom Colonel Dyott is responsible, I ought not to arrive at that conclusion.

Having thus disposed of all the points save those disposed of in the course of the case, and which it would be tedious again to refer to, I must conclude by stating that I deem and determine as follows:—

First, that the Member whose return is complained of by the Petition was duly elected and returned.

Secondly, that no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any candidate at such election.

Thirdly, upon the evidence before me, it does not appear that corrupt practices have, nor that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have, extensively prevailed at the election; and I shall certify to the Speaker accordingly.

NORWICH ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Baron Martin, 18 January 1869.

Lichfield.

Norwich.

Mr. Baron Martin.] WITH regard to one of the matters on which I am called upon to make a certificate to the Speaker, I do not propose to bind myself until I hear the whole of the evidence; but upon another, and the most important one, probably, in the case, I entertain no doubt. It is not a matter upon which, as it appears to me, in any judicial mind there can exist doubt.

With respect to the late election at Norwich, I have formed a strong opinion; I may state that there is not one word that has been said by Sir Henry Stracey, or by Mr. Patteson, or by the gentleman who was the agent, that I do not believe. I believe that they have been speaking the truth; I believe that there was an agency at the late Norwich election on behalf of Sir Henry Stracey; but I believe that there was another agency, of which we know nothing, and of the source or origin of which I have failed to get any trace. I believe that there was a dishonest and corrupt agency which was brought into play about the middle of the polling-day, and which ultimately carried the election; that there was a great number of persons bribed in small sums, and for the reason mentioned by my brother Ballantine, that there was no other buyer in the market; there was only one purchaser, and that purchaser had the market to himself; and that these persons took the small sums offered them, being desirous, if possible, of getting more. I have no doubt that at the late Norwich election there was a dishonest agency at work from the middle of the day of the polling. I have not reason to believe, nor do I entertain the idea, that Sir Henry Stracey or any of the gentlemen who were immediately connected with him, had anything to do with it. If I had the means, I should have been glad to expose the quarter from whence the money came with which Hardiment was supplied for the purpose of his corrupt work. I am desirous of saying so much at the commencement of the very few observations I have to make. At the conclusion of the case, I probably shall make some more; but, as I have said, it is a matter of gratification to me to declare, that it is my honest conviction that Sir Henry Stracey has spoken the truth, and that he was not concerned personally in the bribery which took place.

With regard to the law on this matter, it is clear. The 43rd section of this Act of Parliament enacts that when it is found that bribery has been committed, by or with the knowledge or consent of the candidate, a certificate shall be made to that effect by the judge; the result of which would be to impose very serious disabilities upon the candidate. With regard to that, the evidence of what took place at the “Trumpet” bore, at the conclusion of the Petitioner’s case, against Sir Henry Stracey; but I think he has answered it, and therefore it will be my duty, in the report which I shall make to the Speaker, to state that no evidence was adduced to satisfy me that bribery had been committed with the knowledge or consent of Sir Henry Stracey.

But by the 46th section, coupled with the 36th section of another Act of Parliament, (the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102), another offence is created. These two sections enact that in the event of a candidate, by an agent, committing bribery, he becomes incapable of being elected; and when a candidate, by an agent, for whom he is responsible, commits an act of bribery, by that act the capacity of the candidate to be elected ceases; his status is destroyed, and no vote given to him will be of any avail. Some misapprehension occurred with regard to what I stated the other day in reference to that matter. It is not that the vote is thrown away in the sense in which my brother Ballantine seems to have supposed. I did not mean it in that sense; I meant, that the moment an act of bribery is done by the agent, for whom the candidate is responsible, from that moment the man is incapable of being elected. The law puts its hand upon him, and says it cares not if nine-tenths of the electors vote for him. That act of bribery incapacitates him from sitting in Parliament; and the real question which is to be decided in this case is, whether or not the admitted bribery by Hardiment, about two or three o'clock in the afternoon, is an act for which Sir Henry Stracey is responsible according to the law of England, or the election law, if you think fit to call it so.

The facts are these:—The election took place on the 17th of November. Up to the middle of the day everything seems to have gone on honestly. I have no doubt that there are a number of people in this town who honestly and conscientiously support both sides of the great questions of the day. Up to one or two o'clock votes were honestly given. About the middle of the day there was a large majority in favour of Mr. Tillett and the other gentleman who stood with him. But the result of that day's polling was this: that between three and half-past three in No. 3 Ward, there were 40 votes polled for Sir Henry Stracey; and that between half-past three and four there were 121 polled for him. In the 6th Ward, between three and half-past three there were 43 votes polled for Sir Henry Stracey; and between half-past three and four there were 103 votes. In the 7th Ward, between three and half-past three, there were 66 votes polled for Sir Henry Stracey; and between half-past three and four, there were 123 who voted for him. And the result was, that between half-past three and four, out of the constituency you have heard mentioned, there were 504 votes polled for Sir Henry Stracey; and it is stated in evidence, by three or four gentlemen who were employed to take the poll, that a very considerable number of those voters came up in a state of intoxication, so gross, that in some instances they did not know who were the candidates for whom they were going to vote. And it is further proved that in three public-houses there were a number of men of the very lowest class of voters waiting, according to the expression of one of them, "on the look-out," and I have no doubt that these men were in these public-houses, waiting to be bribed; and that they were bribed, and that the great proportion of that low class of voters who voted in the afternoon of that day, that is, between half-past three and four, were bribed voters.

The portion of the matter which affects Sir Henry Stracey is the act of Hardiment at the "Woolpack," and that took place somewhere in the afternoon, say, from two to half-past three. The landlord of the "Woolpack" was called, and, according to his statement, there had been held at the "Woolpack" a committee who were friendly to the Liberal cause, and they continued to come to his house for some time, for about three months; and, as I collected from what fell from one of the witnesses, they afterwards thought that they must give a turn to some other man, and remove the meeting from the "Woolpack" to another house. This body then ceased to come there; and upon the day of the election it is proved beyond doubt that a considerable number of voters were at this house; and it is also proved that Mr. Harper, who took an active part on behalf of Mr. Tillett, came to the house, and saw the landlord, who told him that it was useless for him to see those men except he was prepared to pay them a day's wages. According to the evidence of the landlord, Mr. Harper went away to consult some committee about it, and his evidence had a tendency to prove that he afterwards came back, and as the landlord understood, or as he wished me to understand, he was prepared to comply with the wish of those men, and to pay the day's wages; but that he, the landlord, from an unwillingness that a transaction of this sort, which he thought, and thought rightly, would be bribery, should take place, prevented him from seeing the men; but I regret to state that the landlord denied that at that time Hardiment was at the house, whilst it was proved beyond doubt by a very respectable man, a friend of Sir Henry Stracey's, that at that very time Hardiment was upstairs with those men bribing them with a guinea each, to induce them to vote for Sir Henry Stracey. That is proved to such an extent that Mr. Rodwell, with the good sense which has distinguished him always, and which has distinguished him so eminently throughout this investigation, felt that it was perfectly idle to contest it. It is as plain as anything can be, that some time in the afternoon of that day, Hardiment went to this house, and was admitted by the landlord to the men there. It had been a Liberal house, and these people were liberally inclined. It is something, though it is little, that they seemed to have been willing to have taken a day's wages from Mr. Tillett, whereas they required about four times a day's wages to vote for Sir Henry Stracey. The result was, that having got this money they went and voted for Sir Henry Stracey. Hardiment, then, having bribed beyond all doubt, is Sir Henry Stracey responsible for it? It is proved by his agent, who was called this morning, that he had committees appointed in eight wards; and that in this ward, where Hardiment acted, the principal person managing it was Mr. Wiseman. I do not think that any injustice can be done to Sir Henry Stracey if the evidence of Mr. Wiseman is taken to be true; I have no reason to disbelieve Mr. Wiseman. He states that he was the manager at this eighth ward; that he was appointed by the attorney; that the persons who attended there were young Mr. Stracey, Mr. Hardiment, and Mr. Dawson. He then states in answer, not to any question of my brother Ballantine, but in answer to the gentleman who examined him on behalf of Sir Henry Stracey, that they were canvassers; that the eldest son of Sir Henry Stracey and Hardiment canvassed together. He said, "Hardiment went out at half-past 10 in the morning; he and young Mr. Stracey went out together. They had books; I did not see Sir Henry Stracey himself there; Mr. Thirkettle" (the man who has been alluded to, and who is now managing the business of Hardiment, who has absconded) "was there. There were four books. Hardiment went out the second day with two other gentlemen, but not with young Mr. Stracey." This was anterior to the election; but in the afternoon of the polling-day Hardiment went to this public-house, and there bought the voters to whom I have referred; and how can I draw any other conclusion than that that man was, in point of fact and reality, an agent, and a canvassing agent acting with the son of Sir Henry Stracey. I should bring this tribunal, or any other tribunal, into contempt, if I failed to draw the conclusion that that man was acting under the authority of Sir Henry Stracey in doing what he did. It is impossible to arrive at any other conclusion.

The result is that I shall report to the Speaker that bribery was committed at this election by the agent of Sir Henry Stracey. I entertain as little doubt as I can entertain upon any question, that I have come to a correct decision.

I will postpone any further observations that I may make with regard to this case, until the whole of it is completed; but there are matters which have occurred in this election which I do hope the respectable people of Norwich, on both sides, will take into their consideration and endeavour to put a stop to, which are not merely a disgrace to Norwich, but to the kingdom. Here are men to whom the suffrage has been given, upon the statement that they were honest, respectable men, earning their wages, having independent opinions, and who would give their votes honestly. It may be that there are many such people in Norwich, and I hope that there are; but what have we heard here? We have heard of people who go to a public-house, begin the day by drinking, take it as a sort of holiday, and at the end of the day are in a state of drunkenness, and sell themselves at the election for a few shillings, and go and vote against their consciences, under the corrupt influence which is brought to bear upon them by persons who, I have no hesitation in saying, are infinitely worse than the men themselves.

Mr. Ballantine stated that he had advised his client not to proceed with the scrutiny.

Mr. Baron Martin.] This, therefore, will be an end of the inquiry. The only matter to which I have to give consideration is with respect to what I shall certify to the Speaker as to my belief that corrupt practices have existed to a considerable extent at this election, and I really would wish to get further evidence upon this point, if any one can give me evidence upon it. I wish to know what was done at other public-houses. I cannot believe that those were the only three public-houses at Norwich where this work of corruption went on. I do not want myself to initiate inquiries, but I have a strong impression upon my mind that there was very considerable corruption going on at Norwich during the afternoon of that day, and I am certain that there exist the means of giving me information upon the subject. I have no doubt that there were two agencies at work during this election; an honest agency and a dishonest agency. It will be a serious matter for this borough, for an inquiry may lead to what has taken place at Yarmouth.

With regard to the second head on which I have to report, that is, the names of the persons who have been proved at the trial to have been guilty of corrupt practices, I shall make a return to the Speaker of the names of those persons who themselves swore that they were bribed. The costs follow the event.

Mr. Rodwell asked his Lordship to specify more particularly what costs he alluded to.

Mr. Baron Martin.] The costs of the Petitioner, to which the Petitioner is entitled, are those which have been incurred by him in respect of showing his freedom from all bribery and those which have been incurred in showing that there was bribery for which Sir Henry Stracey was responsible.

Mr. Rodwell submitted that Sir Henry Stracey ought not to be called upon to pay the costs which had been incurred in defending himself against the charge of agency, and against the scrutiny with which he had been threatened by the Petitioner.

Mr. Baron Martin.] I am satisfied that there were a very great number of bribed votes given on behalf of Sir Henry Stracey. My impression is that Sir Henry Stracey ought not to have the costs of that, but I will consider the matter, and I will tell you to-morrow morning if I alter my mind.

Mr. Rodwell.] I should be obliged to your Lordship if you would intimate that to us in the morning.

Mr. Serjeant Ballantine.] I think my learned friend for once has fallen into a fallacy. There is really only one inquiry, and there is only one issue. The issue is whether or not Sir Henry Stracey has been duly elected.

Mr. Baron Martin.] You claim the seat, do you not?

Mr. Serjeant Ballantine.] But that is not the ground upon which my learned friend puts it, as I understand. That is disposed of, because nobody can say that the matter was vexatious, when the amount of bribery shown by Hardiment, and the number of votes undoubtedly bad, must be present to your Lordship's recollection; and therefore the only ground upon which the costs could be given against the Petitioner, would be that there had been anything vexatious in asking for a scrutiny. I think your Lordship will feel that there was nothing vexatious in that.

Norwich.

Mr. Baron Martin.] I do not at all judge of the matter upon the vexation. I myself think that that is not the true test. I do not see anything vexatious in the conduct of any one.

Mr. Rodwell.] The view that occurred to me was this: supposing this case had come into court simply under the 43rd section; supposing that there had not been a word about agency in any part of it; supposing that there had been nothing with regard to re-criminatory evidence, and that upon the evidence which had been given, Sir Henry Stracey had succeeded; then, I ask, what would have been the decision of the judge upon that particular case?

Mr. Baron Martin.] Do you mean that if Sir Henry Stracey had succeeded under the 43rd section, if you consider that a separate issue, he has succeeded; is that what you contend?

Mr. Rodwell.] That is my view.

Mr. Baron Martin.] I do not concur in it. I think there is only one issue upon that point.

After some further discussion with respect to costs,

Mr. Baron Martin.] The matter has terminated so far that Sir Henry Stracey has, by an agent, been guilty of an act which the law declares to have incapacitated him to sit in Parliament. It is alleged against Mr. Tillett that he had committed a similar act, and if he had he would be incapable of sitting in Parliament. That has failed with regard to Mr. Tillett; but to entitle Mr. Tillett to sit he must satisfy me that he had a majority of legal votes, and in that case every bribed vote and every vote admitted by mistake, must be struck off. He is not entitled to the seat until he does that, and the inquiry upon a scrutiny would be whether, in point of fact, upon the poll-book, Mr. Tillett had a majority of lawful votes. The law is equally clear with regard to voters as it is with regard to candidates. A person bribed loses his status as a voter, and his vote is an absolute nullity; he can no longer vote, and the pen must be run through his name, and he not counted as a voter, but until that is established, the vote must stand as it appears upon the poll-book, and if this were to have been gone into I should have expected that persons on both sides, with the view of saving trouble and expense, would have agreed upon those which were bad, merely fighting those that were doubtful. If you suppose that, because the agent of Sir Henry Stracey committed bribery at three o'clock in the afternoon of the polling day, thereupon every vote for Sir Henry Stracey after that time should be struck off, that is not correct.

I anticipated it as possible that I might have occasion to sit here to-morrow morning, but now that is unnecessary. I am as anxious to relieve the parties of expense as they can be to relieve themselves. I will speak to Mr. Justice Blackburn and Mr. Justice Willes upon this subject before I come to a final conclusion. My own opinion is what I tell you, that if I were dealing with the costs of a motion or rule in the Court of Exchequer, the costs would follow the event; but I will speak probably to both those learned judges, certainly to one of them, before I finally make up my mind. You may depend upon it that the case shall have the full consideration of one other mind, and probably of two, and nothing shall be done hastily.

I have now merely to state that, at the time I expected that the scrutiny would take place, I thought it probable that some light would be thrown upon the bribery during the discussion of that scrutiny, and if I saw the means of getting at the quarter from whence the money was supplied which paid those bribes, I would adjourn this case to any extent to get at it; for that it existed I do not entertain a doubt. The question that I have reserved for further consideration beyond that of the costs is whether or not I shall report that there is reason to believe that extensive bribery prevailed at Norwich at the last election. If I do so, probably the result will be that there will be a commission to inquire into the matter, which can be done, if it were only by taking the names on the poll-books from half-past one up to the end of the day. Such an inquiry might possibly lead to the disfranchisement of this city. One would be sorry that a population of 78,000 people, and having 13,000 electors upon the poll-book, should be deprived of their franchise by reason of the corrupt conduct of probably not one-tenth of the electors. But look what it is. Upon the day of this election there were a number of persons, who have lately got the franchise; they are men who earn their bread by their daily work; instead of going to their work, and voting, if they thought fit, when they went to their breakfast or their dinner, which they might easily have done, there would not have been the slightest difficulty in any one of them, during the period which they have for their meals, to have given their vote, they go to public-houses, and either of their own accord, or by the temptations of others, drink beer all day long. From what fell from some of the witnesses to-day, and which I daresay is true, some one or other gave them drink. There were a number of men called from the "Marquis of Granby," who said that they had drunk there, but never paid for it. That they were drinking during the day, and that there were a considerable number of such persons who voted is obvious to all. Now, is it not plain that the respectable people of this town should set their faces against those practices; they should one and all, of all sides of politics, endeavour to prevent such a thing existing, and, instead of availing themselves of of such persons as are always to be found, they should peremptorily refuse to have anything whatever to do with them. I should say, taking that as the view which moral and well-conducted and certainly religious men should take, that instead of availing themselves of those people who are ready to be corrupted, they should use all their influence to prevent it. That is the moral view of this subject, but there is a view that many people adopt, and that is the utility view; and in addition to the moral view, just consider what is the use of it. When a man is called upon to pay a sovereign for a vote, and he thinks he can get some benefit for it, there is a temptation for him to pay it, but if it is certain that it will not be of the slightest use, and that no benefit will come from it, it may aid his moral view to avoid it. There were, say, 16 or 20 people at one of those public-houses; they obviously expected more, and for some time they would not take the 5*s.* which was offered at the "Trumpet," and they ultimately did get a sovereign at the "Woolpack." The price came down from 2*l.* to 5*s.*, that being taken because, if they did not take that, they would get nothing. Can any human being suppose that 20 drunken men bribed in that way, and not getting as much as they required, would not complain of it the very night of the election, and that in 24 hours it would be as notorious as any other fact connected with the election, that men at the "Woolpack" were bribed by a sovereign, and that men at the "Trumpet" were bribed by 7*s.* 6*d.* What possible benefit can arise from obtaining voters by such means? The matter, I am satisfied, was as notorious at Norwich on the night of the election as it is now. I do not entertain the slightest doubt that in the neighbourhood of those public-houses it was known perfectly well what were the bribes that were given, and they probably were very discontented at not getting more. The probability is that half of the 7*s.* 6*d.* would go to pay the score that they ran up at the public-house, and the other half would be spent before they went home at night. Formerly there was a tribunal, which, I believe, was a perfectly honest tribunal, but it was a tribunal which was liable to be operated upon by addresses made to them by able and learned counsel, which they did not see their way to answer; but not merely will the persons who have now to preside upon these matters know the value of those speeches, and probably know how to answer them, but they will not be made before them. The sort of addresses that were made to Committees of the House of Commons will never be made to the judges at all. Votes thus procured are certain to defeat the end. Therefore I suggest to people of all parties in this town to set their faces against this corruption, and not to lend themselves to it. I do hope that they will see the advantage of putting an end to it, and that they will make any future election at this place a very different one from the last: make it a real bonâ fide honest election. This matter does not regard one side merely, it regards the town generally. The report which I shall make has to do with the state of the electors generally, and not with the one or the other side.

Mr. Rodwell.] They were probably in that state, many of them, that if the other side had given 5*s.* more, they would have got them.

Mr. Baron Martin.] I should think, from the evidence of Mr. Womersley, that, if they had given some of them 15*s.* less, they would have had them. I have intimated that my conduct in this election is not to be taken as a model for another. I shall endeavour in every future trial to conduct it according to the ordinary rules of law, and I will not allow a witness to be put up for the purpose of proving a fact, and when he fails in proving it, to be cross-examined as if he was not a witness to be believed. If gentlemen think proper to call witnesses, they must take the consequences.

OLDHAM ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Blackburn, 23 March 1869.

Mr. Justice Blackburn stated that an application on affidavit for an adjournment had been made to him in camerâ this morning, and that at present he saw no ground for granting an adjournment. With regard to two out of the three classes in the additional list, he ruled that they could not be gone into.

Mr. Rodwell applied for a short adjournment for consultation.

Mr. Justice Blackburn granted the application.

The Court adjourned for 20 minutes.

When the Court resumed its sitting,

Oldham.

Mr. Rodwell stated that, after consultation with himself, his learned friends, and his clients, exercising their best discretion upon his Lordship's decision, the Petitioners had come to the conclusion to withdraw the Petition. He applied that the question of costs might be reserved for the consideration of the three election Judges, as to whether the costs should not be divided.

Mr. Edwards was heard briefly to address the Court against the application to divide the costs.

Mr. Justice Blackburn.] There can be no harm at all in reserving the question of costs until I have spoken to the other election Judges upon the subject, and I will so reserve it. In this case there are 6,000 and odd voters on each side, the majority of the Member lowest on the poll being only six over the next candidate. No one can say that the Petition was either frivolous or vexatious; primâ facie, one would have supposed that it was an even chance which side should have turned out to have the most bad votes, and therefore the Petition could not be considered frivolous or vexatious; but in the event, as it turned out, the Respondents, the sitting Members, were in the right, and the other parties, the Petitioners, were mistaken. In ordinary litigation, the costs following the event, the Respondents are entitled to costs; but if the principle by which we are to be guided is that each party is to bear his own costs, unless the other party has been to blame, the Respondents are not entitled to costs. In this case I do not see that the Petitioners have been to blame, and I shall therefore reserve the question of costs for the decision of my learned brethren and myself.

Mr. Herschell, appearing for Mr. Hibbert, applied that in the matter of the division of costs the case of Mr. Hibbert might be severed from that of Mr. Platt.

Mr. Justice Blackburn again stated that he would reserve the question of costs until he had consulted with the other election judges.

It was admitted by the Petitioners, as proved, that the Respondents had established the number of votes requisite again to place the sitting Members in a majority.

Mr. Justice Blackburn then stated that, this being the case, there was no necessity to reserve, for the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, any of the legal points which had arisen in the course of the case; and that he had only, therefore, to announce that he should certify to the Speaker of the House of Commons that the sitting Members were duly elected.

PENRYN ELECTION.

Penryn.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Willes, 26 February 1869.

Mr. Justice Willes.] THIS is a Petition presented by certain voters at the last election for the borough of Penryn, praying that the election of Robert Nicholas Fowler and Edward Backhouse Eastwick to serve as Members for the borough, should be determined to be null and void upon several grounds alleged in the Petition.

The only ground insisted upon, on the trial, was bribery. There is no suggestion of undue influence. There is no suggestion of corrupt treating, and it is very much to the credit of all persons concerned that there should not be any such suggestion. There is no suggestion of any actual money-payment in the way of bribery. There is no suggestion, except in cases which, looking to the general conduct of the election, are exceptional, of any offer of money in the way of bribery; but it has been sought to establish bribery chiefly in the form of a promise or promises to a voter or voters of employment, in the event of such voter or voters giving their vote for the present sitting Members; and in the next place, and as standing by itself, and forming a case of its own class in respect of bribery, by the promise to a deaf-and-dumb voter that if he voted for the present sitting Members, he should be sent to an asylum in London where he might recover his hearing and speech to some extent, and that his wife and children should be looked after in the meantime.

It will be necessary in disposing of this case to make some general remarks upon the character of the election and the proceedings connected with it. In so far as the character of the election is concerned, probably all that it becomes me to say has been said already, or is involved in what has been said. In respect of those general remarks which should be made upon what is connected with, or immediately consequent upon, the election, I think that they may be summed up by stating that in my mind the accounts which have been rendered as required under one of the Corrupt Practices Acts, within two months after the election, for the purpose of checking the expenditure of the candidates at the election, have not been rendered in a satisfactory form, and that is a remark which I have found applicable to many of such accounts which have been brought before me in the course of this election circuit. In one place, for some reasons not at all satisfactory to my mind, the accounts had not been rendered within the two months. In other places the accounts had been rendered, but large items were not properly vouched; and in this place accounts have been rendered in which a large, and, with reference to some of the complaints that have been brought under the notice of the court by the Petitioners, a material part of the expenditure was not mentioned at all, and that a part of the expenditure which ought to have been certified under the hand, as I read the Act, of the sitting Members themselves, because it was in respect of money paid by them.

An account, more or less satisfactory, has been given of the reasons why the statute was not more accurately complied with. The result may be stated thus: that it required an inquiry, and it required an explanation to satisfy one's mind that the expenditure which was not included in the accounts was expenditure of a character which was not suspicious; and I think that the practical conclusion is, that the insufficiency of these accounts, in so far as all these accounts are loose, is a matter which probably will be inquired into by a Committee of the House, or by proper authorities appointed for the purpose, if one can at all judge from the course of events. But the practical result, so far as this cause is concerned is, that the omission which was peculiar to the present case, is explained by showing that a Mr. Freston was sent down, at considerable expense, to make inquiries prior to the registration, that he was employed at the registration; these being expenses which would not, as I read the Act, probably come into a properly framed account, though I should not like to advise anyone to leave them out who was anxious to avoid the penalties of not accounting, and also that that gentleman was paid a further sum for his expenses in the election, calculated upon a scale which does not appear to be extravagant, considering that he was a person in the legal profession, and considering that he had to come a long way, and to make considerable exertions in the cause of those persons who engaged his services. I think that that part of the case consisting of suspicion arising out of what I think (indeed it is unnecessary to repeat, for I think it was eventually admitted by the learned Counsel for the Respondents) was the irregularity of the accounts, has been removed, as unquestionably in my mind it was incumbent upon the Respondents to remove it.

Therefore without further remark upon a matter which is now out of the case, and ought not to be allowed at all to influence my judgment upon the specific questions which remain to be decided, I must now turn to the various cases which have been brought before the court, and ascertain whether in either of them it is established that bribery was committed. As to some, they may be easily disposed of. I will take first the case of Coombes, which I must class with the case of Webber. It was alleged that a person of the name of Coombes was paid 5*l.*, and that a person of the name of Webber was paid 4*l.* 10*s.* for his vote, through a person named Martin; and although the case was not opened with much confidence, the men were called upon a suggestion that they had received the money. Webber denied that he had received any money from Martin approaching the sum which was stated to have been paid him. Coombes said that he had at times received money from Martin by way of loan, but that he had received no money by way of bribe. And Martin, having been called, confirmed the evidence of those witnesses. It was, however, sought to be shown, by calling a young woman who was in Martin's employ, that, shortly after the election, Coombes, who was waiting at Martin's place, was called by Martin into a room, which she described, and which opened into a passage where she was, and where, without any further concealment than being in a room where the door was open and where any person in the passage might hear Martin inform Coombes that he had 5*l.* for him, he handed him four sovereigns and 1*l.* in silver. She stated that the same had been done with 4*l.* 10*s.* by Martin to Webber. Then to complete that case, there was a scene spoken to by Martin in contradiction of her, at which he alleged that another person, not a relation of his but of the same name, a person called James Martin, was present, and at which it was said that she had come to him to express her regret for the statements that she had made to the Petitioners. She denied that that was so, and said that what passed had some relation to another money transaction in which some charge had been brought against her. But this morning, James Martin being called, confirmed the account that William Martin (whose name I first mentioned, and who is said to have paid Webber and Coombes the 5*l.* and 4*l.* 10*s.*) had given of it. This was a Martin of a different name, and no relation of William Martin, who said that the account given by William Martin was right, and that this young woman had called lately, to withdraw the statement she had made.

I can only say, as I am called upon to say whether I believe that Martin made that payment, that if there had been a suggestion of a great number of such payments spoken to by a great number of young women like the witness, under similar circumstances, I need not say what judgment I should have passed upon that. I think that when the young women who were so contradicted had amounted to a certain number, watching their demeanour, and forming my best judgment as to whether it could all have been a lie, I might have come to the conclusion that they were speaking the substantial truth, and that all the people who were opposing them were a multitude who had determined to do evil.

But I find it quite impossible to come to such a conclusion in a case presenting the outline which, as I have shortly stated, is presented by the evidence. I think that in this case it is not made out that the money was paid, and if it was, I think that it is not made out that Martin was any agent of the sitting Members; and in either point of view, I must treat this, as indeed I think it was treated by the learned Counsel for the petitioners in reply, as being a case not calling for any further notice than I have given to it. It is lamentable, no doubt, to consider the wickedness of the person or persons who may be speaking falsehood in that case, and either one person was speaking falsehood or many persons were speaking falsehood in the case. But it would be still more lamentable that anybody who was intrusted by the law to form a just (and there can be no just, unless it be a safe) judgment upon the facts, should come to the conclusion that there was bribery upon such evidence as that.
120. R outline

The next case with which I have to deal, is that of a person named Nelson; and here again is a case in which there is a conflict of testimony, such that it is impossible to say that I think one may have been mistaken or the other may have been mistaken; that they may each be speaking to the same transaction, and they may be regarding it from different points of view; and I have to pick my steps through the conflict of their evidence and endeavour to follow the line of truth. Mistake is impossible with respect to their evidence, because this person Nelson stated positively, that he was offered half-a-sovereign by Charles Moon to vote for the successful candidates. He said, circumstantially, that he answered that half-a-sovereign would do him no good, and that he must have 3*l.* or 4*l.* (he did not know exactly which); that he was thereupon, not upon that occasion (as at first he seemed to represent) but upon another, taken to a place where the gentleman who was returned at the head of the poll, Mr. Fowler, was at the back of the assembly rooms, that Moon introduced him as a man who would vote for Messrs. Fowler and Eastwick, but required money to do so, required to be paid for it; upon which he states that Fowler asked Moon "How much will satisfy him;" and that Moon answered "3*l.* or 4*l.* will satisfy him," and that Mr. Fowler instead of expressing his disgust at such a person as Nelson, if he did that, must have appeared to any honest man to be, shook hands with him and (a party of Liberals coming up) said, "We must consider this another time."

Therefore Nelson's evidence is point blank that he was offered half-a-sovereign by Moon, that he made terms with Moon, that he was introduced to the candidate, Mr. Fowler, and that Mr. Fowler though he did not actually give the money, so far paltered with crime as to express by his acts his approbation of the conduct of the man who proposed it, and to postpone the discussion of it to another opportunity. That man Nelson, who seemed at first to glory in the notion of having a vote to sell, as I thought, upon being examined afterwards, seems to have thought better of the effect which such a statement might produce, and seems to have, I think, at the last, rather modified his representation of his own character, and seemed rather desirous to represent that he was a man who would not sell himself, but who would pursue a person who desired to buy him with ingenuity, to discover his offence, so as to be able to repeat afterwards that the offence had been committed, and to convict the offender, even though the offender should be that person who ought to answer in such cases, if anybody is to answer, namely, the principal, Mr. Fowler.

This evidence was sought to be confirmed by a person named Robert White, who stated that he was in the street about 10 or 15 yards off Moon and Nelson; that he heard Moon say to Nelson while he was at that distance off, "Do not you tell the men at the Bone Mill," that being the mill I presume where Nelson was employed, and in respect of which, he being a man at work there, had at first described himself as a miller, and required some little pressing, upon cross-examination, before he said that he was not the miller, but the miller's man. This White says that he heard that at some 10 or 15 yards off, and then, passing by in the open street, Moon the carpenter, said to Nelson in his hearing as he was going by, "If you will vote for Mr. Fowler I will give you half a sovereign." That is the account that White gives. Of course it is improbable that persons should commit offences known to be offences in the open streets and in the hearing of people going by, who may be honest enough to inform those who are interested in the matter of the fraud that is being practised upon them; but it is not impossible that Moon may have been (as many criminals are) infatuated and hardened enough to proclaim the guilt that was in his mind; however, if it went to an inquiry, by what sort of characters the latter more improbable state of things is spoken to, upon White being cross-examined, he turns out to be a sort of person who, though in his own opinion quite innocent, was very ill thought of by others, not only in respect of his having to leave the Wesleyan connection, which might be on account of his peculiar doctrines, and to which therefore, with the greatest respect for that connection, I do not attach so much importance, but also in respect of his honesty as between man and man, a person of bad character. On the other side was called, first of all, a person of the name of Stephens, whom Nelson had introduced into his story, and whom I did not mention at the time of reciting Nelson's evidence, because the principal characters were Moon and Mr. Fowler; but Stephens he referred to as one of the persons who were concerned in offering the half-sovereign. Stephens is called, and denies it; Moon is called, and denies it; Mr. Fowler is called, and denies that the conversation took place in which he is supposed to have confirmed and approved of the purchase of the vote, and actually shaken hands with a man who was mean and base enough to propose to sell himself for 3*l.* or 4*l.*

What is the proper result with respect to Nelson and with respect to White? The result in my mind with respect to Nelson and with respect to White, I own, is that they are about about the only witnesses of those who have been called in this case as to whom in other transactions, I should, if I were to happen to meet them and remember them, take very good care to keep as far away from them as I could. I thoroughly and heartily, though with pain, arrive at the conclusion (I am bound to do so, and I do so) that Nelson and White are people who are not to be trusted, and I do not, and cannot rely upon their evidence.

Now, going through them, in the order of the opening, I think that the next class of cases with which I have to deal includes those of Williams and of Thomas. I must dispose of the cases of Williams and of Thomas shortly; these appear to me, especially Thomas, as far as I could at all judge, to belong to a very different class of people from what Nelson and White did, because I do not at all pretend to say that I disbelieve the substance of what either of these witnesses said, and especially Thomas. Williams and his wife spoke of a person of the name of Blee having come to them and having spoken of Williams being rewarded if he voted for Messrs. Fowler and Eastwick. I think Mrs. Williams was the first who was called, and stated that, and then Williams was afterwards called, and he said that Blee told him that if he voted for Messrs. Fowler and Eastwick he would be on the safe side, and that 5*l.* would be a good thing for a poor man, and so forth. That is the substance of what was stated to have been said by Blee to Williams and his wife. With respect to Thomas, I think the person who spoke to him was a person of the name of Datson, according to Thomas (and I have no reason to speak of Thomas except respectfully). Datson had two conversations with him, one before Messrs. Fowler and Eastwick came to canvass him, and one after, in which Datson spoke in a like way to Thomas as Blee is stated to have spoken to Williams and his wife. I think it will be found that each of those persons, both Williams and Thomas, if I am not mistaken, voted for Messrs. Smith and Hodgson; whatever inducement was held out to them, if any inducement was held out to them, respectively, by Blee and Datson, appears to have had no effect whatsoever upon either of their minds; they voted as they intended, for Messrs. Smith and Hodgson, and were not at all influenced by the alleged offers.

Now, it appears to me, that those cases stand upon the same footing, and certainly if it had been proved that either Blee or Datson was an agent for the sitting Members, I should have expected, as was properly suggested in the reply, that those persons, or the one of them who was proved to be an agent, should be called forward to account for his conduct, because if in the course of an election an agent or a person employed on behalf of a candidate makes use even in the course of conversation, or, so to speak, without deliberately intending it, of language the natural effect of which is to impress upon a voter's mind that he will be rewarded if he votes in a particular way, or abstains from voting against a particular candidate, that ought to be construed to be bribery, and ought to avoid the election.

But I am afraid that there are (indeed every day's experience shows that there are) talkative people who will discuss questions in what I may call an abstract way, and who will upon the occasion of an election, or any time of public excitement, discuss, and especially would be likely to discuss with an intelligent man like Thomas, the question of whether or not, for instance, bribery was the serious offence which it really is, and who might be inclined to make suggestions as to whether there was or was not money going; and as to the prospect of voters on a particular side getting a sort of reward, which formerly it was not uncommon for voters to get in a corrupt way; but rewards which, although they must be called so in one sense, generally prove to be curses, because they only led to scenes of drunkenness and violence which did no good to the electors, and made some elections a sort of hell upon earth, practices, which I am happy to say, from what little I have observed upon this circuit, are passing away into things to be forgotten, and I hope never to be renewed.

But whilst candidates may very justly be bound, and in point of law are bound, to keep their agents from engaging even in general conversation of that kind which might be mistaken, in the course of an election, it is impossible that each candidate can warrant that every chatterbox on his side shall abstain from talking and giving opinions which may be afterwards represented as offers and enticements to the persons to whom they are addressed. In this case it is material to observe that there is really no proof, that I remember, with respect to Blee's being an agent. I recollect no proof, Mr. Macnamara, of Blee's being an agent.

Mr. Macnamara.] No, my Lord, he was not an agent.

Mr. Justice Willes.] And with respect to Datson I can discover none, except the single fact of his having come in the first instance to ask Thomas how he was going to vote, and telling him, in language which I must refer to in a moment, because it is somewhat remarkable, that he was on the wrong side, and then suggesting about the 5*l.*; whereupon Thomas, who appears to be a strong Whig (I observe that in this borough the one side are called Tories, and the other, I suppose, Whigs), announced his intention of voting upon that side, as he ultimately did. Nevertheless, Datson appears to have induced Messrs. Fowler and Eastwick to go to Thomas's house, and that is the only occasion upon which I can recollect that Datson was at all shown to have come into communication with Messrs. Fowler and Eastwick; and he brought them there upon the fool's errand of getting Thomas to vote for Mr. Eastwick, under the notion that he was favourable to Mr. Eastwick; and that was the subject of a conversation between Messrs. Fowler and Eastwick. Something was said by Datson to Thomas in a low tone, as Thomas described it, during the period that they were there; not amounting, however, to anything which would at all fix upon Messrs. Fowler and Eastwick the knowledge that Datson had ever even talked to Thomas upon the subject of whether it was a good thing to bribe or not; or whether there was any money going, and so forth. Messrs. Fowler and Eastwick having gone away, Datson then renewed the conversation which he had originally had with Thomas upon the subject of a bribe.

Now as an instance of how exceedingly unsafe it would be to fix Members (I will not use a new word instead of that which I have already used, because that expresses it well) with the chatter of persons in the position of Datson, I will just turn to what Thomas said: I will turn to his account of the first transaction, and test it. Whatever may be the uses of satire, there is one instance in which I am afraid that satire may have done some harm. Everybody is probably acquainted with the ironical suggestion attributed to, I think, Sydney Smith upon the subject of bribery; "If you cannot put down this offence, why not let everybody bribe, and then in the end everyone will be on equal terms, and you may have the free choice of the community after all." Some people may have been silly enough to interpret that as if that wise and witty man was speaking his real mind in the sentence in which, taken apart from the context of his thoughts, he may be supposed to have suggested such an idea. But the notion at once will present itself to every reflecting mind; first, this is all very well for the rich man; secondly, this is all very well for the crafty and unscrupulous man; but with respect to the constituency, what a state of degradation will not they be reduced to if it finds acceptance with them, that they are to sell themselves to the highest bidder. That which was intended to be satire, and was meant to call attention in the most striking way to the necessity for putting down the odious corruption which in some boroughs did prevail, has, I am afraid, been misunderstood and misconstrued by some silly people into a sort of excuse for saying, "Well, what harm for a poor man to take money." I can conceive that a person, I was going to say half-witted, but I will say a person half-instructed, might take such a notion as that into his head, and, like people who have misrepresented Holy Writ by taking detached passages and suggesting that they give the sense of the entire, might have conveyed a spurious impression of the opinion of a great man to one with whom he was engaged in ordinary conversation.

What does Thomas say as to what first passed? I will take that as an instance and pass on. "We had many conversations about the election." Q. "What did he say to you?"—A. "He asked me who I was going to vote for; I told him I was Liberal." Q. "Go on."—A. "He told me I was a silly man." Mr. Justice Willes. "Repeat that." A. "He told me I was a silly fellow, for the Tory party would have the laughing side of me." It is not necessary to say that that is not like the address of a canvasser; it is like conversation between the two men which he said had taken place many times about the principles of the one and the other. "Mr. Macnamara. Did he say why?"—A. "No, he did not say why." Q. "What else did he say to you about the election?"—A. "He said to a man in my circumstances 5 l. would be to my good?" Q. "What did you say to that?"—A. "I told him if I took any money I should consider it bribery." Q. "What did he say to that?"—A. "He said he should not consider it bribery; not exactly bribery." Q. "Did he say why he should not consider it bribery?"—A. "No, I told him I did not think, if I were taking money, I should be doing right in the sight of God." Q. "What did he say then?"—A. "He did not see any harm in it." Q. "Did he say that?"—A. "Some words like that;" and so on. Datson, if he said that seriously to Thomas, or to any person who he thought would believe it and be overcome by it, ought to be ashamed of himself. That is the only judgment I can pass upon the matter. But to go further, and to say that Messrs. Fowler and Eastwick should lose their election because a person has been frivolous enough, if he did not mean it, or wicked enough, if he did mean it to say that, would be contrary to the law, because it is only when a person who is in the position of an agent does wrong that the election is forfeited.

Now, it will be found that the question whether the effect of that, as being a general statement by Datson of his opinion whether it was right or wrong to take money, was intended as being an offer on the part of Messrs. Fowler and Eastwick will be further elucidated if the subsequent part of the evidence is turned to, of which I content myself with saying in general terms, without reading it over, that it was in words or to the effect as follows: not Fowler and Eastwick are giving money, and I have authority to offer you money, or anybody else, for Fowler and Eastwick, or for any club by which they are backed, but it is, "If any money is going you shall have some, and if none is going then I (Datson) will give you some out of my own pocket." If that was an attempt on the part of Datson to corrupt the mind of Thomas it wholly failed. It did not profess to be on the part of the sitting Members; and if it did, the person who used the words was not an agent of theirs, and they should no more be bound by what he did than I ought to be bound by the opinion which anybody outside in the place may now be expressing as to my conduct in anything that I may have done in the course of this inquiry.

Now, treating Williams and Thomas as standing together (and I would observe that they are the only cases of that class), I pass them over. There was, I believe, exceedingly reprehensible talk by Blee and Datson. The precise extent of the blame to be attached to them I should not like to apportion without hearing what they may have to say. Of one thing I am certain, that whatever it may have been it is not shared in by the sitting Members.

The next case with which it is necessary to deal is that of a person named James Thomas Rule. Now, I think that Rule's case stands upon a footing of its own. Rule was a sailmaker, and I need not recite his evidence, because I read it over in the course of either Mr. Giffard's summing up or my brother Ballantine's reply. It was expressed in language curiously reflecting the art in which Rule is usually engaged. It was very involved, I thought. I will not use an expression which occurred to me, because it might be thought that I meant to say something of Rule more than I really do. I do not want at all to say anything of Rule in any disrespectful way; but I will say that it is necessary to pick out of his language exactly what the result is. The language expresses the result, and a great deal more than the result. It winds about, and it is not very easy to find out exactly what the statement amounts to in the end. But I will pass it by with saying, that what he stated was said to him by Freston, in my judgment, does not amount to a promise by Freston, that if he (Rule) voted for Messrs. Fowler and Eastwick, Mr. Fowler would get him employment in that Brazilian service which Rule spoke of, by saying that it was a service in which either a cousin of Mr. Fowler's, or a cousin of Mr. Freston's (he could not exactly say which), had some interest to obtain employment.

I am quite satisfied that Rule was a person who wanted employment, and who did apply for employment; and I am quite sure also that if employment was to be had for Rule, Messrs. Fowler and Eastwick would not have objected, without compromising themselves, to give him employment; and I am not at all aware that if they did so bond fide, without at all intending to corrupt the man's mind, they might not have done so. I am not at all aware that a man is bound to give notice to quit to all his tenants who are of his way of thinking if he is going to stand for the county, or to refuse to let a farm to a tenant who is of his way of thinking, if he is going to stand for the county; or to refuse to take a person into his service who is of his way of thinking, simply because he is going to set up for the borough. He must not do that as a reward for the vote which he hopes to obtain, and he must not make the vote a condition of giving employment. But, as was well observed by Mr. Giffard, the employment of people to do work must go on in election times as well as in others; the affairs of life cannot be brought to a standstill. If you have a sum of money or a benefit, for which nothing is returned, conferred upon a voter, you have a tangible case which cannot be explained away by merely saying, "I did it, and I had no particular reason for it." You have then a case in which a Member or his agent must be called upon to give an account of what they meant, and to show satisfactorily that that which primâ facie was giving a benefit to the person which would have the effect of inducing him to vote for the Member, was really done with some other and an innocent motive. I am clear that when an unfavourable inference is to be drawn from the fact that some person has been employed, one ought to take care to be quite sure that there is something more than merely getting the man's work for that which is the real equivalent for the man's work. In this case, moreover, I must observe that no work was given to Rule, and that he voted for Messrs. Smith and Hodgson. The conclusion I must draw would be that Freston did praise up either Messrs. Fowler and Eastwick, or rather, I should say in particular, did praise up Mr. Fowler, who, I collected, was from London, and a gentleman of some position in the mercantile world. That he did commend him as a man who would be a good man to stand for Falmouth in some such way as this; "That is the man for Falmouth—that is the man for our borough; he is sure to do you all good, to advance your interest in Parliament; you will all be as happy as the day is long, and if he has any employment to give he will be sure to select people from Falmouth;" and so on. This is all matter of simple commendation, falling far short, I think (I speak without practical experience in these matters), of praises which I have seen conferred upon Members by those who proposed and seconded them at elections, and, to some extent, I think, even of the laudations which Members have been led away, in the excitement of election contests, to bestow upon themselves and their own prospects in the way of commendation. I must say I cannot think that Rule's case could have been seriously thought by the Petitioners to present materials for judgment; but it has been presented, and I have pronounced my judgment as well as I can upon it. There is an old maxim applicable to all transactions for commodities, and I suppose that Members of Parliament are not commodities exempt from it; that simple, general commendation of the article you deal in is not to be considered as fraudulent.

The next class of cases to which a reference has been made is one that includes Behenna and Clarke. Behenna and Clarke were persons who, if I recollect rightly, both voted for Messrs. Fowler and Eastwick. They both obtained employment. Behenna obtained employment from a person, I think, named Truscott. He did so upon an application to Mr. Freston, and he appears to have gone to Mr. Freston, and to have told him that he was in want of employment. Mr. Freston sent him to Mr. Truscott, and I think he got a month's work, about a fortnight before the election and about a fortnight after it. That was, I think, Behenna's case, and he was paid a price which has not been criticised for his work. He did get a month's employment, and he did vote for the Members whom Mr. Freston represented as agent.

This case is a little different from Clarke's in two particulars. One of them was that Behenna applying to Mr. Freston, being, I presume, known to Mr. Freston to be a voter, nothing was said about his vote until after he was told that he might go to Truscott. Then he was asked, "Do you intend voting for the Tories?" "Yes, I intend voting for the Tories." That, I think, was Behenna's case. He did get the work, and he did vote for the Tories.

Both these cases belong to a larger class, which has been very much discussed in election committees. I do not recollect any of those cases having come under the cognizance of the ordinary courts of law, but the election committees had often to discuss (and that before the Act of 1867, which enacts, by the 11th section, that voters employed by the candidates in respect of the election within six months before the election, are to lose their vote, and it is a misdemeanor for such to vote) whether the employment of voters was to be considered as bribery; and there is a series of cases referred to in reports, of some of which I gave a list upon a former occasion, and which, therefore, I need not now repeat, in which scores, and indeed, in some instances, hundreds, of people were employed as messengers and watchers, and for the purpose of bringing people to the poll, and so forth, who, or a great proportion of whom, were voters, and they were paid for what they did.

If the mere employment of a man who was a voter and expected to vote for a Member was bribery of itself within the second section of the Corrupt Practices Act of 1854, it is obvious that the conclusion in each of those cases must have been at once that a man paid by a Member who would not or might not have been employed but for the election is to be considered as accepting the Member's retainer; that therefore you ought to impute the payment to a desire to induce the voter to vote; therefore there was bribery, and therefore the election is void. But that was not the reasoning adopted. The conclusion, shortly stated, adopted in those cases, and which is the conclusion of common sense, is, that unless the employment was colourable; unless, that is to say, it was an employment only in name, and it was shown that the money either was given for doing nothing, or was given in excess for the services fairly rendered by the voter, there was no bribery. That I understand to have been the conclusion in those cases. If a man was taken into an employment in order to influence his vote; if, for instance, Behenna had intended to vote for Smith and Hodgson, or not at all, and then Freston had said, "Oh, come into the employment of Messrs. Fowler and Eastwick, and vote for them," that would have been a bribe, no doubt. If he had said to Behenna, "Come into the employment of Messrs. Fowler and Eastwick," Behenna having engaged himself to the other side, there would have been strong reason for inferring that it was indirectly a bribe, because the inference would be that it was intended to change the man's mind. Where, however, there is the case, as Behenna's was, of a man who intended to vote for Messrs. Fowler and Eastwick, and through the intervention of an agent of theirs got a month's work, there is not necessarily a case, within the terms of the second section of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, where the employment is given to a man in order to induce him to vote for a candidate, there is not the intention to influence a vote which constitutes bribery.

I dispose of Behenna's case in this way; I cannot myself see the distinction between employing a man for the purposes of the election and getting a man employment at his ordinary work and at proper wages in another capacity, except that the former would seem to be rather more objectionable than the latter; and I see very great objections (indeed, no doubt, the Legislature did when they enacted the eleventh section of the Representation of the People Act of 1867 which, however, in terms voids only the vote, and not the election) in the former employment, though none at all in the latter, unless all the ordinary operations of human life are to come to a standstill simply because there happens to be an election coming on.

The case of Clarke stands differently. There does not appear to have been any design at all upon Clarke. The Members appear to have gone to canvass him without any knowledge of his peculiar position. If he has described it truly, they went in. He was asked to vote for them; he said, "By all means." He at once assented to vote for them; and there is no suggestion that he was a person who ever intended to vote for Smith and Hodgson, or otherwise than as he did, for Fowler and Eastwick. Then he produced his discharge, upon which I will not make any further remarks, because I stated yesterday in general terms what the effect of it was, and what the various certificates of officers under whom he had served came to. He produced his discharge, by which it appeared that he had left the last vessel in the navy which he was serving aboard, I think, in September of last year; and he states that if he had gone back within six weeks, and had re-entered, he would have been allowed the pay of the intermediate period, as well as been taken aboard again. He says he stated that at the time.

Now, his evidence has been carefully gone through, and that several times with reference to this question, whether anything passed at the time by which the Members, either expressly or to his thinking, promised that he should have those six weeks' arrears if he stayed and voted for them. That evidence having been gone through so often, I shall not go through it again, but at once express the result at which my mind has arrived; that it is clear, both upon Clarke's own evidence and upon the evidence of the Members and of Freston, that there never was any notion of paying him those six weeks' wages, either in their minds or in his. If they had promised to pay him six weeks' wages for the purpose of keeping him to vote at the election, that would have been such an inducement in fact, whether actively intended or not, as that it would have been impossible not to arrive at the conclusion that it was a bribe. I think it would have amounted to 6*l.*, if I collect rightly. If they had promised, it would have been as much as if they had paid; and therefore it was necessary to scrutinise the evidence, for the purpose of ascertaining whether my brother Ballantine was rightly instructed when he stated in the opening that the reason for Clarke coming forward to give information was, because he had not been recouped those six weeks' wages of which he spoke. It is quite clear now that he was misinformed, and I have no doubt his clients were misinformed; and very likely that is the reason why Clarke's case was pronounced of so much importance, and put forward in the the second place in the opening. There was no promise at all; it is negatived by Clarke's own evidence; it is negatived by the respondent's evidence; and it is also negatived by Clarke's own letter, which was written after the election, and which shows what complaint he really did make.

I must say here, that I am not quite sure whether Clarke really did mean to go back for those six weeks at all; I am by no means sure that he did. Upon reading that discharge, I find it not to be what it was described, not I think by him (it must have been in the opening), as a "leave" from his vessel. It was no leave from his vessel at all. It was a clean discharge showing that he had given up his vessel. He was not bound to return, and no vessel was bound to take him back. I do not say that there was any conclusive reason against taking him back, but there was a reason, which any one looking at the discharge might see, why another man might have been preferred. I do not speak of any reason connected with his moral character, but of a reason connected with his physical defect; I am not at all sure that he really did mean to go back. I can very well understand his suggesting, with a desire to be considered, and to get something, that he was going to lose a great deal in the service of those who desired to have his vote. But that he really did lose it, or really did mean to go back at the time, I am by no means satisfied. But, as I have not to decide upon that, I pass by.

Now, he was employed after the canvass. The election came, the election went by, he made a complaint; he states himself what that complaint was, in his evidence. I think he stated it over and over again, and he said that it was, that he was not paid the wages for the electioneering week in which he had done nothing. His letter is, "Mr. Preston—I wish you, sir, to pay me my time last week, as I could not go to seek employment on account of the election. My week's wages is all I wish. If you do not comply with my request, I shall see further into it. Treat me as a man, I will act such; I have a family dependent on me. Sir, I will wait on you to-morrow morning." This is not a very comfortable letter, I should think, for anybody who had been concerned in an election to receive, because it is clearly the letter of a man who was angry with the Member, or with his agent, and who thought that he was wronged, and who therefore was very unlikely to keep back the greater wrong, and to put forward the less one. His wrong is that he had not been paid for the week of the election, during which he did nothing. I draw two conclusions from that, first of all confirming the fact, that he was not, as supposed, promised the six weeks' arrears in case he stayed, and I draw, secondly, the conclusion that the persons who employed him, employed him not colourably to pay him for work which he did not do, because the work which he did not do, even a week's work, 1*l.* worth of work, they declined to pay him for, at the expense of making him a hostile witness, and sending him into the enemy's camp to found this petition. And therefore I must look with considerable scruple at that which is suggested as having been colourable, as done in the interim, and is described as having amounted to a bribe of this man. What does it come to? Mr. Eastwick appears to have had a steamer. That steamer may be taken to have been, as was opened, either Mr. Eastwick's own steamer, or one hired by him for his own purposes. That steamer, I collect from the statements admitted, and from the evidence, was employed in taking him and his family backwards and forwards from this place to a place where he had a residence; and on board of that steamer he employed men who were commanded by a master named Hosking; and this witness Clarke, who of course would be an appropriate man to have on board a vessel, appears to have got employment there. He was a person who had pledged himself, as I think I have said already, if not, I must say it at the risk of repetition, to Messrs. Fowler and Eastwick. He is a person who is not shown to have given any promise, or to have had any intention of voting on the other side. Therefore he stands in respect of that intermediate employment, in the condition of a voter who had pledged himself to a side, and to whom employment was given on that side.

This seems clearly in reasoning to reduce the case of Clarke, although it is somewhat more complicated in the facts, to the same dimensions as the case of Behenna. It was said by my brother Ballantine that it ought to be concluded that there was a promise to induce him to remain. I have already said that I think there would have been more than that if the six weeks' wages had been paid. I think in that case there would have been a promise to induce him to vote point-blank. I feel rather unable to adopt the reasoning that he was paid to enable him to remain, and therefore that he must necessarily be taken, in point of law, to have been paid to induce him to vote, without applying a very much wider reach of argument to the case, and saying that every payment which enables a man to live (and to enable him to remain he must live, and therefore in a sense if he is paid to live he is paid to remain,) is a payment to induce him to vote. I cannot logically distinguish the one line of argument from the other. That only shows the necessity of not being over-subtle in distinguishing these cases of employment, the one from the other, and of determining a case where it is proved only that a man is paid fair wages for work, which was a manifest compensation for those wages, according to whether he was employed upon the condition of his voting for a particular candidate, in which case it would be bribery unquestionably, and within the second section, if such a stipulation and condition were made; and that, whether he was employed really or colourably, or whether the employment is of that simple and innocent character which I put in the course of the case, of a man having a large ship-building yard, setting up as a candidate for the place, and taking into his employment men whose services he really wanted, without rejecting those whom he knew to be favourable to him, and who, he knew, intended to vote for him, which in my humble judgment it would be an abuse of language to call bribery. I have endeavoured to dispose of that. To put even a strong case; suppose that a man said, "Well, I really cannot vote for you; I wish I could, but I have to leave for the Continent this evening; I cannot stay and vote for you to-morrow, it will be so inconvenient to me;" and then the candidate were to say, "Well, the canvass-book shows so small a majority that every vote is of importance; your vote is of importance; do, pray, stay, and you shall have a bed at my house." Supposing that a candidate were to address that to some person in his own condition of life, and that he were to have a bed at the candidate's house, and to go up and vote for him next day, that would be putting a case upon which construction certainly might, with a perverse ingenuity, come to the conclusion that both he and the candidate were corrupt people; but I hardly think that that could have been said, supposing the candidate was a Tory, and that the person whom he pressed was Sir Robert Harry Inglis; or supposing that he was a Whig, and that the person whom he pressed was Mr. Byng. You must, in each case, look not so much to the literal terms which are used as to the substance and reason of the thing. I think that it would not be right or reasonable to hold that there was bribery in these cases, unless there was colourable employment, or a condition made.

Now, I come to the last case, and this certainly is one of a very peculiar character. Probably no judge sitting in this place will ever have to pronounce upon such a question again, because this is a case in which it is alleged that the experience of one of the most noble of professions was perverted and prostituted to the purposes of corruption: a case in which a medical man is alleged to have made use of his science to endeavour to cajole the wife of a poor person, afflicted with deafness and dumbness, into supposing that if she could influence her husband to vote in a particular way, he had the power and the will to say that the mouth and ears of her husband should be opened; but that if she did not get him to vote in that way, she might continue in her sorrow, and he in his affliction. Of course, if anybody did that, he did that to which I cannot imagine any judgment in this world adequate in proportion to its villainy.

The question is whether he did so? the question is whether Dr. Noye is proved to have endeavoured to induce that poor woman, Mrs. Truran, to procure the vote of her husband, and her husband to vote for Fowler and Eastwick, on the promise that if he did so the doctor would introduce him to an institution in which his deafness and dumbness might be cured or modified, and that she and her children should be looked after in the meantime. Now, I can hardly speak of this case with patience, because in proportion to the seriousness of a charge of that character ought to be the adequateness of the conviction which one must entertain to pronounce a verdict of guilt. What is the sort of person who is said to have done this? he is not said to be a quack; he is a man who understands his business, I presume; he is a person who has been in the medical profession for a series of years; and although his acquaintance with the London hospitals is (I hope he will forgive me if I use an expression offensive to him) somewhat musty, he was dealing with a subject which he understood; and notwithstanding the cross-examination which was properly administered to him, he adhered to his statement, and he explained intelligibly enough to those who have ever heard anything from scientific men upon the subject of deafness and dumbness, in what manner he examined the man, how he applied the test to know whether the deafness was desperate, and how he took an interest, as he said he did, in the man to ascertain whether his organs of voice—though from long disuse, as consequent upon their deafness, they were not as active as those of ordinary people—were capable of an improvement which might reasonably be expected or not. He found that upon introducing his watch into the man's mouth, the tick, though it could not be heard by the external orifice of the ear, was heard by the internal orifice, through which vibrations may reach the tympanum in another way. He found that the man could speak some few words, which showed that he had the power of producing articulate sounds; and upon that he proceeded, with that interest in a poor and suffering person which is not so uncommon in persons of his profession that it cannot be believed to be genuine, to suggest the means by which, in his judgment, the man's affliction might be modified, and he might be able to do better for himself and his family.

I have no doubt that Mrs. Truran intended to give a true representation of what took place. If she, with her husband, had taken so strong a side for Smith and Hodgson, that upon the bare appearance of the opposing candidates she at once announced that her husband was pledged to the other side, I can quite understand that Mrs. Truran, speaking with perfect honesty, but speaking with that extreme sensitiveness which I have observed in poor people at any approach to dictation or unfair dealing with them on the part of the rich, may have understood what the doctor meant in pure kindness and sympathy, and with a desire to exercise his profession, and his wish to speak kind words to either poor or rich who might come before him in the way of it, as being a trap for the loyalty of her husband as a voter. And I can understand that, without pronouncing any judgment against her veracity, or desire to say what she believes to have been the real character of the transaction, she mistook, for deep art and guile on the part of Dr. Noye, what he really meant in simple sincerity as being a kind speech to her.

I am not at all sure, I have no sufficient means of judging, but I rather think that since the time when the doctor practised, the means of dealing with patients of this description have been very greatly improved, and that they are applied now with a more special art, and in institutions other than that in which he practised; but if I am dealing with the sincerity of his motives, and if I am deciding a question of intention (upon which after all this must turn), am I, because I may have thought that he spoke not so wisely as regarded the election, or not so much to the precise point of the disease as a person fresh from the hospitals in London might do, therefore to suppose that he was guilty of the dishonest act of fraudulently trying to persuade a poor woman, by the prestige of his professional skill, that she would get a benefit which he knew that she could not get, or that he meant to hold that out as an inducement to her for her husband to vote.
the

Was what Dr. Noye did done in the course of the canvass at all, or was it merely said and done in the course of sympathetic talk by a medical man in discussing a case within the fair scope of his profession, and which attracted his kindly notice? It was with a view to determine that, that it became necessary to inquire for what purpose he went there. At one time, indeed, a suspicion crossed my mind that the doctor might have been taken there for the express purpose, and I was rather surprised that it had not occurred to somebody to ask that; but when the inquiry came to be made it turned out that there was nothing of the kind. He was not taken as the doctor of the expedition to practise upon the credulity of this poor deaf and dumb man's wife, he went there in the ordinary course of the canvass without expecting to meet such a case; but meeting it, and finding it within his experience as he thought, he proceeded to say and do what is imputed to him as bribery.

I have come to the conclusion that what he did was not done in the course of the canvass, but that it was done through his medical zeal and the sympathy which he really felt. Was there a promise conditional upon voting; that is negatived by the fact of her having at once stated that her husband was going to vote on the other side, and her husband did vote on the other side. Such an inducement, if really and seriously held out, would have been almost too much to resist, one would think, or at least would have had the effect, if it made the impression on her mind of being formal, of leading her to inquire further of the doctor. She never inquired further of the doctor. Did the doctor expect the vote for Messrs. Fowler & Eastwick? I believe he did not, and unless he expected it, or thought it likely that he could get it, I find it impossible to come to the conclusion that he did what he is alleged to have done in order to induce the deaf and dumb man to vote for Messrs. Fowler & Eastwick. I agree with what was stated by Mr. Giffard in the course of his summing up, that what was done had no relevance whatsoever to the canvass in which the Member was engaged; indeed, Mrs. Truran said that the Member had left, though the doctor thought not. I shall conclude this branch of the case by saying that this is only one of very many cases with which I have had to deal, in which persons have been brought forward as witnesses under circumstances in which I am perfectly satisfied that they had an honest belief upon their own mind, but in which I am equally satisfied that they were entirely mistaken, to prove that conditional promises of benefit were made to them in the event of their voting in a particular way. This case is within that class in which the persons brought forward as witnesses had always intended to vote, and did, in fact, vote the other way, and in which the misplacing of a word or the introduction of an "if" would make a matter a bribe, which, at the time, might fairly have been regarded as without any corrupt meaning on the one side or the other. It is one of the perils of canvassing as it appears to me (and the perils are numerous), that persons are apt to suspect that more is really meant than either the candidate or his agent said at the time. The natural prejudice of taking a side, and especially the losing side, makes people misrepresent to themselves afterwards the effect of what at the time really had no criminal purpose or object whatsoever.

I am thoroughly satisfied that this case of the doctor, which I fear I have not been able to speak of without emotion, considering the gravity of the offence which he would have committed, had he really been guilty, belongs to the class of such mistakes.

I am not aware that there is any other case which requires a remark. I think I must end as I began by saying that there has been a remarkable absence here of anything like the vulgar corruption suggested at some elections. There has been no undue influence suggested; there has been no treating suggested; and I am satisfied that there has been no substantial case of bribery proved.

The result is that I must determine, with respect to each of the Members returned at the late election, that he was duly elected and returned. I must further determine that no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any candidate at such election. And I must thirdly determine that upon the evidence before me, it does not appear that corrupt practices have, nor is there reason to believe that corrupt practices have, extensively prevailed at the election.

Mr. Giffard.] I presume that the costs should follow the event.

Mr. Justice Willes.] I do not think that there is anything to take this out of the general rule.

SALFORD ELECTION.

Salford.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Baron Martin, 2 March 1869.

Mr. Baron Martin.] THIS is a petition which prays that it may be determined that Mr. Cawley and Mr. Charley were not duly elected, and that their election for this borough was void. The ground alleged is, that they, by themselves and others on their behalf, were guilty of bribery, treating, and undue influence. As I have already stated, it seems to me that that allegation is founded on the Corrupt Practices Act, and on two sections of the Act under which I sit. Although I have formed the opinion with regard to the general violence and rioting, that it does not amount to that which would invalidate the election, I also am of opinion, if it were intended to rely upon that, as affecting the election, there ought to have been an averment in the petition stating it. There is also a fourth head of complaint, that Edward Cawley and William Henry Charley did, by themselves or other persons on their behalf, hire, and engage, and pay money for, and on account of, a number of conveyances for the purpose of conveying voters to the poll, and which were used for such purposes on the day of the election in their interest. Now with regard to that matter, I have already stated that if I considered that allegation proved, I should reserve that point for the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas.*

This is the seventh petition upon which I have adjudicated, and I have acted throughout upon a principle, and until I am satisfied that it is erroneous, I shall continue so to act. I consider that the return made by the returning officer is a matter not to be impeached on light grounds, because that return establishes that a majority of the voters have selected the persons returned as the persons to represent them. But the Legislature has, in the Acts to which I have referred, enacted that if a candidate is guilty of bribery, or if a candidate is guilty of treating, or if a candidate is guilty of undue influence, from the moment that the act is done by him, or done by a person for whom he is responsible, from that moment his candidature ceases; it is at an end, and his status as a candidate is gone; he is incapable of being elected, and if he is elected, his election is void. That being the law, I think it is but right that when there is no general bribery, no general treating, no general undue influence but the bribery, and the treating, and the undue influence which are relied upon are what may be called isolated acts, and the separate acts of persons connected with the election, I think before an election can be set aside these acts or act ought to be proved to the entire satisfaction of the judge who is to decide. There is no doubt that it puts the judge in a position which is unusual. The duty of a judge in an English court of law is to decide upon the law, and upon a given state of facts; but here the judge is put in the position of a jury, and I think with regard to matters of fact he ought to act in the way that he believes an honest and upright jury would act. In my judgment he ought not to act upon surmise or suspicion, or because he may possibly have in his mind that there had occurred something that was wrong in an election. He ought to require evidence, and the material facts proved to him satisfactorily and beyond reasonable doubt. It is a different case where there has been general bribery, or where there is reason to suppose that general corruption, or corruption to a very considerable extent, prevailed. It is a different case where public-houses are thrown open, into which any person may enter and get drunk at his pleasure. It is a different case where persons possessing power and influence bring their influence to bear upon inferior persons who are subjected to this undue influence, for the purpose of coercing them and obtaining their votes. It is in this spirit that I have hitherto acted in considering these election petitions, and in this spirit I will continue to deal with them until I am satisfied by some higher authority than my own that I am wrong.

In respect to this particular case, no doubt there has been a great deal done of which I disapprove, and there are three circumstances to which I will call attention, which I think were wrong. But it is not because I think there has been wrong done in respect to these matters that I am therefore to require less evidence of the particular facts which by law are essential to upset an election. In many cases there have been Members whose returns have been petitioned against, and who had acted as rightly, so far as they themselves were concerned, as men could have done; they had desired to act rightly, and the acts by which their elections were sought to be avoided were done by persons of whom they had no knowledge, and over whom they had no control. But there have been several things

* N.B.—I omitted to state the reason why I did not state a case for the Common Pleas. I did so the following morning to the counsel for the Petitioners. It was that, after the evidence of Mr. Cawley and others, I could not state as a fact that the conveyances were hired for the purpose of conveying voters to the poll.

things done in this election which I hope will not occur again; for I do not at all know that, if I were to try an election petition in this town upon another occasion, and the same things were proved to have occurred again which I am now going to call attention to, my judgment might not be a different one. In the first place there was the hiring of roughs by Hall, and Kean the keeper of a beerhouse. What is the evidence with regard to that? Without the slightest ground, except upon the mere rumour that some of the Irish were expected to come and interfere with people going to the poll, which is one account; according to another account it was for the purpose of protecting Kean's house, and of taking voters to the poll from there; there were hired, a few days before the election, 12 men by the authority of Hall, who was authorised as is proved, not by his own account, for in his evidence Hall did not mention it, but by the evidence of Mr. Bradshaw, the secretary, who said that he authorised the sum of 18 £. to be paid to these men. The leader of them was a pugilist, a prize-fighter, and, according to his account, they only got 5 s. for one day, and that would of course make 3 £. for the 12. But according to the evidence given yesterday, 18 £. was authorised to be spent for that purpose. Again it appears that Kean's house was hired; and, in a house let at a rental of 19 £. a year, 5 £. was paid to him for a room for one day; it appears on the accounts that 7 s. was the ordinary price paid for rooms in other houses. I need not say that their being employed at all is a thing very much to be reprobated. Then, again, there is the allegation with regard to the hiring of cabs and carriages; it seems to me clear that the object of the Legislature was to prevent the using of hired carriages for going to the poll. Rightly or wrongly, that is considered a thing that ought not to be done, and the Legislature has made the most ample provision for having the polling-places within every man's reach, and I venture to say that, except in few instances, there was not a man in this town who could not have recorded his vote by a walk of 10 minutes from his house to the polling-booth. We have heard from the mayor how many polling-places there were, and the provision was such that any man, at least any man in health, could, without the slightest inconvenience, have gone to the poll without having anything to do with cabs or carriages; but what is the evidence? I am now speaking from the evidence of Mr. Cawley himself; and, according to him, the employment of these cabs was a matter of discussion; it was doubted whether it was legal; but it was done for the purpose of conveying messengers or canvassers communicating the state of the poll at the central committee-room, and thence to the different parts of the town where the numbers were exhibited; and also, that the cabs were to be used by the canvassers, who were to drive to the place where a voter was supposed to be; that then he was, I presume, to get out, and that he and the voter were to walk together to the polling-place, the cab I suppose accompanying them alongside. What was the number of cabs employed for this purpose? 72 was the number, and at an expense of upwards of 160 £. Is it possible that it was necessary in this town (which is large no doubt) to have 72 cabs at an expense of 167 £. for the purpose of messengers carrying the state of the poll from one place to another, or to send for voters who had not come up to vote. But that is not the only thing; we have it from the evidence on behalf of the Respondents, in the evidence given by Dr. Stocks, that on the Saturday before the election, he had hired six beer-shops as committee-rooms; those beer-shops were well known, and would be advertised as committee-rooms, and without speaking of treating, and without saying that beer was furnished in those houses at the expense of the candidates, look at the temptation to people who had votes, to go into these beer-shops where the candidates, for whose return they were anxious, held their meetings, and which were placarded with their bills; these were places which would present a strong temptation to the voters for Messrs. Cawley and Charley to go in and drink, either before or after they had voted. What was the result? There is the evidence of at least a dozen persons of respectability, and one of them produced his book, containing memorandums made at the time, from which it appeared that a number of voters came to the poll in a state of drunkenness that was most disgraceful; and that has not merely been proved by the witnesses for the Petitioners, but it was confirmed by the evidence of Mr. Hewitt, who was called yesterday by the Respondents. He stated that a man came to him to vote, who was so drunk that he was obliged to send him back; I sincerely trust, that before another general election takes place, steps will be taken to prevent a recurrence of these things; I have mentioned these three matters, because they appear to me to be wrong and improper, and to persons who were desirous of conducting the election according to law, and to avoid doing anything whereby persons should be induced to give their votes, otherwise than as their own inclinations dictated, I can well understand how mortifying it must have been to see their opponents carrying on the election in such a manner; it must be a most mortifying thing to any person who is carrying on an election to the best of his ability, honestly, and purely, when he sees his opponents having public-houses used in this fashion, having cabs driving about the town on the day of the election, and having roughs engaged in the manner in which it appeared that James Price and others were engaged; these are matters connected with this election, and I am far from saying that a judge, sitting as I am upon the same state of facts, might not draw, upon another occasion, a conclusion different from that which I am prepared to do on the present. These are matters to be observed upon, and I say that it is the duty of every respectable man in this town to set his face against these things, and endeavour to prevent them occurring again.

With regard to matters more immediately affecting the case, there was the evidence given yesterday, with regard to general rioting in the town, and I do not entertain the slightest doubt that every gentleman on both sides who gave evidence as to the rioting, gave his evidence honestly; I believe what they said they had seen done; they had no doubt seen different parts of the town, and perhaps might see things in different lights. I have already said, before an election can be vitiated by reason of general riot and violence, it must be such as to affect the freedom of election; now freedom of election is two-fold; in the first place it is that every man ought, without influence being brought to bear upon him at all, if it were possible, to exercise his own judgment and discretion in selecting that candidate who he believes is the best; the freedom of election in another sense is, that every person who has the franchise ought to be at liberty to go, and have the means of going to the poll and giving his vote without obstruction, and without fear or intimidation; to set aside an election on that ground there is a fact which must be established, and that is, that persons possessing the ordinary nerve and courage of men, have been prevented from going to the poll to record their votes; that being so, I think that the allegation fails in proof, and I also think it fails on a technical ground, viz., that it is not alleged in this Petition.

With respect to treating; I will take the treating, as both the learned counsel have done, first, and see what the evidence is with regard to it; for the purpose of affecting a seat, I must be satisfied that the candidate by himself, or by an agent for whom he is responsible, has violated the fourth section of this Act of Parliament. With respect to general treating, it is only alleged to have taken place at three public-houses, and I think it has been explained in all. In the first place I am of opinion that Kean was not an agent; the evidence of Hall and the other evidence upon this matter was not such as to satisfy me that Kean was a person for whose acts Messrs. Cawley and Charley were responsible; my view of the law would go quite as far as that of Mr. Justice Blackburn, but the only evidence I have is, that his house was hired for what I consider was an exorbitant sum (5*l.*), and after that by an arrangement between him and Hall the roughs were hired, but I am not of opinion that that constitutes any agency between Kean and the sitting Members, so as to affect their seats by his acts.

In regard further to the treating at Kean's, there have been a number of persons, I believe more than 10, who swear to the treating having gone on, and they have given many instances of persons being treated, who have, however, come forward and denied it; that is a thing to be expected; it may be that those people, who would sell themselves out for 5*s.* to commit violence against any persons who happened to be opposed to them, may be telling the truth, or what they believe to be the truth; and when we hear, as we have heard from Mrs. Kean, that there was 5*s.* given by her daughter to be spent for treating, and that 5*s.* was to be given by her sister for the same purpose, it may be that beer was given there; but the answer to that case is that Kean has not been proved to have been an agent of the sitting Members, so as, by his acts, to affect them.

The next case was that of the "Yew Tree," and that is a case no doubt of a suspicious kind; evidence was given, and with regard to the evidence of Roberts, and of the two Ellises, I do not think it comes to much; but the evidence given by Collinge was strong, and if it were true it would, in my judgment, be fatal to the sitting Members. I do not, however, believe it is true; I cannot believe that Dr. Stocks or Mr. Leech have perjured themselves as to this matter. Dr. Stocks had been active in the election, and he must have known, as all persons, I presume, connected with elections know, that treating on behalf of a candidate affects his seat, and affects his capability of being elected. Collinge's story was that he went to Doctor Stocks, and told him the expression he used was, that he had been humbugged and pressed for beer; that they had been bamboozling him for beer, and he swore that Doctor Stocks gave him authority to give to those persons beer, only telling him to be careful about it; now, I think it is very unlikely that Doctor Stocks would have done that, he seemed to be a man of intelligence, and, no doubt, a gentleman of respectability; and he swears that he did not; again, Mr. Leech, who was there, gave strong evidence to the same effect. He did not hear the conversation which passed between Doctor Stocks and Collinge, but he heard that which was quite consistent with Doctor Stocks' evidence, but which was quite inconsistent with Collinge's evidence. I do not at all deny that the bill which was produced is strongly in favour of Collinge, for there is a statement in the bill that a certain quantity of beer was paid for, 9*s.* 6*d.* worth of beer; however, both Dr. Stocks and Mr. Leech swear, and Dr. Stocks especially swears, that he objected to that bill, and that he objected to that item, and that it was not paid by him or by his authority. I expect that the real solution of it was, that Collinge did probably supply beer in treating, thinking that he would be afterwards paid. He asserted that he had expended more than 5*l.*, and it may have been so; that was his statement, and it may have been that he did press, not upon Dr. Stocks, but upon some other persons connected with this election, the hardship it was upon him after he had actually supplied the beer, expecting to be paid for it, and that some person gave him the 9*s.* 6*d.* I therefore think the evidence of the respondents counterbalances the evidence on behalf of the petitioners with respect to the "Yew Tree."

The next matter was that which occurred at "No. IV.," that is Mrs. Hulme's, and that seems to me to be explained as easily as possible. I think the witnesses on both sides have been telling the truth with regard to it. Mrs. Hulme was directed upon the Friday to provide provide refreshment for a very considerable number of people, and she did so; but the person by whom the order was given, I suppose, had been advised that it would be dangerous to allow so much refreshment to be given at a public-house, and thereupon he went and countermanded it. Mrs. Hulmes very naturally said, I have provided the provisions; I have bought them, and it is very hard upon me; and not merely was it very hard, but she would have been entitled to have acted upon her retainer, and to have enforced payment. The gentleman who gave the order, whoever he was, may very well have said, "You shall not be a loser by it; you shall be indemnified against loss," and, accordingly, she told you that she sent in a bill, not in respect of the number of tickets, but charging, as against him, the expense which she had been put to in making provision for the entertainment; that is a very natural thing, and with regard to that, it is impossible for anyone to arrive at the conclusion that the paying of that money was a corrupt act; it was a natural act, and a reasonable act, and such as any person would do. I expect that if Mrs. Hulme had sued in the county court in respect of the money which she had expended, or for damages for the breach of the contract made with her, she would have recovered. I daresay the witnesses who were called as to what took place in her house may honestly enough have told that they went there, and that she likely enough, for the purpose of getting rid of them, gave them some beer; I can very well understand that, with the state in which this town was, Mrs. Hulme or anybody else would be glad to get rid of people who were wandering about the town half drunk by giving them some beer, and they may have supposed that she was giving it on behalf of the candidates. I think this is a reasonable and the true explanation of this matter.

Then with respect to the only other treating which the learned counsel have referred to, that is to say, of Robertshaw, who was alleged to have been treated by Mr. Sutcliffe, Mr. Sutcliffe was called yesterday, and he says it is quite true that he went to Cook-street, where Kearney's house was, and that he headed a number of voters (he said 12 or 15) to the poll, but that there his connection with the matter ended, and it was the order to give them beer, which was supposed to be done by Sutcliffe, which was to affect the candidates. But he says, "I did not return; it is a mistake, if it is not false swearing, to say that I returned, for I stopped in these rooms" (where this court was sitting). But it appeared that the men did all go back to Kearney's, and thereupon a man, who was described yesterday as a baker, directed beer to be given to them. I suppose that a man in the dress of a baker did direct beer to be given to them in respect of their vote, and it may be that men having seen Sutcliffe leading the men up may have supposed that he came back and ordered the beer. I should not impute to the man who gave evidence upon that point wilful perjury, but Sutcliffe has given an explanation of it, and he is confirmed by Sutton and Kearney, who was the person who kept the house, and therefore, I think that that falls to the ground.

The only other head of treating which occurred to me is that to which neither of the learned counsel have referred, and that is the treating of the men who were in the cabs; I am satisfied that that took place. There were men brought in those cabs who were voters, and the course which was pursued proves that that was known to be wrong, because, instead of driving straightforwardly up to the poll, the evidence is that the cabs stopped at some distance from it, and that the voters then got out and walked the rest of the way. I cannot doubt, that there were some persons who well knew that the bringing those voters was wrong, and that it was colourable, getting them out before they came to the poll for the purpose of pretending that they were not brought in the cabs. It is proved by a variety of evidence, which I have not the slightest doubt is true, hearing of the state of drunkenness which existed in this town, that those cabs pulled up at public-houses, and voters got out and had beer; but nevertheless, in my judgment, it would be impossible, without further evidence, to hold that that was corrupt treating. You must take into consideration the character of the people, and their habit of treating each other with beer, and that they do it out of a generous or a kindly feeling, it is a common and a usual thing, and I certainly am not prepared to hold that because a canvasser in bringing a man up to vote upon the day of election stopped at a public-house, and went in and had a glass of beer, that that was corrupt treating.

These, I believe, are the whole of the cases of treating, but I should be very sorry that it should be supposed by anyone that I at all approve of that which appears to have been done at the late election here. I sincerely hope that the Legislature will interfere before another general election to make the thing impossible. But, however, it is one thing to disapprove of that drunkenness which appears to have existed in the borough during the election, and it is another thing to find that the treating was of that character which would affect the seats of the Members.

I will now take the case of Mr. Moss, and it strikes me that that case fails. The evidence that was given on behalf of the Petitioners was simply evidence of what Broadhurst said, and if that case had been the only matter proved in this election, I apprehend that Mr. Holker would with perfect propriety, at the end of the petitioner's case, have called upon me to say that there was no case; that there was no legal evidence upon which I could act for the purpose of making Mr. Moss's supposed act an act that would unseat the Members. But that course could not have been taken, because there was much evidence of another character which required to be dealt with; and Mr. Holker could take no other course than that which he did. But Mr. Moss is called, and I must take Mr. Moss's evidence to be true, for I have had nothing at all to contradict it. Nor do I believe that Mr. Moss did not tell the truth about the matter. Mr. Moss's evidence is this, that he was an active partizan and chairman of one of the committees for Messrs. Cawley and Charley; that he had a number of men employed in his mill, and that they held different political opinions; that some of them supported one set of candidates, and others supported the other; he swore that he never interfered with them in regard to their votes, and his foreman, Broadhurst, swore the same; but upon the day of the election, a number of his men were absent from their work; and Mr. Moss did take the opportunity of employing several of them for the purpose of aiding him in the election. If there was any employment of the men, certainly it would look as if there was not much labour involved in it, for the old man who was called only went to bring one voter, which was the extent of his labour during the day. But I cannot think that the payment on the following day, without any previous contract, of the men who voted for the candidates of whom their master was in favour, of their ordinary day's wages at the mill would be a corrupt payment, and it would require to be a corrupt payment for the purpose of affecting the election. It is not like a payment before an election, which the law fastens upon; but being made after, it must be made out to be a corrupt payment. I am satisfied that no jury who desired to decide between the parties honestly would find that it was a corrupt payment, or anything like it.

With respect to Boyd's evidence, the case fails. The man said he was at a certain place with a carriage, that he wanted to go and vote for Messrs. Cheetham and Rawson, and that some man that was there, said, "You shall not be paid the 5 s.; you shall not be paid for the cab if you go and vote." I do not know that the man may not have said that, but I cannot say that that is an act which can affect the election.

Then come the cases of bribery; and with regard to that subject, I have taken considerable pains to go through the evidence for the purpose of ascertaining the cases in which bribery is alleged. The cases are these. The first was the case of Greenhalgh, the man whose wife was said to be deprived of the washing of Kean's family if he did not vote for Messrs. Cawley and Charley. Three witnesses have spoken to that; it turns out, in point of fact, that the washing has been taken away. Kean said that it was not in consequence of this, but of her being a woman of dirty habits or something of that sort, and that that was after the election. However, I think it is useless to enter into any discussion upon that matter, because, as I have already said, in my judgment, Kean was not an agent whose act could affect the sitting Members.

The next case was that of Samuel Crossley; and with regard to him, there is really no evidence. All that was proved was that he said he had got a pint of beer for his vote, and that he would vote for any person that would give him another. But there is no evidence that he got that pint of beer, and therefore the case fails for want of evidence of that which is the substratum of the charge, that is to say, that the beer was given to him for the purpose of influencing his vote.

The next case, that of Botham; that was the cabdriver who alleged that he heard a conversation take place in the shop of a tradesman named Millington. In the first place, no money was paid, and one ought to be very careful indeed of unseating Members upon an offer of bribery. The actual giving of money is one thing, but conversations of offers of bribes are dangerous things, because you never can be satisfied that you get the conversations truly. It may be that this cabman is telling the truth, because such a thing may be very easily said. This man was very ill, and I can conceive a man saying, "Well, I would not go to the poll for 30 l.," especially when it turns out that he went away from his own house near the poll, in order to be removed from the disturbance, and I can understand another man saying, "Well, it shall be 40 l. if you like," neither meaning to bribe at all. It is an expression which a bystander might very possibly misunderstand, and suppose that it had a meaning which it really had not. I think that that case also fails.

With respect to Kennedy, who was alleged to have been bribed by Mr. Balderstone, I disposed of that yesterday, for upon the evidence of Kennedy himself I do not believe there was evidence to go to a jury that that was a corrupt payment. If Mr. Balderstone was correct, it was not; it was 5 s. given in charity to a man who was in very great want, and that would not be bribery. But at present I entertain the opinion which I expressed yesterday, that Mr. Balderstone, being a committee-man or a district chairman, and being a canvasser, his agency for the purpose of affecting the sitting Members, terminated with the election. He was not a person authorised to make any payments subsequently to that, but he was a person who was employed for the purpose of the polling day and the canvassing; he was employed for that, and for nothing else. I think also the act must be done by the canvasser anterior to the election, otherwise the consequences, as Mr. Holker pointed out, would follow that a perfectly honest and pure election, of which upon the return nothing whatever could be said, might be affected by an act done the following week by an indiscreet person, who having been employed in the election, might make a corrupt payment. I cannot think that a corrupt payment made by a person who had been merely a member of a committee or a canvasser, and made after the election, and without the privity of the Member himself, could affect the election.

The

The next case is that of McCabe, and that again is an offer. As I have already said, such offers ought to be looked upon with very great care before they are allowed to affect a seat. Mellor has sworn most positively that nothing of the kind occurred; and for the purpose of unseating the Members, I should require confirmation of McCabe's evidence as against Mellor's. The other case was that of Rearden, and that was what took place between him and Singleton. It seems to me that that also falls to the ground, for the reason that Singleton was not an agent at all; that was proved clearly by Mr. Wyld, who stated that he did not know Singleton; and certainly he was not employed as a canvasser, Mr. Wyld produced the list of canvassers; therefore I take it that probably Singleton was some zealous partisan. I daresay that what was represented by Rearden to have taken place may really have taken place, but that would not affect the candidates, because to bring it within the section of the Act of Parliament there must be agency.

The next case is Leisch's case: I cannot but believe that the account given by Williams is true; he seems to have been a man in poor circumstances; and the supposed bribery was giving him 6 d. to go and buy some beer, as he said, for some voters. The Respondents called five gentlemen to contradict him; I believe the money given him was in charity; and that those gentlemen were telling the truth.

Now there remain three cases. I very much disapprove of some conduct which took place at this election, but the whole of the money alleged to have been spent in bribery amounts to 2*s.* 6*d.*, and one would be sorry that bribery to the extent of 1*s.* to one man, and 1*s.* to another man, and 6*d.* to a third, would upset an election; that would be a thing, as it seems to me, which would bring the law into ridicule. If in a case where great expense was incurred I were to say that because an imprudent man, and not the Member himself, gave 1*s.* to one man, and 1*s.* to another man, and 6*d.* to a third, that was to affect the election—I am now speaking of single isolated acts; I am not speaking of cumulated acts—but if I were to upset an election for single acts such as these, and such sums as these, it seems to me, that the law would be brought into contempt and ridicule.

With respect to Michael Welsh, I believe that that man spoke the truth; the three witnesses who were called yesterday, all three gave a contradictory account. I have no doubt that they were persons who discovered, since the election, that they had done a foolish thing; and they came here not very well recollecting what it was; not that they meant to perjure themselves about the matter, but that they came here not knowing very well what took place, and therefore they gave different accounts the one from the other; foolish it was, undoubtedly, but they swore that it was merely given to pay their footing. All of us, I suppose, have been asked to pay our footing, and I do think that I should strain the matter if I were to hold that a shilling given under such circumstances was a bribe; it was an indiscreet and foolish act, but I should be overstraining the law if I held these seats to be vacated by reason of a shilling given under those circumstances.

The next case is Michael Carroll: I believe every word that Michael Carroll, and Catherine Carroll, and the other witness, Tolbin, said; I am sorry to say, that I do not believe what Chapman said. There are two or three matters connected with the evidence which show that their evidence is correct; for the woman and the man, and indeed all three, swore that Chapman said that they were to go up the next Tuesday morning; it was the day of the polling, when the services of the man were likely to be required, and then he was to get a job, or get a "shop" as they called it; I am satisfied that those three people were telling the truth, and that the other man did not tell the truth with regard to this matter, but that he did act as he was represented to have done. What took place was this: Chapman, was coming out of a public-house, and Mrs. Carroll was standing at her door, and she asked him to treat her, according to the account given by both of them; thereupon he gave her 1*s.* to go and get some gin, and then he went into the house, where he found Carroll, and thereupon the two entered into a discussion upon the Irish Church. It was 12 o'clock on Saturday night, and it is stated that this man said that he would give Carroll some employment if he would go up on the following Tuesday. I have no doubt that that took place, but it was a mere offer, and it never was carried out. I think that it would be straining the matter a great deal too far, if I held that a shilling given to a woman for the purpose of treating her was to be considered a bribe to get the vote of the man. Although I believe what those people say is true, I do not draw the inference from it that in point of fact Chapman had authority to give the employment, or that it affected Carroll's vote, for the woman said, "No, you shall not get his vote; it would be against his conscience; he shall not do any such thing; he shall vote the other way;" I do not think that that can be held to be bribery.

The other case is that of John Reece. I believe the Reeces; I think that they told the truth; Thompson says he was afraid of them, and that he gave them 6*d.* because he was afraid that they would not let him out. He had got into a dangerous house, in a rough neighbourhood, and he gave the sixpence for the purpose of getting out of the place. I think that those people told the truth, and I will tell you why, because they both thought that the man's name was Whittaker. Whittaker was the person who had been canvassing in this neighbourhood, and I am satisfied that he told them to go to Whittaker upon the polling morning and try to get employment from him, and that is the reason why they supposed that his name was Whittaker, and why they persisted in it until they found that the man was not Whittaker but Thompson. They only had that sixpence, and I think that I should be bringing the law into ridicule if I were to hold that giving sixpence, under the circumstances, was to invalidate the election.

I think also that the offer of employment fails, because it was merely telling them they were to go to a man and try to get it, that is what it really was. If anything was said about employment, he said to them "You are to go on the morning of the poll and inquire for Whittaker, and probably you will get it;" I think that that is what it really amounts to.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the specific objections which must be established for the purpose of bringing the case within these three sections fail, and it is my duty to determine that these gentleman, Mr. Cawley and Mr. Charley, were legally elected and returned, and so to report to the Speaker.

The only other matter with which I have to do is with respect to the costs, and I certainly think that costs ought not to be allowed in this case.

SLIGO ELECTION.

Sligo.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Keogh, 24 February 1869.

Mr. Justice Keogh.] IN this case of the Petition of Michael Foley, petitioner, and Major Knox, the sitting Member for Sligo, respondent, I have given the voluminous evidence the best consideration that I could command. It is a case requiring the most serious consideration. There has been an immense mass of evidence given on both sides. I think there have been more than 80 witnesses.

Before I open the charges in the Petition, I wish to refer to one or two observations which were addressed to me by the very able counsel who represented the sitting Members. My attention was called to the decisions of two eminent judges, one of them in Ireland, and the other of them in England. One was the decision of my brother O'Brien at the trial of the late Londonderry Petition, and the other was that very able and comprehensive judgment of Mr. Baron Martin at the trial of the recent Westminster Petition. I have considered those judgments, and I see no reason to dissent from any position that has been laid down in either of those cases; but all these cases must be looked at, and all the rulings of Judges, by the light of the particular facts; and, as I said before, it is quite heedless to quote an isolated passage from the judgment of any learned judge without having before you, and weighing deliberately, the facts upon which that observation has been made. I quite concur in what has been said by Mr. Baron Martin, that this is a very stringent and penal Act of Parliament. I do not go into the question at all, as to whether it is right or whether it is wrong, that this tribunal should be created. Every good subject, not to speak of the Judge upon the bench, is bound to respect the will of the Legislature. The Legislature has created this tribunal; it is my duty to proceed to the trial of these election petitions. I have only to administer the law. It is not for me to consider whether the law is right or wrong. In fact, I am not allowed to consider any Act of Parliament as being wrong; so long as it is upon the statute-book I am bound to obey it. But I concur also in the observation that was made by Mr. Macdonogh, that an Act of Parliament of this nature, inflicting such severe penalties upon any person who may be found guilty of the offence of corrupt practices at elections, ought to be administered with the utmost possible extent of judicial caution; and I have, in considering this case, weighed, to the utmost extent in my power, every one of these charges; the evidence in support of them, the evidence combating that evidence, before I have allowed myself to arrive at any conclusion. But then I must say that, once the evidence is presented to my mind, in a way which ought to command me to arrive at a conclusion, I have no prerogative of pardon. I have no authority to be, as it is said, merciful. That is not my privilege; nor should I be turned away from the discharge of my duty, no matter how painful that duty may be, by sympathy for any individual whatsoever. There are two interests involved in all these things; the one is the matter at issue between the parties; there is another interest which is not to be neglected in these cases, and that is the interest of the public. If I were to assume the prerogative of sympathising with, and being merciful to, individuals, I must neglect the public interest, and I must forget my own duties. That I cannot do.

Next, an observation was made by the learned counsel that the evidence ought to be strong, very strong, clear and conclusive of agency, before I would allow myself to attach the penalties of this Act of Parliament, such as they are, to any individual: I agree in that. The law allows you to prove acts of bribery before you give evidence of agency; but it was never contemplated that an individual should be charged with the consequences of acts of bribery until, at some period of the investigation, agency was brought home; but it was altogether a mistake, both in law and in fact, to think that you can depute individuals to do certain things, or that they should take upon themselves to do certain things with your sanction, and that you can escape the consequences of their acts by afterwards stating,—whether or not upon oath, whether truly or untruly,—that you did not contemplate those acts being done when you gave the authority which constitutes agency. Agency is a result of law, to be drawn from the facts in the case, and from the acts of individuals, and it is not by what a principal tells me upon the table that he intended to do, that I am to construe the question of agency; but I am to decide that question and the question of intention itself, not from the words of an individual now, but from what I conceive to be the natural and necessary consequence of his acts and words at the time he gave any authority. If it were otherwise it would be open to any man, if he was a man of good character and of unquestionable reputation, to tell a particular individual to go forth and be his agent; afterwards to come up upon the table, when that agent had transgressed all moral duties, and to say, “I never intended that he should do anything wrong, all I intended he should do was what was legitimate and lawful.” It is not what he intended, as he explains it here, but it is what authority did he give, and did the acts of the person so authorised, legal or illegal, naturally follow the authority which was so given.

Having made these observations, I approach the facts in the case. It is said that there was no committee in this case; that there are great difficulties of seeing what was done; that much is dependent upon conjecture; that the acts of the parties not being disclosed in evidence, I can draw no conclusion unfavourable to the sitting Member from anything that appears suspicious in the case; I agree in that. No matter how the clouds of suspicion may thicken around the head of the sitting Member, I am not at liberty to act upon suspicion. Unless I can see clear and distinct evidence, not only of the corpus delicti, but of the agency, on this Petition and on this inquiry as presented to me, the sitting Member's seat ought not to be imperilled. But I lay down this proposition most distinctly, that no sitting Member can guard himself against the consequences of the acts of agents, if once they are proved to be agents, by coming before the court and swearing, even though he may convince the court that he is swearing truly, that he never intended that anything illegal should be done at the election. A common and familiar illustration occurs to my mind: the wherry-man upon the river does not arrive one moment the less certainly at his destination because he happens to be rowing one way and looking another.

Now, I come to the Petition: the Petition charges that the election was holden on the 19th of November, and that before, during and after the said election, the sitting Member, Major Knox, by himself and his agents, directly and indirectly, did give, lend, and agree to give and lend, and did offer and promise to procure, and endeavour to procure, money and other valuable considerations; also offices, places, and employments to and for divers persons having votes at the said election, and to induce the said voters to vote or to refrain from voting. The next clause of importance, the fourth in the Petition, is that Major Knox did, by himself and his agents, and persons acting on his behalf, pay or agree to pay, or promise to give monies to divers persons on account of the conveyance of voters who voted at the election, contrary to the provisions of the statute. That charge there has been no evidence whatever to sustain. The fifth is that Major Knox, by himself and by others, corruptly gave and provided, and was accessory to the giving and providing, meat, drink, entertainment and provisions to and for divers persons having votes at the said election. That charge I do not think there is sufficient evidence to sustain. The sixth charge is, that the said Major Knox did, by himself and his agents, and by other persons, directly or indirectly, make use of, or threaten to make use of, force, violence and restraint, and inflicted and threatened the infliction of injury, loss, damage and harm, and did in divers other ways practise intimidation on certain persons having votes at the said election, in order to induce or compel such persons to vote or refrain from voting, or on account of such persons having voted or refrained from voting at the said election, and did, by abduction, devices and other fraudulent devices or contrivances, impede, prevent and otherwise interfere with the free exercise of the franchise of divers voters, at the said election, and did thereby compel, induce and prevail upon such voters to vote or to refrain from voting at the said election. There is a scintilla of evidence to sustain that charge; but it is not one upon which I should act. There is the evidence of one voter who is named Henry, who says that Thomas Leonard did draw out a revolver-pistol and threaten a man if he did not come down immediately to Mrs. Hall's, the night before the election. There is also the evidence of a voter who says, that he being a tenant of Mr. Stokes, Mr. Stokes did threaten him, that was I think at the revision, that if he registered his vote he would turn him out of house and home. But, on the whole, although there had been great mob violence at the election, and partially on the side of Major Knox, as I shall by-and-by mention, I do not think there is anything like special evidence to sustain that charge of undue influence or intimidation; I do not think any sufficient case has been made against Major Knox on that head; as to the seventh clause, which is as to the disqualified voters, that was abandoned, therefore the whole of this case comes back to the one charge in the Petition, and that is substantially, that under all the clauses in the Act of Parliament, bribery was committed; bribery as defined in the different Acts of Parliament, and to that now I proceed to apply myself.

Before I enter upon the evidence, I will just say a word as to the state and condition of this borough. Mr. Macdonogh opened the case of his client by stating that Major Knox indulged the Sligo people with public sports; that he knew and cultivated their tastes; that his purse was open to those who were entitled to charity; that he always had every poor man's story in favourable consideration; and he put forward that as the real explanation of all the acts of Major Knox, and that nothing at all was traceable to any corrupt purpose. He seemed, too, to say that Major Knox would be shown on the evidence to be clearly and distinctly the chosen of the electors of Sligo. Now, the constituency of Sligo, as shown on the register, amount to 520 in all. Of these, Major Knox secured the suffrages at the election of, I think, 241; and Captain Flanagan 229. There were 50 voters unpolled; and I do not think that that is unworthy of consideration, when I come to the way in which the Petitioner seeks to establish his charges against Major Knox. It has been properly stated that a tenth of the whole constituency remained unpolled. Now, that is not like a case in which a constituency had been registered some 12 months previously, in which parties may have died off; but it is a case in which there had been an active contest at the revision which took place immediately before the polling. We all know that the last revision was a special revision, and took place at the latest period possible before the time of the election itself. Consequently, these 50 having refrained from voting, the majority at the election for Major Knox was 12, and 12 only. It was truly said yesterday by Mr. Palles, that if you abstracted seven from Major Knox's poll, and gave them to Captain Flanagan, Captain Flanagan would have been returned. It is equally true, that if 13 more out of the 50 unpolled had voted for Captain Flanagan, he would have been returned, and not Major Knox. Furthermore, it appeared in evidence—I am not now speaking of specific charges of bribery—that a person of the name of Harrison did not vote at all. There was a man examined here. I think his name was James Gray, who was in the admitted pay and employment of Major Knox, and he was asked whether he was not under a charge of assaulting and threatening Harrison, the voter. He said he was, but he was not guilty. To do away with the effect of that, if there was anything in it, he was asked whether that voter had not voted for Major Knox. He said he did not; he did not think he had voted at all, and the fact is so, for I have referred to the poll-book, and Harrison, so alleged to have been assaulted, did not vote at all. Secondly, a person of the name of Dolan did not vote at all, and he had unquestionably received—I shall not now dwell upon the particular time—but he had received from Mr. Utrid Knox, the cousin of Major Knox, in two distinct payments, the sum of 16 l. Kearns did not vote at all. I do not think the case attempted to bring home bribery or intimidation has succeeded as against Kearns; but it is a remarkable fact, that whilst Kearns swears here that he had intended to vote for Major Knox, and he was in the hotel opposite the court-house where the voting was taking place, he did not vote at all. There are two Kearns mentioned in the case. The one I mean is he who was examined on behalf of the Petitioner. Then the two McMullens did not vote at all. They could not have voted, because it has been made as clear as anything can be which is not exhibited to your own eyesight, that these two McMullens were spirited out of this town by the machinations of some persons whose names are not disclosed, and that the ultimate work of removing them from the town was carried out by Mr. Stokes, who admits that he hired a car for the purpose of taking them before dawn of day to Bundoran, which is 20 English miles from this town, that he provided this car at his own expense, and for once he was frank. He said he did that for the purpose of forwarding the interests of Major Knox at the election. I shall have to recur again to the case of the McMullens, but I am now speaking of what the general features of the election were. Still more, a person of the name of Gilmore was advanced a sum of 5 l. or 6 l. by Mr. Utrid Knox, he, too, being a voter. Some two or three other persons who are not named also had loans or advances of money from Mr. Utrid Knox. Whether they voted or did not vote, I am not prepared to say. I cannot say, because their names are not disclosed, but it is not difficult to see that these transactions had influences upon the voters. There cannot be a shadow of doubt that in the case, at all events, of the McMullens some corrupt practices had the result of preventing them voting for any one at the election. But if in the cases that I have mentioned the voters were corruptly influenced, and if such corrupt influences prevented the parties from voting, or induced them to vote, it is easy to see that, removing those influences, the result of the election might have been, and in all human probability would have been, different.

Now,

Now, the first time that Major Knox comes into connection with this borough is important. Of course it is not necessary to refer to his family connections with the place. Major Knox, by every personal qualification, was entitled to seek the representation of any constituency, and I have no doubt at all would honour them by his abilities. His education, and his family, justified him in aspiring to the position of a representative, especially in this part of Ireland; but the first time he is brought into practical contact with the constituency of Sligo was in the year 1867, I think he said in the commencement of 1867, when a requisition was forwarded to him by certain parties representing the Conservative interest in the borough of Sligo. The names of these parties are not disclosed, except so far as we may collect some of them from the answers given by Major Knox to the questions that were put to him as to the persons he visited on first coming to Sligo; and amongst those persons he mentioned Sir Robert Gore Booth, whom he did not see; Mr. Olpherts, whom he did see; Mr. Wynne, of Hazlewood; and then he spoke of those in the town, and he mentioned Mr. Cherry, and it was afterwards proved that he saw Mr. Cherry a couple of days after he arrived there. He mentioned other gentlemen, Mr. Henry Lyons, Mr. Woods, Mr. Williams; and I call attention to these names, especially Mr. Woods, Mr. Williams, Mr. Cherry, Mr. Lyons. I think it may be fairly assumed that these gentlemen were amongst those who solicited Major Knox to come to Sligo. He is introduced to some of the constituency, at all events, as the probable candidate in the event of a vacancy. Then comes in the question of public sports. There is a regatta; Major Knox takes a prominent part, as we were told, in that regatta. He has some pleasure yachts or boats built on that beautiful lake that adjoins the town of Sligo, Lough Gill, and, I would say, very unfortunately for himself, he makes the acquaintance of a man of the name of Thomas Brennan, who, I have no doubt, with that low cunning which sometimes characterizes men in his station, attracts the attention of Major Knox by christening a boat of his which was successful in the race the "Irish Times," Major Knox being known to be the proprietor of an able and influential journal in this country with that name. The close of the year 1867 comes round, and then there is a great deal more interest taken in the fortunes of the electors; 1868 opens, and, I would say, the plot thickens. The middle of 1868 comes, and then there is the revision. Then all parties are eager and zealous for their respective sides. Major Knox, in the witness-box, described the revision; he said that it was "a tremendous business." Well, what could have been so tremendous in the registration of 500 voters, or in the canvass of 241 voters ultimately brought to the poll in favour of Major Knox? Probably the number of his supporters at the revision did not exceed that. But, at all events, there is a quickened interest amongst all the parties at the time of the revision, and after the revision there is immediate preparation made for the election. And now let us see what was the course of conduct adopted, as regards this constituency, from a very early period. My attention has been called, and I have allowed evidence to be given, of the turbulent condition of the town, and of the horrible system of intimidation which has prevailed there. We all know, it was proved in the case, and we must know it abunde, that a gentleman of high rank received his death-wound on the morning of that very election; and I am obliged to take notice of the fact, that having sent a gallant officer to accompany a witness to Sligo the night before last, I have now a painful consciousness that he undertook a very perilous mission; he was himself covered with blood, from a terrible wound inflicted upon him, happily, I hope, without very serious ultimate consequences. But that blow might have terminated in his death. The lawless condition of that town has been and is beyond description. It must be put down; and I shall take care that my report in this case, I will presently state what that will be, shall contain special mention of the abominable intimidation which prevails there. The measure of the corrupt practices of Sligo, I have no hesitation in saying, is full—full in every description of corrupt practice—no one appears to controvert that, but especially in intimidation it does appear to have attained a bad pre-eminence. I cannot lose sight of the fact, and I am not now applying my observations to any one side, for it is applicable to both, that, as was well said by Mr. Pales, nine months before the election, mobs were organized, and organized on behalf of the sitting Member, as well as of his opponents. The very best that the sitting Member's counsel tried to make of the acts of Brennan is, that he was only, as he described himself, "the head of the fighting department." They say, "he is not our agent for the purposes of bribery; he was only our agent for the purposes of mobs." Of course it is said they were mobs to counteract mobs, but so early as nine months before the election mobs headed by this Brennan, and hired by this Brennan, were organised in Sligo, and that state of things continued down to the most recent period, until the revision and after the revision, sustained by the money of Major Knox, and by the money of his cousin Mr. Utrid Knox, he occupying at the time the office of clerk of the peace for the borough, an office which brought him into special connection, let me say, with the registration of voters, which ought to have induced and commanded him to keep his hands clean of all these transactions. But here he was, clerk of the peace for the borough of Sligo. I do not want to play upon the words when I say "clerk of the peace," engaged in the paying and hiring of mobs, instead of appealing to the constituted authorities, and seeing that those whose duty it was kept the peace of the town. Is it to be said that for nine long months the peace of a town in which there is a magistracy, in which there is a constabulary, in which are, I believe, Her Majesty's troops quartered, is to be dependent upon the vicarious aid of a band of fellows at the command of such a man as Thomas Brennan? But I am told that he is not the agent of Major Knox, except for the purposes of hiring and commanding these bands. Now, is that so? The first question that I have asked myself is, "Is the agency of Thomas Brennan dependent upon suspicion?" If it is, Major Knox shall hold his seat so far as Thomas Brennan is concerned. What is the first act in this case of which we have clear and positive evidence, evidence not dependent upon the oath of any of the witnesses for the Petitioner, but evidence admitted, not controverted, both by Brennan and by Major Knox? Do any of us forget the appearance of Patrick Neilan in the witness-box? He was a voter in the year 1867, and perhaps before; he continues a voter in the year 1868. Thomas Brennan goes to Patrick Neilan, and he, at all events, has the knowledge of who and what Patrick Neilan is. Does he know that he is a voter or not? Why, he swears he not only knew that he was a voter, but he knew at the previous election he had got 50*l.* for his vote, and I think, moreover, that he had got 5*l.* for expenses; and that he had insisted upon keeping the whole of the 50*l.*, as well as the 5*l.*, though that was to be deducted out of the 50*l.* Thomas Brennan knew that Patrick Neilan was a man capable of being bribed, and of his having been so at a former election, to his knowledge. He goes to him, and he says, "I am going to send up a list of 30 names to Major Knox, who is my friend, and I have put your name in the number." He says to him that he has done so, and that he will communicate with Major Knox about it. Neilan is in destitute circumstances. He was proved to be a man in very destitute circumstances. He is afterwards very indignant that Brennan should have included his name amongst the party of 30 persons. He writes to Major Knox himself, stating his condition, he having been previously spoken to by Thomas Brennan, and he gives us the terms of that letter which he wrote to Major Knox; and what was it? He said, "that he had been in communication with a friend of Major Knox's, and in consequence of that communication he wrote to him directly. Who is that friend of Major Knox's that he had been in communication with? Thomas Brennan. What is the reply of Major Knox to it. The first reply to it is addressed in terms certainly not such as you would expect to be used to a man who is described afterwards as being only an object of charity, in the most destitute condition. He writes to him apologising for not sooner answering his letter, commencing, "My dear Sir," and stating that he will reply fully to the letter early in the next week. That is the substance of the letter, and I think it is dated in the month of January 1868.

Sligo.

Mr. Palles.] The 30th of January.

Mr. Justice Keogh.] Major Knox writes a second letter to Neilan, which is not forthcoming, but which certainly had existence, 'because it is proved by Mr. Pollock, Major Knox's solicitor, that that letter was shown to him by Neilan, and that Mr. Pollock either destroyed it or gave it back to Neilan. That was the evidence of Mr. Pollock, that he either destroyed that letter or did not know where it was; that it either remained with him, or was returned to the other party. If it remained with him, he destroyed it; if it was returned to the other party, of course he did not know anything at all about it. What was that letter? It was a letter telling him to go to Mr. Pollock, and he would investigate the case. Now, what is the meaning of investigating his case? Mr. Pollock says that he was to see, the man being in a very destitute condition, what was the sum which would take him out of his destitution, and accordingly Mr. Pollock says, "I will be prepared to give you 12*l.*" Now that was an act of charity; an act of charity—that is the case made for the sitting Member, that this was a destitute man, whom he did not believe to be a voter for Sligo, and therefore he thought himself at liberty to be charitable to this man. Beyond a doubt, it strikes one as a very curious circumstance that charity should be done through an authorised solicitor. But what is the reply made by this man to this offer of charity? Why, we have heard of the sturdy beggar, and we have heard of the robber of the Apennines who asks an alms per amor di dios, with a long rifle projecting over the wall. But here is a pauper, here is a Sligo pauper, who absolutely refuses 12*l.* from the open hand which is about contributing to his wants, and here is the attorney of that same gentleman with the open hand, who immediately negotiates with him about raising the amount, and he says, "If you won't take 12*l.*, at all events you will take 14*l.*" "No," is the reply of the other; "it is of no use; I will not take that either;" and then, to use a phrase which has found its way into the evidence in this case, "the figure" mounts up, and absolutely Mr. Pollock, the private solicitor of Major Knox, solicits, entreats, canvasses this man to accept from his bounty 16*l.* It is equally certain that this pauper, so destitute, without any means whatsoever, and all this time believed by Major Knox not to be an elector of the borough of Sligo, deliberately refuses the 16*l.* from Mr. Pollock, and walks away, and says he will have nothing to do with it.

What next? and this is not contradicted; I am now dwelling upon the question of agency. Thomas Brennan was the man who first introduced Neilan to Major Knox. What takes place? Mr. Pollock, not relinquishing the settlement of this business of imperative charity and humanity, tells the pauper, so destitute, to see his friend, and to come to him again. Who is the friend? Thomas Brennan. Thomas Brennan introduces this man, who is a voter, to Major Knox, in order that he may become the object of Major Knox's bounty; Brennan writes to Major Knox; Neilan writes to Major Knox, and refers to Brennan; Major Knox refers him to his family solicitor; the family solicitor negotiates with him to see what amount of charity he will accept, and failing to induce him to take 12*l.*, 14*l.*, or 16*l.*, tells him, "Go, and see your friend, and come back to me in the course of a week." And who is his friend? Thomas Brennan, and he does see Thomas Brennan; and what does Thomas Brennan say? "Will 18*l.* answer?" "Well," said he, "16*l.* is a good thing;" but he finally says to Thomas Brennan, "Tell them that less than 20 l. will not do." Well, of all the paupers I ever heard of, he is the most extraordinary. Sturdy is no word for that description of mendicancy. It is calculating, cool. It takes up its pen and literally puts down the items which are to make up the bounty of Major Knox, and then the matter is communicated to the family solicitor, and the 20 l. is paid. But what becomes of this question of charity? Well, a security, an I O U is taken for it. Are you to be melting at one moment, and calculating the next? Is it to be in one hand a debt, and in the other hand a dole? What is it? Is it charity? If it is, what is the use of talking of security? Is it a debt? What is the use of talking about charity? But does that transaction fix, or does it not fix, the agency of Thomas Brennan? Has that anything to do with mobs? Is there any headship of the fighting department there? No; that is the department of consolation, of benevolence, in which this Brennan now takes the lead. He is the ministering angel in that case; he is a fighting Bobadil in the other.

Well, have we anything else as regards this Mr. Brennan? What is the case of Flynn? He is a tenant of Lady Palmerston's; he owes a year's rent up to the 25th March 1868; that is exactly the amount, looking at the receipts. An ejectment is brought in the office, I suppose. There being a year's rent due, an ejectment lies, and it is brought by Mr. Pollock, who is the local solicitor for Lady Palmerston. Flynn says that Brennan told him he would write to Major Knox on the subject of this distress; he asked Flynn himself to write to Major Knox on the subject. Flynn declined to do so, but, said he, "Whatever you can do for me you will." What takes place? Brennan is at the sessions; that is not contradicted; Mr. Pollock does not contradict it; Mr. Pollock is very cautious in giving his testimony; just what I should expect from him. He will not pledge himself that Brennan was not there at the sessions; he will not pledge himself—just what I would expect—that Brennan was not the very hand that gave that money, the 10 l. What takes place? The process of ejectment, which then and there by the payment of that money, ought to have gone by the board, Mr. Pollock tells Mr. Utrid Knox, he being the clerk of the peace, and it being his duty to attend the assistant barrister, tells him to pass the process on to the session of October. Why, the ejectment should have gone altogether the moment the money was paid. The man swears the money was paid then and there in the month of June, at the court-house, by Brennan; Mr. Pollock will not say it was not so paid there. What occurs afterwards? The October session coming on, the process is still in the list. What does Mr. Pollock? On the remonstrance of the man, he tells the clerk of the peace to strike it out. The man does not get his receipt for that money until the month of January 1869. One shilling of that money he has never paid out of his own resources to any living being; his rent is paid; his holding is still his own; his year's rent has been most kindly and humanely contributed by Thomas Brennan, and am I to believe that Thomas Brennan is to be at the loss of the money; that he who has to borrow a few pounds to take him out of the country, and who, for aught that appears, is not worth a sixpence on the face of the earth, is to be at the loss of that money, and that, indeed, none of the parties concerned in this election had anything whatever to do with it? Flynn swears that he (Brennan) told him he would write to Major Knox upon the subject, and the money is paid very shortly after that communication. What more is there about it?

Now, on the question of agency, here are two telegrams about which there can be no possible mistake; they are admitted to be in the handwriting of Major Knox, and, strange to say, they have not been explained, nor has there been an attempt made to explain them. They are both in the handwriting of Major Knox; they are both of the same date, and transmitted at the same hour. One is from Major Knox to Mr. Utrid Knox, his cousin, the clerk of the peace. This is in his own name, and he says in this—"Mr. Hignell will be in Sligo at twenty minutes past two to-day; can you kindly, and without inconvenience, meet him there? Important." What is the other? The other is dated the same day. It is in the name of Hignell to Thomas Brennan, Esq., 16, High-street, Sligo, and is written by Major Knox at the same time and same moment, both being sent together: "I shall be in Sligo at twenty minutes past two to-day." Why, of these two telegrams, is one of them sent to Brennan in the name of Hignell, though in the handwriting of Major Knox; whilst the other, in the same handwriting, is sent to Mr. Utrid Knox by Major Knox, in his own name. Both are the act of Major Knox. Is not Hignell Major Knox? Is he not the agent of Major Knox, is he not his employé in his office at Dublin? I think he said he was a retired officer; but whatever he may be, does not that telegram, written by Major Knox, adopting the name of Hignell, addressed to Thomas Brennan, prove to demonstration that Brennan was the adopted agent from first to last in these transactions of Major Knox. What more? Hignell is, as I said, in the office of Major Knox in Dublin. Here is a telegram from Mr. Thomas Brennan to Mr. Hignell, "Take care you do not make a fatal mistake that cannot be recovered. Wylie is to be here on Thursday next." And Mr. McDonogh (the leading counsel for Major Knox) tells us—I do not see it is in proof—but he distinctly stated that Wylie meant Serjeant Armstrong, the former member for Sligo. Much stress was laid upon the time of the revision, as if for a moment the idea appeared to pervade the minds of some parties that bribery is less bribery because it is committed two months or two years before an election. Any act committed previous to an election, with a view to influence a voter, no matter at what distance of time, with a view to influence a voter at the coming election, whether it is one, two, or three years before, is just as much bribery as if it was committed on the day before the election, or the day of the election; nay more, if any man commits bribery on the first week of a Parliament, and if he sues for the suffrages of that constituency in the last week of the seven years which precede the dissolution, that act committed six years before can be given in evidence against him, and his seat will not hold an hour; but did Brennan's connection end before, or with the revision? So far from that, you have the evidence that Major Knox took part of a house; it is in the expense returns which I have before me, for which he gave 50 l. to Mrs. Leech in Sligo; he had two large rooms for himself, and as to a third, you have the evidence of that girl, Mary Burke, which I say is not displaced by any evidence, in this case. An attempt was made to discredit her character; but it utterly failed, and it brought confusion on those who suggested the attempt. What does she say? She is not contradicted by Major Knox, because she does not apply herself to Major Knox. She says she was told by O'Neil, the butler of Major Knox, to prepare a third room for the reception of Brennan. She does not say that she got instructions from Major Knox, but from the butler of Major Knox, and that butler was in court, and was pointed out to her by the counsel for Major Knox. His name was mentioned, Michael O'Neil, I think, and he is still in the service of Major Knox. He was in court during her examination, and if she had sworn falsely upon this that she was directed by him, he bringing his directions from his master to prepare a third room for the occupation of Thomas Brennan, and that he might take his meals there, not during the revision, but during the election, why was not O'Neil put upon the table to confront her? as it was thought to bring disgrace on her by mentioning her name on cross-examination in connection with him, why was he not brought upon the table, and asked whether that was true or false? He was not, and I therefore come to the conclusion that Mary Burke was speaking the truth in that respect. Secondly, we have Major Knox stating that he did not see this Brennan very often there, but that he was out dining in the evening; why, that is the very reason he did not, and that he was able to say so, because the room was provided for him that he might not be in the rooms occupied by Major Knox, but that third room became the room of Major Knox, and the acts of Brennan became his acts. What would be the use of having this man at the election, if he was only to be at the head of the fighting parties said to have been then given up? What would be the use of providing for this gentleman a room under the same roof as Major Knox, adjoining his private apartments, whether he was at the head of the fighting or the bribing department, unless he was the recognised, received, and cherished agent of Major Knox? Well, there he is brought to the very time of the election. Is he only connected with Major Knox in the town of Sligo? A gentleman is produced here, his name is Buckley, who has been in the "Irish Times" establishment in Dublin, from the 7th of September 1868 to the 5th of December 1868. He was the sub-editor of the "Irish Times" newspaper during the whole of that period. What is his testimony? He says he saw this very Thomas Brennan, who then, at least, was not leading mobs in Sligo, constantly frequenting the "Irish Times" offices in Dublin, and frequently in the private apartment of Major Knox there. He saw him there before the election, on the Sunday. He said, I think, there was an interval of more than a week between the visits. He saw him after the election at the "Irish Times" office; well, is it seriously pretended, or could it be with any hope put either before an individual juror—and I am placed in that position—or before 12 jurors, that this man was not an agent of Major Knox, commencing, it may be, their acquaintance in connection with these boat-races, but afterwards supplied with money by Major Knox, 10 l. at one time, 15 l. at another, 25 l. at another time—I care not whether it is for mobs, or whatever other purpose—communicating with him by letter, which is not denied, and personally connected with him in Sligo and in Dublin before the revision and during the revision, and before and during and after the election? The letters which passed between them are not produced, for they have been destroyed; every scrap of paper, it is remarkable, in this case, has been removed and destroyed; they have been burnt; the agent of Major Knox says, he burnt or destroyed, no one appears to have kept anything. The resolution appears to have been formed not to have anything which could trace home any act to anybody, and I heard the conducting agent of Major Knox say, as if he felt that he had something to boast of, "We took care to have no committees." I know it is a dangerous thing to have a committee; but if some contrivance more astute than another is put in the place of a committee, they have very great confidence, and let me say very little wisdom, who think that, tested by common sense, such shallow artifices will prevail in the end. But though no letters are produced, and there is no committee to connect Brennan with, we have him brought into contact in Dublin constantly with Major Knox, getting his money, frequenting the same house with him in Sligo, a room taken for him in the same house, where he got his meals. The witness who can disprove all that is in court, and his name prominently mentioned, and the attention of the court called to him, with a view to suggest a doubt as to the character of that female witness. In the presence of all that mass of evidence, can I hesitate for a moment in finding that Thomas Brennan is the agent of Major Knox? And if he is what becomes of this case? Why, the corpus delictæ was abandoned; and if the counsel for Major Knox are bound to admit, as they have done, that bribery has been clearly and distinctly proved to have been committed in the town of Sligo, and that the only question is one of agency, then all I can say is, that never in a court of justice did I hear agency proved more conclusively. It is idle to argue that we cannot speculate as to agency, that we cannot suspect agency; so I say, you cannot; but here is no question of speculation, or suspicion, for Thomas Brennan is proved to have been an agent by the handwriting of Major Knox; he is proved to have been an agent by the sub-editor of the "Times" newspaper, by the number of times he was frequenting the private office of Major Knox. He is proved to have been an agent, by Major Knox having engaged, through his confidential servant, a third room in the private house which was appropriated for his personal accommodation in the town of Sligo during the whole of that election.

Well, then, how many men does Brennan bribe? Why, I would be wasting time to go through the list; he is brought into contact with almost every one of them; when everybody else abandons the attempt, he comes upon the scene; when Mr. Lyons cannot prevail upon Kearns and Barry, Stokes first takes them in hand; when Stokes fails to convert them to his purpose, all is not lost until Brennan has tried his hand. Who takes in hand Dominick Oates? He is brought to Brennan; by whom? Mark this: he is brought to Brennan by Thomas Leonard, who is down in this list of election expenses, signed under the hand of Major Knox; the voucher being in his own writing, for expenses paid by him to Leonard Garlick and others. That is the very Leonard who went to Dominick Oates, and brought him to Brennan to be bribed; that very Leonard is down in the list of election expenses, as the canvasser, the paid canvasser, and messenger of Major Knox.

Well, is there anything further? How many men depose to the fact that Brennan canvassed with Major Knox? I merely mention that in passing, because with the conclusive evidence I have in writing, and by the acts of Major Knox himself, he is his agent for any purpose in the world connected with that election; but he is absolutely, within the narrow limits of the decisions in England, a canvasser with Major Knox; he introduced him to several of these voters; to be sure, it was said it was only in one street. What does that mean? Mr. Harloe Phibbs said, "Tom, come here and show us through Pound-street," because that was a district that he was not so familiar with. Now, I am rather surprised at that, because every one knows that Mr. Harloe Phibbs is as familiar with Sligo, and with every part of it, as he is with his right hand; Mr. Phibbs is the agent of Major Knox in that canvass; he is accompanied on that canvass by Brennan; Brennan introduced him to several of the voters; Brennan introduced him to Flynn, to Pat Brady, to Oates, to Tiernen, and several others, amongst them the witness that was examined before Tiernen—I forget now his name, Kelly, I think.

Well, then, as I said before, if that be the case it is idle to travel further into these transactions; and what finally becomes of Brennan? The moment after the election he disappears. We had a great deal of inquiry about that hospital, and I did not think it of much value; I make no doubt that Brennan was in some state approaching delirium tremens. It is rather remarkable; Dr. Macnamara says he was under the impression that he had knocked down several men in Sligo. Whether that was with the stick, or the more agreeable method of the distribution of money, I am not prepared to say; however, a subpoena is given to Dr. Macnamara, with a request that he would give it to Brennan; and he appears to be dreadfully outraged at such a request, and immediately he puts the man under lock and key; and, with the exception of two or three confidential Sligo men, no one can find their way to him without the permission of Dr. Macnamara. Dr. Macnamara is very indignant that Mr. Malony should give him a subpoena, and say, "If you will not let me see him, will you be kind enough to give him the subpoena?" But although Dr. Macnamara had not the willingness to deliver the subpoena to Brennan, he thought it right and proper, he being a medical man of that very important institution, which I believe to be in the receipt of a Government grant, to hand over the subpoena of this court, not to the person for whom it was intended, but to the person who is the most interested in this inquiry, and to leave it in the hands of the Respondent in this case, Major Knox. We have not heard of it since. It is a very extraordinary circumstance, that the very moment that the subpoena is delivered Brennan flies, and goes to London, and nothing can be found out about him until the case is opened for the Petitioner. As an act of great candour Mr. Macdonogh says he has made inquiries about Brennan, and "he is happy to be able to say that the witness will appear at two o'clock the following day." Why, he had been all the time in the town; he had been to the "Irish Times" office a week previous, on the Monday, and Mr. Lawder having stated in the most emphatic way that he sought him out by letter, that he did not know where that letter was directed, but that he sent it to his correspondent, it now turns out that this witness had gone to a gentleman in London, Mr. Hoey, at the Stafford Club, and he communicated with Major Knox in Dublin, or Major Knox communicated with his correspondent in London, and in that way his address is found out, and Brennan is here. I know he contradicted almost everything that was sworn against him, but I have not the least hesitation in saying I do not believe one word he swore. He is contradicted by a dozen witnesses; he is contradicted by his own acts. He swore he was not an agent of Major Knox. Now, see the value of that testimony. The very acts and writings of Major Knox, and everything that passed between them, from first to last, demonstrate that he was an agent; yet he comes up and swears he was not an agent of Major Knox.

Well, is there any other agent of Major Knox involved in this case? I will travel now through the matter as rapidly as I can. It is said, "Oh! Mr. Cherry is no agent, you cannot spell out Mr. Cherry's agency." But first I find Mr. Cherry sending away voters from the election, and promising them sums of money in order to induce them to refrain from voting against Major Knox. Take the case of that man Shiels. There is no lawyer who would for a moment suggest that Shiels was not bribed. The offer of a bribe is just as bad as the giving of a bribe; but the distinction does not arise in this case. Cherry offered money, and he gave money; and, moreover, when he was in the box he thought he had made a good point, for he said he had given Shiels even more money than Shiels admitted. He said he was indignant with the conduct of Shiels, and that he thought he had fallen into a trap. Well, all I can say is, if the mouse fell into the trap, the mouse prepared the trap for itself. He fell into the trap! He seeks out this man Shiels. He dwells in every way he can upon his poverty, upon the advantage it would be to him to improve his condition, and how he could do this and that for him. He holds him in the miserable position of having a decree hanging over his head; and the wretched man says: "I expected to be sent to jail, and I said I would go away." He says he owes him 5*l.* 16*s.* He says, "You want some clothes," and he added 1*l.* 5*s.*, and the rest was to be given in some other way. 11*l.* odd was to be given to his family whilst he was away, and an order was to be sent to the firm of Coster, Brodie & Company, in Dublin, for 20*l.*, the money to be given to him on the following Friday. All that is admitted; there is no controversy about it at all; but I venture to say, that if that letter was not forthcoming, the letter to the man in America which was opened by Connolly, the employer of that man Shiels, and if Mr. Coster was not capable of being produced, I venture to say that I would have been asked, as impressively as I was about the other cases, not to believe for a moment that a gentleman in the respectable position of Mr. Cherry could exhibit such insane folly as to deal with a man in that condition in so open and flagrant a manner. But he did deal with him in an open and a flagrant manner, and he is bound to admit it. It is said that it was an infamous thing to open this letter that was intended for America, the letter being a letter of introduction, which is generally left open, and this letter having to be handed by the man himself. Whilst these men are violating the law in every way by their artifices, and by their low and mean devices, and, as I say, in the case of Brennan, backing it by false swearing, they turn round and say,—“You did an ungentlemanly thing in opening that letter.” Some reference was made to a well-known transaction said to have happened in the town of Sligo, at a former election, when certain persons in the town of Sligo were located in a high room in the court-house falsifying the poll-books, and somebody who suspected them, the late Mr. Mostyn, I think, got a ladder and looked in; they complained greatly of his ungentlemanly conduct in looking into what they called a private room. I think the opening of this private letter may rank with that historical fact, and if one was to be condemned so was the other, but very far be it from me to condemn either.

Well, then, what takes place? This man Shiels goes away. He is taken away upon a car provided by Mr. Stokes. Mr. Cherry is the man who arranges the business, but he is said not to be an agent of the sitting Member. But does not Mr. Stokes put up the finishing stroke on the business? and if it is to be said when one man seduces the voter, and another man gets the voter to go away, that the man who gets the voter to go away, and carries him away, may be the agent, but that the other man cannot be the agent, why the whole of these laws against bribery and corruption might go by the board, if such attempts by subdivisions of fraud to escape from the consequences of these acts were to be allowed. Mr. Stokes is proved to be the agent of Major Knox. How is he proved? Out of his own mouth. The exigencies of the Respondent's case drove him to call these persons. I was determined that the case should not go off upon any plea that time did not permit all the witnesses to be called. There has not been a particle of time wasted. I owe every possible thanks to the gentlemen on both sides, for the admirable way in which they have conducted their case. Never have I seen more tact or more discretion shown. Every observation that could be addressed to the court has been addressed to it, but the necessity, the hard necessity, of their case drove the sitting Member's counsel to put into the box Mr. Stokes, and what does Mr. Stokes say? A great deal has been made of this, that Major Knox, the moment he heard of Mr. Stokes committing some improprieties, immediately repudiated them. When was that transaction? I have been able to fix the date. It was the Monday previous to the election. The nomination was on the Tuesday, and the polling was on the Thursday. It was on the Monday that Major Knox went to Mr. Stokes, and what took place? He is informed by Mr. Henry Lyons that Mr. Stokes had been committing some impropriety with a voter named MacTighe. How do I fix that date? Mr. MacTighe proves that Monday is the day he had the interview with Mr. Stokes. Well, what occurs? Major Knox goes to Mr. Stokes. He remonstrates, and what does Mr. Stokes say? Major Knox gives his account of the transaction, and see what it is. He said that Mr. Stokes said, "It had been exaggerated, that the reports about him had been exaggerated." What did Mr. Stokes tell us? That he promised to use his influence in future for the Major moderately. That is just four days before the polling, and the day before the nomination. What does Major Knox reply to that? There was an admission that there was a knowledge in the sitting Member that he had been using his influence improperly. There was an admission by the man himself that he had been doing it improperly, but it had been exaggerated, and there was a promise by him that he would continue to use his influence, but moderately, and what is the reply? Instead of Major Knox saying, "Sir, neither moderately nor immoderately, in no way whatever shall you use your influence for me," Mr. Stokes told us in the witness-box on yesterday, "That Major Knox smiled, or did something equivalent; bowed and smiled, said he was obliged, and went away." That is the strangest way I know of repudiating an agent; the man admitting that he had been acting improperly, and the sitting Member blaming him for it; he then says, "It has been exaggerated; I will use my influence for you, but moderately;" and he is smiled upon, and the sitting Member says that he is obliged. That is Mr. Stokes' version of it, and is he not the agent, then, of Major Knox? If he never was the agent before, is he not the agent then? But, I say, Major Knox's then allowing him, without bonâ fide repudiation, to continue to use his influence for him, was an adoption of his previous acts, as well as an independent authority to go forth as his agent until the final hour of the election, and he is bound by the acts of Mr. Stokes. And what do I find in the acts of Mr. Stokes? He hires the cars; the book of the carowner is put up. The witnesses have the audacity to put it up. The book was handed on to the bench, and that wretched woman who kept it had the audacity to say it was Mr. Starkie that each of those cars was entered to. At a glance I saw—of course the alteration was so clumsy—I saw at once that “Stokes” was written under “Starkie” in each case. At first she denied it. Afterwards she admitted it. The figures were all altered; 1 l. 12 s. had been there for the Bundoran car, the distance of which I plainly understand is 40 miles; and in election times I know they do not charge half-price for return cars; that would be exactly eightpence a mile going and returning. It was proved that the two persons in that car were the two MacMullans, whom Stokes admits now he spirited away in order to further the interests of Major Knox. What more? The car to Manor Hamilton is altered in the same way, and it now stands at the sum of six shillings. I think the other, the 1 l. 12 s. is altered to 10 s., and that alteration Mrs. Buchanan is bound to admit she made herself. And she admits that she altered Stokes into Starkie in each case. With what view? In order to leave no trace or bit of paper in any book or any leaf that could possibly bring home the guilt of these transactions to Mr. Stokes. What more have we about Mr. Stokes? We have the evidence, the unimpeached evidence, of that girl Burke. There is no attempt made to impeach her, having the best possible means of impeaching her, the servant in the lodging of Major Knox. She says that Mr. Stokes was going nearly every day into the house occupied by Major Knox. Major Knox may not have seen him. I may believe that, for the witness says she saw Stokes going up to the rooms in the evening, when Major Knox said he was away, dining out almost every day. But is there anything to show that Brennan was dining out, or that Brennan was not there when Stokes came up there? No. Mr. Stokes is proved to have been there in that very house, going in the mornings, and going in the evenings; and if anything was wanting, it would be found sufficient to connect him with Major Knox for the purpose of this inquiry.

A great deal has been said about Hagerty's rooms. Mr. Stokes is there in Hagerty's rooms. It is a very extraordinary thing that all the persons first visited by Major Knox when he went to Sligo are the persons who turn out in this inquiry to have been most active, both at their own houses and in that house of Hagerty's. Mr. Stokes is there; Cherry is there; Mr. Woods is there; Woods' son is there; Mr. Grubb from Dublin is there, and Balfour, both private personal friends who came down, as Major Knox says he believes, to enjoy the sport of the election. Well, but is there no one to give us an account of the state of Major Knox's rooms except Michael O'Neil? I recollect well, when Feeny was examined here, he was confronted with a Mr. Morison, who, Mr. Macdonogh said, was a young barrister, a friend of Major Knox. Mary Burke says the rooms were taken for Major Knox and Mr. Morison. This young barrister is placed there in front of the witness box when the witness deposed to a conversation in the rooms with Major Knox, and she was asked to look at that gentleman. Was he there? I expected this inquiry would not have closed without producing this Mr. Morison. He was here from beginning to end. The attention of witnesses was called to him, and it led my mind to believe that the gentleman would come up on the table, and contradict what they were swearing. But no attempt was made to bring into the chair that young man, a barrister, knowing his position and responsibility. A special room was taken for him in that house; there is no mistake about that; he sleeps in the same private lodgings with Major Knox in Sligo; he is there during the election; he is a friend, a particular friend Major Knox says, and he is not called on the table to explain, to contradict, or to repudiate any of the charges that were made against his friend, and some of which, I was led to believe, related to circumstances occurring in his presence. But all these persons are at Hagerty's rooms, and there is a guard at the door; and Thomas Leonard says that they were the committee-rooms. There was no committee; Major Knox says they took care to have no committee; I can well believe that. A committee, so called, there was not; but if Cherry, and Woods, and Stokes, and Galbraith, and Woods, junior, and Grubb, and Balfour all met in a room for election business, it is not necessary to constitute a good working committee, that you should emblazon on the doors, “The committee-rooms of Major Knox.”

And there they meet, and there is Major Knox's own agent, his canvasser, his special messenger, Thomas Leonard. It is all very well to say now he is a man of infamous character. Then why was he employed, if he was a man of infamous character? It is all very well for persons to avail themselves of the services of degraded instruments, but it does not lie in their mouth to turn round then and say they are degraded. Here is the list of election expenses, and a sum of money is put down for those men, one of whom is Leonard; and there is this extraordinary circumstance about it too, that that is the only voucher which is in the handwriting of Major Knox. That payment to Thomas Leonard of 5 l. 16 s. is handed in, not as a receipt from the election agent, but, whilst everything else is a regular receipt, this is in Major Knox's own handwriting, describing him as having paid this man 5 l. 16 s. Here it is, “Paid to Leonard, messenger, for himself and other messengers, 5 l. 16 s. That is dated the 16th November 1868. Now, one would have thought it would have been a receipt—“Received from Major Knox,” so and so; but this is, “Paid to a man so much for himself,” and the words run, “and for other messengers, 5 l. 16 s.,” and that is the only piece of writing that is in the handwriting of Major Knox himself, cut out, as it were, for the case. We have heard that there was considerable agitation in the town as to this Leonard's intending to prove, on the hearing of the petition, as to the 5 l. having been given to him as a bribe for Henry, his brother-in-law, but this piece of writing puts the payment to Leonard of the 5 l. upon an entirely different ground, and if it had been a receipt in the writing of Leonard, it would be very satisfactory, but it is as I said, not a receipt, but a memorandum in the writing of Major Knox. But Leonard himself is here; he is the paid agent and messenger; he is guard upon the door, and he is identified as having been present at the committee-rooms.

Now, I come to a portion of this case that is of the most trying difficulty and importance. If I believed or was satisfied that Major Knox knew that Patrick Neilan was a voter, when he directed his family solicitor to provide him with that 20 l., however painful the task would be to me, I should have been unavoidably coerced to find Major Knox guilty of personal bribery. But I am not so satisfied, and upon that slender thread I am enabled, and I am gratified at being enabled, consistently with my duty, not to arrive at that conclusion as regards the case of Patrick Neilan. I must say, however, (because, as I said before, no sympathy can prevail in these cases; if the poor man is denounced and properly spoken of for his acts, others in a higher position ought not, if they deserve censure, to go unscathed) Major Knox had in his possession the means of knowing that he was a voter. How is that proved? It is proved by Mr. Thomas Wilson, the paid manager of the Conservative Registration Society, to which Major Knox contributed in one year, at all events, all that was required over the very small subscriptions contributed by others; and he says he has no doubt that he sent a copy of the Register of 1867, marked C for Catholic, and P for Protestant, to Major Knox, and on that registry appears the name of Patrick Neilan. Beyond doubt, therefore, he had the means of knowing; and it is very fortunate for him that he did not, as he swears, consult that, or that he overlooked it, because if Major Knox had told him he knew that Neilan was a voter, I should have little if any doubt as to how I ought to deal with that case, in which 20 l. was given in charity so called, with a security taken for the amount. But Major Knox has sworn, and I believe him, that he did not know that Neilan was a voter, and consequently, he not knowing that Neilan was a voter, I am willing to arrive at the conclusion, that it has not been proved to my satisfaction that that 20 l. was given by him with the corrupt intent of influencing the vote of Patrick Neilan. But I do not entertain a shadow of a doubt, not the least in the world, that Brennan knew that he was a voter, and that he wrote to Major Knox on his behalf with a view to influencing his vote, and that he brought him into the list with 30 others said to be in the interests of Major Knox, because he knew in his heart that he certainly, and, perhaps, every one of the others, had been corrupted at previous elections. And is it not a remarkable circumstance that Major Knox himself, the representative of that place, uses the contemptuous expression about the electors of the borough of Sligo, that "those elector fellows" were haunting him in the town of Sligo on many occasions for money, and that as many as thirty or forty were soliciting him for bribes. They did not confine their solicitations to individual requests, but they come to him en masse with requisitions, and that he had so many of them at different times, that his table was covered all over with these applications. Presently, when I come to deal with the question how I shall report to the House of Commons, I can have no better voucher for the corruption of Sligo, and my belief that corruption does extensively prevail in that borough, than the sworn testimony of its declared representative.

The next case I come to is the case of Dunlevey. That is a very startling case, too, and a very difficult case to deal with. But, on the whole, I will give my opinion frankly upon it; not only am I not satisfied, but I do not believe the payment of that 10 l. to Mrs. Dunlevey. It is said then I must reject the whole of her testimony; and so I will, every word that is not made as plain as "path to parish church," by other extrinsic testimony; nay, more, by the testimony in the interest of Major Knox himself. Now, she says she went to Mr. Utrid Knox's house where the major was staying, and where he received all these people. And am I to be told that Mr. Utrid Knox is not an agent of his, where he had his room to receive them all in, and where he had frequently, he says, either Mr. Utrid Knox or some other relative to be a witness to these transactions. She deposes to his going into the shop and giving her 10 l. I do not believe that; I may be wrong. I have considered it myself as a jurymen, and I have asked what I, as one of 12, would say; and I have arrived at the conclusion that it is not proved. Of course, if I came to a different conclusion, Major Knox would be guilty of personal bribery. She deposes to other solicitations. She speaks to old Mr. Woods going to solicit her as to her husband's vote, and I confess at first I was rather disposed to come to the conclusion that he was as clear of that transaction as I have now declared Major Knox to be of the other, he told his story so plausibly. He admitted he had interviews with the woman. He owed her 2 s. 6 d. for manure. He is warmed with an intense anxiety that this half-crown should be paid to her. He pays her three visits in succession. He does not see her till the third, and then he has a conversation with her, according to his description, of the most innocent character. She, however, says he promised her money; he swears he did not. But what takes place afterwards? It turns out, which he kept entirely concealed from the court, that Mr. Woods, senior, went down to his friend, Mr. Galbraith, the landlord of this woman, to whom she was indebted in money, and who told her she would not have the house at all, only he left her in it, or was security for the rent. Woods sent her to Mr. Galbraith to get her to write a letter to her husband; they describe it to induce him to come and vote for Major Knox. She does go down, and she finds those two gentlemen, Mr. Galbraith and young Mr. Woods in the room; and they induce her to write this letter. They admit the letter. She writes to her husband:

"Francis,

“Francis, I have arranged matters with friends in Sligo. I am quite satisfied with you to go when you get this letter with the party who brings it to you. Dear Francis, you may be quite satisfied to have all things made right to your satisfaction, so do not come home.” That is the letter they induce her to write to her husband. I care not whether this was dictated or not. She wrote it, they say, of her own accord. According to their showing, it was a letter written to her husband to bring him home. At all events, the letter is written and read, and young Mr. Woods takes it with him. There we have Woods, the father, asking Mr. Galbraith to get her to come and write this letter, Galbraith getting her to do it in his own house; and Woods, the son, taking possession of the letter. Where does he next go to? His next step is to the residence of Major Knox, into whose hands he puts that letter so obtained. Major Knox says he disapproves of it, but tells him to consult Mr. Lawder, his conducting agent, who is in the room, and who makes use of the expression that “he would not touch it with the tongs,” and hands it back. That is his own statement to Mr. Woods, he having full knowledge that young Mr. Woods was operating upon this woman with a view to the vote of her husband, and having got a letter from her, disclosing a promise of reward to induce him to refrain from voting at the election. Mr. Lawder, instead of putting that letter into the fire, or into his pocket, and saying to that man, “Sir, you are doing an act which will imperil the seat of Major Knox, hands it back to him; the young man says he thinks he left it behind them, and that it was never handed back. Major Knox says his cousin took away all the papers that were found to be left behind; and it is afterwards found in the possession of this voter. That communication shows as clearly to me as the daylight, that every one of these three parties were operating for Major Knox, and with the knowledge and consent of his agents. There was no repudiation there. There was an apprehension of consequences; there was a disinclination to be connected with it; but when that letter was handed back, and not retained, it was allowed to be sent upon its mission to produce the desired effect, though a feeble and weak attempt is made, if the letter turned up afterwards, not to be bound by the consequences of the transaction.

Well, then, I say, once for all, that Mr. Woods, Mr. Galbraith, Mr. Woods, junior, Mr. Cherry, Mr. Stokes, and Mr. Brennan, were one and all the agents of Major Knox,—every one of them, and that they were engaged in corrupt practices. That disposes of the case of Dunleavy, and I think it disposes of the personal cases against Major Knox.

There were cases connected with letters written to electors by Major Knox. There is the case of Dominick Kilcullen, and also that of John Henry; they both hover upon the very frontier of corruption, if they do not absolutely overpass it. A promise of any place, reward, or employment, or an offer of it, is distinct bribery, if it is done with the intention to affect an election. What is this letter to Dominick Kilcullen? Here, again, the person receiving the favour is not the applicant, but the candidate is the applicant:—“Dear sir, would you kindly let me know what appointment your son would wish to have, and I will do my best to obtain it for him.” It is not the voter soliciting him. There is no pretence here that Major Knox did not know that Kilcullen was a voter. Brennan had written to him, or spoken to him, he said, on the subject of Kilcullen. It is plain that it is not an answer to an application of Kilcullen, but a solicitation of Major Knox. The letter is dated January 5th, 1868. All I can say about that is, that Major Knox states that he had no intention to corruptly affect the voter, and although the man afterwards goes to his house to thank him for what he has been doing for his son, I am not clearly satisfied that that letter was written with the intention of corruptly influencing the vote of this man Kilcullen, and Major Knox has the benefit of the doubt. So, too, as regards those letters to Henry just at the very moment of the election, one, October 9th, and another, October 31st, as Mr. Palles said, within eighteen days of the election. That the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital were most anxious about his memorial; that they had taken it into their best consideration, and that he had heard of cases where pensions were extended and made permanent; this written to the voter, all I say is, that it comes in the same category; it is a case of gravest difficulty.

But placing myself as nearly as I possibly can in the position of a jury, and asking myself how such minds would be influenced by such transactions, and whether there remains any doubt about the intention, I arrive at the conclusion, not without great hesitation, that on the whole, Major Knox is “not proven” to have been guilty of personal bribery in these transactions; but I come to the conclusion that his agents have been guilty of bribery; that those I have named, and others which I may name in looking over the lists—that several of the voters have been guilty of being bribed; plainly, that man was guilty of bribery who took the money of Mr. Cherry, and the others to whom I have referred.

I shall make up my Report, and certify as to those persons who bribed others, and who have been bribed; I shall declare that the last election for the Borough of Sligo was a void election; that Major Knox was, by his agents, guilty of bribery; that it has not been shown to me that these acts were committed (in the words of the statute) with the knowledge or consent of Major Knox. I shall also report that it has been proved before me, and that I believe, that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed in the Borough of Sligo at the last election; that the grossest intimidation has existed there. I shall put what occurs to my mind upon paper in reporting these circumstances to the House of Commons; and I must also come to the conclusion, as a necessary consequence of my decision, that Major Knox must pay the costs of this petition.

STALYBRIDGE ELECTION.

Stalybridge.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Blackburn, 13 February 1869.

Mr. Justice Blackburn.] In this case the Petition complains of an undue return of the sitting Member on three grounds: those of intimidation and undue influence, bribery, and treating.

I will first mention the case of intimidation, of which some evidence was given, which I stopped when it had gone further, pointing out to Mr. Pope that it did not amount to sufficient to support that charge. I trust that, however, no one will for a moment suppose that the act that was sworn to be done, the attack upon Mr. Buckley, the pelting him, and the pelting his carriage, was at all in itself anything else than both a crime and a folly. I do not think that the fact that the assault was committed in an election time at all mitigates the assault; it rather makes it worse. I need say no more upon that point. I am convinced that those who were parties to that assault must by this time, when their blood is cooled, have become quite aware that they did very wrong; that it was both criminal and foolish to do such a thing. The candidate on the unpopular side is entitled to be allowed to go freely about to canvass, and the minority, if they are a minority, are entitled to have their opinions fairly considered. But in order to avoid an election on the ground of intimidation and undue influence, either it must be shown that the rioting or the violence was instigated by the Member or his agents for whom he is responsible (which in the present case was not attempted), or it must be shown that it was to such an extent as to prevent the election being an entirely free election; and what took place here, at the very least, fell very far short of that. Therefore, upon that point I stopped the case, when Mr. Pope had gone on; and upon that point the case is over; and it must be considered upon that that the seat is not imperilled at all.

Then comes the second head that I will take, and that is the case of treating. Now, upon that the law is tolerably clear as to the treating. By the Act of Parliament, the Corrupt Practices Act, treating is defined thus: "Every candidate at an election who shall corruptly by himself, or by or with any other person, or by any other ways or means on his behalf, at any time, either before, during, or after any election, directly or indirectly, give or provide, or cause to be given or provided, or shall be accessory to the giving or providing, or shall pay wholly or in part any expenses incurred for any meat, drink, entertainment, or provision to or for any person, in order to be elected, or for being elected, or for the purpose of corruptly influencing such person, or any other person, to give, or refrain from giving, his vote at such election, &c., shall be deemed guilty of the offence of treating." That is the definition that the Act gives, and on that definition, I think, there can be little doubt that the whole is governed by the word "corruptly," which (as I have already had occasion to state my opinion) means with the object and intention of doing that which the Act of Parliament intended not to be done for the object and purpose of influencing the election by the giving of meat and drink. That is what I understand to be the meaning of "corruptly." The question whether or no there is corrupt giving of meat and drink must, like every other question of intention, depend upon what was done, and, to a great extent, the extent to which it was done, the manner and way. And therefore it is always a question which must, more or less, be a question of fact, and upon which the tribunal that has to decide it, whether a judge or jury, has to form its own opinion, and may sometimes form an opinion that others think is wrong, sometimes that others think is right. But in that particular point of treating it is a question of intention.

Now, here there is evidence given bearing upon treating proper to be considered. Part of it I will pass by for the present, and I will come to the part where, I am sorry to say, there is a direct conflict of testimony, and on which, considering it as carefully as I can consider it, I can come to no other conclusion than that on the one side or the other there must have been not merely a mistake or colouring of facts, but there must have been a wilful and intentional mis-statement. I can come to no other conclusion at all upon it; I mean as to the facts that were sworn on the one side to have taken place at the "Star Inn" and "Albion," and that were sworn on the other side did not take place.

The case for the Petitioner on that point rested principally, not entirely, upon the evidence of three men, Thomas Johnson, Knott, and Rhodes. Those three men did tell a story, the effect of which was this (there were some discrepancies in minor matters): that they went to the "Star" Inn, that they were to be kept out of the way of the other side, and that whilst there (it was particularly a man Rigby who was mentioned; Johnson, I think, was not present when Rigby came to the "Star" Inn, the other two were), as their story was, Rigby came to the "Star" Inn; he was brought there, that Rigby was taken upstairs into the committee or club-room, where business was going on under the presidency of Callison; that he was introduced by a man who is named Higginbottom as being a Liberal Conservative or a Liberal whom they were to keep from the other side; and in order to induce him to keep there they proceeded to make a mock meeting, at which they put him in the chair and gave him drink, made him make a speech; and, in short, gave him drink to such an extent that he was taken and sent in a cab to the "Albion." And it was sworn distinctly by Knott that Higginbottom did bring him up and thus introduce him; that Charles Johnson, the younger, who was the paid agent of the candidate, was present at the time when that took place; that he approved of it and told them to give him liquor and make him drink; that he would send a cab for him to take him away to the "Albion," where they would take care of him and treat him.

Liberal

Then it was also sworn that at the "Albion" where Rigby unquestionably came, Mr. Bates (who was the head chairman, indeed you might almost say the only person acknowledged to be the committee of Mr. Sidebottom) there saw him; that when he had seen him Mr. Bates came out, and at the door of the inn made a speech to what were called roughs, telling them that they were to bring in votes wherever they could get them anyhow; to strike the cabs, to knock the cab horses in the legs, and knock down the cab horses if they could not otherwise bring them in, and to bring them in anyhow; that there they were to be; that Rigby was there, and that Rigby was made further drunk; and that two Irishmen who were not named, but were described, were brought in and made completely drunk and put aside under the table; that Mr. Bates came in and must have seen them, and that they were pointed out to Charles Johnson as being two that were lying there, and that the red ticket that belonged to one of the Irishmen was shown in order to show that they had got an adversary whom, by giving the drink there, they had prevented from voting.

I need not point out, after having read the words of the section which I have just read, that if that or anything like it be true it would clearly be treating. There can be no question that both Bates and Johnson were agents to the sitting member, and there can be no question that if drink was given to Rigby and these two Irishmen in that way, it must have been done for the purpose of influencing their votes and causing them to vote for Sidebottom, or at least preventing them from voting the other side.

Now upon that was it true or not? The men Johnson and Knott (I do not think it was quite the case with Rhodes), but Johnson and Knott, it appeared, when they had given their information to the other side were taken away from the town, kept away from the town for some time by the petitioners and the petitioners' agents. In that there is no harm in itself, except so far as this, that it shows that the petitioners had no confidence in these men; that they thought they were capable of being seduced and brought to give evidence on the other side, and that they had no confidence in them. So far as that went it would be some slur on their character and position, but no more. But, then, when they were cross-examined about this, and some questions were asked them, both men (Johnson at first, and most markedly, and Knott also) would not tell that they were so taken; Johnson was forced to admit he had gone to Ruabon. He was forced to admit, that he had been paid somehow for going to Ruabon; he would not at all state where it was the money came from, and asserted even that he did not know and could not tell from whence the money came. When he said that, as I indicated at the time, though that by no means proved there was no truth in what he said, it did show that that man was not prepared to fulfil his duty in speaking the whole truth. I could not but feel at once that when he denied that, it shook his testimony very much; I was by no means prepared to say then that his evidence was to be totally rejected, and that no part of it was to be believed; but that here he was, having made a statement which was manifestly on the face of it absurdly false, I came to the conclusion that he was a man who was not scrupulous about truth. Knott's case was in a less degree, but still the same thing; and Knott, it appeared, had been twice convicted of felony, a matter which must of course very much affect the weight one would give to his testimony. Still when it stood on these three men having sworn to all this, and Rigby, who was called, having in his evidence not by any means come up to what they had said had been done, but certainly having led me to the conclusion that he had been on that particular night drinking somewhere—he was drunk anyhow—I thought it was a case fairly requiring an answer, and I certainly did not expect that it was to be answered as they did by denying totally all these statements that were made; I thought it was probable that it was exaggeration; I thought it was probable that a good deal of explanation might be given, but I certainly was not prepared to have the issue come to be directly whether or no this was a positive invention (for a good deal of it, according to the evidence of the respondents, was a positive invention).

First of all, Mr. Bates distinctly swore that the story that was told of his making a speech to the body of the people at the door of the "Albion," and exhorting them to go out and bring in persons, was not true at all. There Johnson swore one way, Mr. Bates swore the other. It appeared on the evidence for the petition that Mr. Bates had been with a party who had seized upon some cabs in a way which, according to the evidence of the cabman, would have been quite consistent with his having given the directions that Johnson said he had given. Mr. Bates explained how that happened; he said it was an isolated act, that he was there, and that he did it. A foolish act it certainly was, because the attack upon the cabs under those circumstances could in no possible way be justified; no defence could have been made if this cabman had brought an action for assault; if any injury had been done to any one there there would have been no defence in a criminal point of view. But it was an isolated act, and though that act, if it stood alone, was a confirmation no doubt making it probable that Johnson spoke truth in saying that there had been such directions given beforehand; yet certainly, on the other hand, that act having been talked about and known beforehand, might afford a basis on which Johnson might have composed what, according to Bates, was a fable, in saying that Mr. Bates made a speech.

There it is a direct conflict of testimony between those two, and I can only say that character must be weighed in the matter, and one must see which is likely to be believed. I cannot pass by this in my mind, that if Johnson's story be true, and Bates did make such a speech to 20 or 25 men, Bates must have come here deliberately to perjure himself, when he knew that at least 20 or 25 men knew that he was perjuring himself. I cannot draw that conclusion, therefore I must come to the conclusion that, as far as that part of Johnson's statement went, it was untrue.

Then we come to the other part of the case. We had the statements that were made of what Charles Johnson said. Charles Johnson directly denies that. We must weigh there the testimony of the two, and see which of the two speaks the truth. I can only say that as to character, as far as it goes, Charles Johnson seems in a better position as to character than they are; and there we must contrast these two, and see whether it is so or not.

Then, further, there is this; we have had called before us (and I was a good deal struck by his testimony, and weighed it a good deal), Callison and the others who were in the "Star" at this time. Now, Callison, according to the story which the petitioners gave, was there presiding over what was in form a committee or meeting, but what in reality was a place where there was drink, and where people were brought in, in order that they might be corrupted with drink; the president, if one might call it so, of a jolly association for the purpose of corrupting the voters on the other side. The case for the respondent was, that Mr. Callison was nothing of the sort; that the meeting at the "Star" was a meeting of a committee of people who volunteered to act for the election, who had selected among themselves persons who were to preside and assist in bringing up the voters; that they were volunteers; voters really and seriously trying to do business in a business-like way, for the purpose of promoting the election, intending that there should be no drink at all; and as far as they could prevent it, preventing there being any drinking with considerable success; and on this particular night Callison distinctly swore (and upon cross-examination he was, I think, utterly mistaken in it), that he was in the upper room doing business in a business-like way; that a little drink was brought, and that Rigby did come up there; but that anything like the statement which was made of his being put in the chair, and being made to make a speech, and having drink given to him, or the like, was quite untrue; that Rigby was there, that he sat there, and became somewhat troublesome, and that he told him to go out of the room. That was quite consistent with what Rigby's evidence amounted to. I have no doubt that Rigby was partially in drink at the time. Certainly, in the cross-examination of Rigby, there was the phrase used, "in the chair," by which, no doubt, counsel meant in the chair of a meeting, as we should use the phrase; but in looking at the way in which it was asked at the time, I do not think Rigby meant more at the time than that he was sitting in a chair. I do not at all blame either counsel; it is one of the misfortunes of these inquiries that, owing to the degree in which it seems to be thought necessary, and in election committees was the practice, to keep secret what is going to happen on either side, people come to the trial unprepared. It could not be known, it was utterly impossible that the respondent's advisers could have known, what Johnson and the others were going to swear, and it was impossible, therefore, that they could have prepared and told counsel how to cross-examine. I cannot blame Mr. Leresche, therefore, for not having asked about this, so as to see that there was no mistake upon it; and at the same time Rigby, when giving his evidence, was not very friendly to Mr. Pope's side, and I cannot blame them much for that; but I think, upon looking at the evidence, that Rigby did not mean to say that he had been in the chair of a meeting. A definite and picturesque account of it was given after Rigby had been examined, and I think when he spoke of his being in the chair, he meant no more than that he was sitting at the time.

Now, here one is obliged to draw the conclusions of fact for oneself, and taking the demeanour of Callison when he gave his evidence, and the way in which he gave it, I certainly did come to the conclusion that he did look like what his side and himself represented him to be, a sober, steady man, who had been selected among his fellow voters who were in the same class as himself, as being a sober, steady man, who might preside over them in matters of business, and keep them in order, and prevent any mischief happening, and that he did not at all look like what the petitioners' side represented him to be, a person who was put there to be the president of a meeting which, under the colour of being a committee, was to be the means of treating persons. Upon that part of the case, I am very sorry that it should be my task and my duty to form an opinion, but I am obliged to say that there must have been, as far as I can see, not merely exaggeration or simple mistakes, but that there must have been deliberate falsehood on one side or the other; and I come to the conclusion that the falsehood was on the side of those who were supporting the petitioners' case. Consequently, as far as that goes (as to which there is no doubt whatever upon the law), I come to the conclusion it was not true that there was any attempt either at the "Albion," or at the "Star," by means of drink, to give Rigby, or these two Irishmen, whose names are unknown, meat and drink for the purpose of affecting the way of their voting, which, unquestionably, would have been treating.

Still treating is not done; and I now come to the rest of the evidence bearing on that point.

Stalybridge.

point. I think it is very clear that the sitting Member's friends (he himself took no particular part in the act) did agree with the people in Dukinfield (that is where the evidence principally went, but I presume that it was the same in Stalybridge too) that committee-rooms should be appointed in different districts, and they were obliged to take them at public-houses or beer-houses for the purpose; that rooms should be taken, and that there the voters who constituted committees for the purpose of influencing the election, and for bringing up voters, should meet, should assist in bringing up to the poll the voters who had been already asked to vote; and I think that the sitting Member, or his agents, it appears clearly enough, did go round to these different rooms, and the people to whom the houses belonged were paid for the rooms, sums of money which were probably handsome for the rooms. Then it was said that it was understood that in paying for the rooms, and under colour of paying for the rooms, they were also to pay for drink and refreshment provided at the time. To some extent that was understood, I have very little doubt, by some of the people from whom the rooms were taken. Some of those keepers of the public-houses understood that, being paid handsomely for the rooms, they were also to furnish some drink. I do not think it appears that that was the intention on the part of the sitting Member or his agents; it may have been or it may not; I do not think that that, however, appears to have been their intention. Then I think that it appears pretty plainly too, that there was a desire on the part of the head men, captains of the different inns, that there should be no drink. Callison's evidence (whom I again mention merely as a type of what the others were) was that he exhorted them very strongly to have no drink at all, and for a very sensible reason which he gave, that their committee being in the district where it appears that the other side was the strongest if there was any drink, if any of their people got drink there would pretty certainly be a riot and a disturbance. Callison says he exhorted them to have no drink at all, and they all agreed to that; he says also, that though that was his exhortation, and that was what he wished should be done, he was not able to succeed in doing it. I am not surprised at that at all; I have very little doubt that it was broken through, and that drink was obtained to some extent; but I have no doubt at all there was a sincere attempt to prevent there being drink, and that it was so successful that there was not any considerable quantity of drink at the time; had there been it is probable that there might have been such matters, and such disturbances as would have gone very far to vitiate the election. As it is I do not doubt that some of the subordinate members of the committees, some of the people who went (as Rhodes states he did) to have their names put down to assist them, were in the hope and expectation that they might probably be paid in money, but that they certainly would be paid in having liquor and drink. I have no doubt that several of them did come with that expectation; I do not think, however, that there is anything to show that there was any drink supplied by Mr. Sidebottom's agents, or by Mr. Sidebottom's people for the purpose of influencing the votes. I come to the conclusion that the story told upon the part of the respondent is substantially true, that these committees really were self-constituted bodies, volunteers among the voters for the time in the district, who selected their own leaders; call them captains or lieutenants (it matters not what name they were called) under whom and under whose directions they were to act, and that there was the intention and desire to have as little drink as possible, and that to a very considerable extent they were successful in that.

That being so, I cannot come to the conclusion that there was anything that amounted to the furnishing of drink with a corrupt intention, the furnishing of drink with the object and intention of influencing the votes, or influencing the election thereby; that being so, the question of treating fails.

We then come to a far more difficult question, as far as I am concerned, and that is the question of bribery. Now on that there seems to be no doubt upon the facts that there were several men who were working men, and who would have voted for Mr. Sidebottom, but did not like at all that they should, by coming to vote for Mr. Sidebottom, give up their day's work, and, consequently, the day's wages. They did not like to be at a loss; and there seems to be equally little doubt upon the evidence that several persons (Travis, I think, was one who was named; Thornley, who was called as a witness, is another) who were acting and assisting Mr. Sidebottom; men under the impression that it was probable that those who did come and vote would have their wages allowed. Now I must, first of all, point out that, in my opinion (and I do not think there can be much doubt about it) the law is clearly settled by the Corrupt Practices Act, and I think it was so before. In defining what is bribery, the first section says: "Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, give, lend, or agree to give or lend, or shall offer, promise, or promise to procure, or to endeavour to procure, any money or valuable consideration, to or for any voter, or to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any other person, in order to induce any voter to vote, or refrain from voting," shall be guilty of bribery. Now, under that, I do not think there can be any doubt at all that a promise or offer to cause a workman or other person to be no loser by his coming to vote (for instance, that if he will come and vote for Mr. Sidebottom he shall not lose his day's work, that he shall be paid his day's wages for the holiday whilst he votes for Mr. Sidebottom, instead of having his day's wages as he would if he stayed away from voting and did full work) comes within the meaning of the Act, and is an act of bribery and corruption. That much I can entertain no doubt about. There may be some doubt about what Travis is said to have done; but I can entertain no doubt upon this evidence, that Thornley and Aaron

Stalybridge.

Vaughan, when they went to Manchester and Gorton for the two men, did distinctly offer them and promise to them that they should have their day's wages paid them if they would come and vote; consequently I cannot doubt that that did amount to an act of corruption and bribery on the part of the voters who accepted it, and on the part of Thornley and Aaron Vaughan, who offered it. That I cannot doubt. It is not the kind of bribery which has the meanness that exists in selling a vote and making a profit for selling the vote. I can perfectly suppose and believe that a man may say, "I will make no profit by voting, but I will be at no loss;" and, therefore, that he may say, "I wish to be indemnified against any loss from my vote," and may think that he has not done anything very wrong; and it is certainly not mean in the way in which selling a vote for money would be, but, at the same time, it does come distinctly within the Act, and is an Act of corruption and bribery.

Then comes the question which I have had the greatest difficulty in trying to make up my mind upon: whether or no, that act being done by Thornley and Vaughan, Thornley and Vaughan were so situated with regard to the sitting Member that their corrupt act should invalidate the election. And that is a point on which it is of very general consequence that the law should be distinctly and well understood; and I am sorry to say that I have not been able, after the best consideration that I can give to this branch of the law, to come to anything very definite in my own views, or to ascertain the views of others. To a certain extent, I take it, the law is clear enough. The parliamentary practice in elections, beginning from early times, always was, that a Member was not merely to lose his seat on account of bribery committed by himself personally, or which he personally did, but that he also was to lose his seat when he was guilty of bribery by his agents. The reason of that was obvious enough. Candidates put forward agents to act for them; and if it were permitted that these agents should play foul, and that the candidate should have all the benefit of their foul play without being at all responsible in the way of his losing his seat, if the foul play was committed by the agents without the candidate having precisely known it, great mischief would arise in that way. Then again, one cannot at all shut one's eyes to the fact that, to a very great extent, when corrupt practices were committed, they were committed by persons who carefully abstained from letting the sitting Member know precisely what they were going to do. They were in such a position that they could act, and act actively, and spend money, and yet the sitting Member might be carefully kept in ignorance that they were spending money; but afterwards, when it was all over, and when it was too late to petition the House of Commons (the law is somewhat altered now, and there may be a petition sent in at a later time), they would come to the Member and say, "Of course I never let you know that I was spending this money, but you have had all the benefit of it, and, consequently, you are bound in honour to pay me, and to let me be no loser by what you have had the benefit of, but to recoup me for the expense which I have incurred." In that way there was a great deal of corruption. I do not doubt that these two principal grounds led to what was, undoubtedly, the practice of the Election Committees of the House of Commons, that it was not sufficient to say that the Member himself was not guilty of corrupt practices, or did not know of them, but that his seat was lost if he was guilty by his agent.

And that law, which was established by what one may almost call the Common Law of Parliament, is recognised, in my opinion, by the Legislature in the Corrupt Practices Act. In section 36 of that Act it is enacted, that "if any candidate at an election for any county, city, or borough shall be declared by any Election Committee" (it is now the Election Judge) "guilty by himself or his agents of bribery, treating, or undue influence at such election, such candidate shall be incapable of being elected or sitting in Parliament for such county, city, or borough during the Parliament then in existence. That section clearly indicates that the Legislature sanctioned the decisions of the House of Commons, by which a Member, guilty by his agents of treating, or any other corrupt practice, was incapable of sitting, and making a distinction between his being guilty by his agents only and being guilty personally. And the more recent Act of Parliament having put upon the Member who is shown to be guilty personally of bribery or corrupt practices a much more extensive punishment, having made him liable to a very much greater extent when he is personally shown to be guilty of these matters, and provided that he shall be no longer capable of holding a judicial office, no longer capable of sitting in Parliament for any place, no longer capable of being a justice of the peace, and so forth. When it puts that severe punishment upon a person personally guilty, it clearly shows that there is a distinction whether the man is personally guilty or whether he is guilty by his agents. Without any personal guilt, if he has by his agents been guilty of corruption, then the seat is vacated, and the Member can no longer sit for that place during that Parliament.

Now comes the question, which is one of very great difficulty indeed, what is the definition of agency? What is the relation between the sitting Member and the person guilty of a corrupt practice that shall constitute agency, so as to make the sitting Member responsible for it? On that the decision of the Election Committees, so far as I have been able to look at them, do not assist me at all. That tribunal from the way in which it was constituted, did not give reasons for any of their decisions. I find, on looking at the election reports, frequent cases in which there was a doubt whether or no an act of corruption committed by a particular person was an act by the agent, and I find it difficult, in reading the election reports, to know what the facts were. Many of them were cases in which there would be raised a sort of doubt whether the corrupt act was done by an agent or not. All that the election reports enable me to say is this, that in such cases there was almost always a division of opinion in the Committee. Sometimes the majority was one way, sometimes the majority was the other way. Why the Election Committees came to the conclusion that there was agency or that there was not agency, the reports do not enable me to say, and we cannot tell upon what principle they acted. Consequently, we are left in the dark there, except to say this, that the question what was agency was a matter on which there was difference of opinion. The mode in which these matters are to be decided is now altered, and I think all we can do (as far as I perceive it is all we can do) in order to get the law into a satisfactory state, is to proceed on the same principle and in the same way on which the common law has been formed. Sometimes it has been called, as a term of opprobrium, "judge-made law;" but the way in which the common law has been formed is this: each judge has from time to time, as each case arose, decided the particular point which came before him according to the best of his views, and explained or stated the principle on which he decided that particular question. When that decision has been made it has been known and considered by others afterwards. Where the decision has been satisfactory, where the principle has been satisfactory, and is adopted by others, it has become a land-mark, and has fixed the laws, as far as it goes. Where the decisions have not been satisfactory, or are not thought to be satisfactory (and as judges are men, of course it need not be said that there must frequently be cases in which there is an error made by a judge), they are not followed, but they are eliminated, and after a time, by taking the decisions made in this way, we do get a code and a principle upon which we can act. At present, unfortunately, in the election trials, we are without the aid of that. Every man must, as cases arise before him, come to a decision as he best may in each particular case.

I have already, in the Bewdley case, had occasion to decide this much. There it appears that the sitting Member had put a sum of money into the hands of his agent, and that he exercised no supervision over the way in which that agent was spending that money; that he had given him directions, and I thought really intended, that none of that money should be improperly spent, but that he had accredited and trusted the agent, and left him the power of spending the money, and I came to the conclusion upon that, that there was such an agency established as that the sitting Member was responsible to the fullest extent, not only for what that agent might do, but for what all the people whom that agent employed might do; in short, making that agent, as far as that matter was concerned, himself, and being responsible for his acts. I see no reason to doubt at all that that is perfectly correct.

Now we come further than this. Of course here it clearly is not the case that these men who went and asked the voters to come and vote, were agents to that extent. But this much is clear, that the mere act of taking the committee rooms amounts to evidence that leaves me no doubt at all about this, that the sitting Member and the sitting Member's people did request the volunteer committees (as I may call them) there to bring up voters when they could; and, consequently, I think that there was this much, that the persons who, joining these volunteer committees, went and fetched voters, were in one sense employed by the sitting Member to bring the voters up. It is upon that, which certainly was the fact here, that Mr. Pope rested his argument upon the case yesterday. He laid it down as a proposition of law, a definite one enough, and clear, that wherever the sitting Member or the sitting Member's agents, for whom he was responsible, had employed a person to obtain a vote, though they meant him to obtain it honestly, yet if he did corruptly that which they intended him to do incorruptly, still they must take the consequences. That I think was the proposition which he put, and to a very considerable extent I am inclined to agree to that. Without absolutely saying that that is the law in all respects, I think it goes a great way towards assisting me in deciding the matter. I think that nearly the same thing had been quoted in the Windsor case by Mr. Justice Willes, not deciding anything in particular, but stating the general position that a person employed to canvass and get a vote, was an agent for whom the other must be to that extent responsible.

As a general proposition and as a general rule, that would go a great way towards saying who is an agent, but I do not think that one can take it to be an absolute hard and fast rule, on which you can say, that wherever a case of corruption could be brought home to a person who was within this limit, the seat should be vacated. I think that the effect of that would be to say, that wherever there were volunteers, who were acting at all, and whose voluntary acting was not repudiated by the Member or his agents; wherever in fact a person came forward at an election, and said, "I will act for you and endeavour to assist you," and the candidate or candidate's agent said (as probably they would in most cases say), "I am very much obliged to you indeed, sir;" wherever that was the case, any corrupt act, or anything improper by that volunteer, although unconnected with the Member, would, if the proposition which has been enunciated is to be taken to the full extent, vacate the seat and render the election void. Now, I cannot but think, that to lay down any hard and fast rules of that sort, would work a great deal of injury and injustice at times. My own impression is, that at present I cannot go further, than to say, that each case must be considered upon the whole facts taken together; and it must be determined in that way, whether the relation between the person guilty of the corrupt practice and the Member was such as to make the latter fairly responsible for it.

In bringing that into consideration, it seems to me, at present, that the judge who has to decide the case ought to bear in mind the reason of the rule which I have already explained. He must remember the objects and reasons for which, as I conceive, the rule was established, that the sitting Member must be responsible for his agent's unauthorised acts, if the agent was one who was put forward by him, so that he might have the benefit of his foul play, or was one who was authorised by him to act in a way which would give him, by receiving money which he might dispose of, uncontrolled agency. Bearing in mind these matters, then, I think that the judge must in each case say what was the relation made out between the parties. I certainly do not think that it is at all necessary that there should be any paid agency to make the Member responsible for what the person has done. I quite think that if Mr. Bates, for instance, had been shown to have been guilty of corruption in any way, he would have been an agent for whom Mr. Sidebottom would have been so far responsible as to lose his seat, because Bates was clearly credited by him to act for him generally. And I think that many of these volunteer agents, who were heads of committees, might or might not be so far connected with Mr. Sidebottom, as that he would be responsible for them. When a case of that sort arises, I would decide it upon the particular occasion. I have already intimated that I think it very desirable to adhere to the rule of deciding each case as it arises, when it must be more carefully and deliberately considered upon the point, in order to decide that much and no more; and I wish only to guard against being supposed to say that there might not have been an agency on their part if they had been corrupt. But here I am satisfied upon the evidence that the persons who were at the head of the committee-rooms were not parties offering this payment of wages. I think it comes to this, that the gentleman who was at the head of the St. Mark's school-room committee, Mr. Nield, might probably, if he himself had been guilty of corruption (I do not say certainly) have been so far connected with Mr. Sidebottom that Mr. Sidebottom would have been responsible for that. But Nield never meant, so far as I can perceive upon the evidence, and I see no reason to doubt, that Nield never meant that they should offer to pay the wages. I do not think that there was any sanction or consent given by anybody to the offer of Thornley and Vaughan. Both Thornley and Vaughan thought, I have no doubt about it, that the claim to be paid wages was so very equitable according to their view of the matter (I have already expressed my opinion, that it was clearly illegal, though it would not be mean), that probably the wages would be paid by Mr. Sidebottom or by Mr. Sidebottom's people; and that being so, I think they volunteered the statement, and they carried it further (for I think they did go further) and positively assured the men that they would be paid.

But then comes the question, were the two messengers sent by Mr. Nield, to see if they could persuade these men to come and vote, so connected with Mr. Sidebottom as to be agents, for whose corrupt acts Mr. Sidebottom would be responsible? I have already intimated that, according to my view of the matter, it is necessary to consider the reasons of the rule, and the objects of the rule, and to take the case as it stands altogether, and see if it does amount to that. If I were to lay down the rule that such an act of agency as this, an improper act of such a person, would vacate the election, I do not see that any one could be safe in ever standing at any election, without providing that every canvasser and every person engaged in the election should be his own dependent, over whom he would have complete control. I think there is a great risk in all cases that corruption would be concealed and hidden under things of that sort. Wherever it does appear that there is any ground to suspect that there is any corruption of that sort, I need not say that it would be a strong case; and whenever it appears that the things are numerously done, it would go very far to show that the agents did come within that principle which I think the law is founded upon; that they would be persons the benefit of whose foul play the Member was to get, and therefore it would be right that he should forfeit his seat in consequence. But in such a case as this, where I am convinced that they were real bonâ fide volunteers, voters acting for themselves, not selected by the Member or chosen by him at all, but really bonâ fide, in a business-like way, the voters of the district choosing sober and respectable men, in whom they had confidence, to be the head of their own department, and acting together, a messenger who was sent by one of them is not so directly connected with the sitting Member, or any of his recognised agents, as to make him responsible for his misconduct in offering a bribe.

The consequence is, that I come to the conclusion that there was some modified act of bribery on the part of these two men. I do not come to the conclusion that these two men, in doing it, were such agents as to make the sitting Member responsible. And consequently, I come to the conclusion, that bribery is not so brought home to the sitting Member as to imperil his seat.

These are all the points which are really raised. Some other acts of agency were relied on; but this is the strongest. I think what I have said upon this will sufficiently indicate the reasons upon which I proceed in the others. And the consequence is, that I must hold the election good, as there is no reason why it should be taken out of the general rule. I must consequently make the Petitioners pay the costs.

TAMWORTH ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Willes, 15 February 1869.

Tamworth.

Mr. Justice Willes.] This was a petition praying that the election of Sir Robert Peel and Sir Henry Bulwer respectively to represent this borough in Parliament should be declared to be void upon several grounds: Alleged bribery by the candidates, or one of them, or their or his agents; alleged treating, and alleged intimidation in the same terms. At the trial no attempt was made to trace any of these alleged corrupt practices to Sir Henry Bulwer personally. Evidence was given, which, it was insisted, made out that Sir Robert Peel was personally guilty of bribery. It was also rather insinuated than asserted that upon the evidence, taken as a whole, Sir Robert Peel ought to be considered to have known of and adopted certain alleged corrupt acts of his land agent, Mr. Carmichael, and to be held responsible for them either as personal acts by his recognition or acts of his agent, for which he is in point of law responsible. It was also asserted, and evidence was tendered to establish, that Sir Henry Bulwer was guilty either of the acts of bribery and intimidation attributed to Sir Robert Peel, by himself and his agent, Mr. Carmichael, by reason of an alleged association between the two, making each of them the agent of the other, or that, at all events, he was responsible in respect of bribery committed by his agents, or treating committed by his agents.

I must deal with each of those allegations in order, and perhaps it will be more convenient to commence with those which personally affect Sir Robert Peel. In doing so I feel no difficulty as to the principles of law upon which to act. It has been alleged that there is great difficulty in the principles to be sought by the judge who is to decide the question. I observe none. The judge has been even exhorted to take, in respect both of the law and the facts, what has been called a broad and wide view of the questions which have been presented to him, in the event, I suppose, of his mind not being able to arrive at and to state any precise rule of action. As wide as the stars, if you please, so long as there is firm ground to tread upon and light to see by; but if it is meant by a sort of exhortation which for the first time was addressed to my mind, in this case, that if, for instance, the question was whether the London coach, when the London coach ran, was horsed with five horses or with four, and witnesses were to be called who saw it, and who swore that there were four, and some of them would not swear but that there might have been five, and others would not swear but that persons had told them that there were or might have been five; and then it were added to that, that those who were to resist the affirmative proposition that there were five and not four might have called hundreds of people who did see the coach, and might have proved that they did see five, and that they were guilty of a suppression of evidence by not calling the people who, it was suggested, could prove that there were not five if there were not five, and that therefore the court was to be asked upon a broad and wide view to extend the ordinary rule of two and two make four into two and two may possibly make, and therefore ought to be held to make, five, I must treat an appeal which is capable of being exposed in its absurdity when reduced in its application to a question of ordinary fact, with disregard.

Now, what is the true and broad principle applicable in point of substantive law to the case? I shall presently state, when I come to that portion of the evidence upon which the greatest conflict arises, those true and broad principles of reasoning upon amount of proof which have been acted upon in my experience now during a somewhat long period upon the Bench, and have hitherto been principles appealed to by the bar. The principle of substantive law is, and it is a very simple one, that for the preservation of the purity and freedom of elections, the member returned shall be answerable, not only for his own acts, but for the acts of his agent, whom he puts in his place to represent him in the conduct of the election. It is unnecessary, after the luminous discussions of that principle, and especially one that has lately appeared, and which, probably, many of you have read, by my Brother Blackburn, to enlarge upon it. It will be sufficient to dismiss it with an illustration, an illustration, it is true, not involving the constitutional principle which makes the chief value of the rule, but which will at once show its good sense and its justice. If a race were to take place between two vessels for a prize, and the steersman aboard one of those vessels was to thwart his opponent by declining to give way to the vessel that had a right to keep her wind; or if one of the crew hoisted an extra sail not allowed by the rules of the race, and the vessel aboard which that foul play took place was to come in first, the owner could not claim the prize, even by showing that he was away, that he had nothing to do with the misconduct of his servants, or even that he forbade them to be guilty of such misconduct; nor could he mend his position by showing that if no such misconduct had taken place his vessel would, nevertheless, have been sure to come in first. It is clear, therefore, that if Sir Robert Peel, with his 300 and more majority, and a fortiori if Sir Henry Bulwer, with his much less majority, should appear, either of them, by himself, or his agent, to have been guilty of bribery, treating, or undue influence, in the way of intimidation or otherwise, the election must be declared void.

Tamworth.

Now, with respect to Sir Robert Peel, it is alleged that he was guilty of bribery. I do not quite understand the way in which that gentleman has been dealt with on the present occasion. I should imagine that if it was intended seriously to ask me to disbelieve him upon his oath in a part of the case to which I shall presently refer, that it would have been alleged that he was guilty of perjury, and that he would have been treated in the course of the inquiry in the remarks made upon him, and in the tone in which he was addressed as a man who really was believed to be guilty of such misconduct by the persons who accused him, and I can conceive that some of the indignities of tone and manner which were addressed to Mr. Carmichael would have been transferred to his employer, Sir Robert Peel.

Let me proceed, however, to discuss the facts upon which my judgment ought to be founded. It is alleged that Sir Robert Peel personally bribed a Mrs. Archer, the wife of a voter, who gave his vote at the election against Sir Robert Peel's wishes. The bribe is alleged to have been paid upon the night of the nomination. It was dark, to be sure, and wet, just a time that a person would choose for concealment of an illegal act. Sir Robert Peel does not even appear to have given his name until he was pressed for it; he took with him a person who did not give his name at all. Sir Robert Peel had not even the directness to pay the money out of his own pocket, or with his own hand, but was generous at the expense of the unnamed individual who went with him, and then and there, having committed the alleged act of bribery, which was wholly unnecessary in his interest, he went off to the next door, and, in order to conceal the fact that he had bribed Mrs. Archer with five shillings, gave ten shillings to a poor woman in distress, for the purpose of taking her to Birmingham. Let suspicions which have been appealed to upon other parts of the case exercise themselves upon this view, and let them arrive at the conclusion that bribery was committed, or that a bribe was intended, and let these suspicions, having done their worst upon this part of the case, remain subject to the contempt of everybody who has judgment to decide upon their merits. Take the other side of the case; Sir Robert Peel gets a list of persons whose names it is desirable he should have in order to canvass them, he feeling anxious because of the introduction of the new voters into the constituency, because he had the fear, or the anxiety, that he might possibly find himself in a minority. He went at the time when working men are usually canvassed with effect, because they are away during the day, and probably may be found at home during the evening. We get rid of one circumstance of suspicion, the night. He finds a poor woman about to be confined, with several children in a place which was badly repaired, one of his houses which he would naturally be bound, so far as he could by himself or his competent agent, to look after in the fair discharge of his duty towards the tenants who were under him. A complaint was made by that woman; she complained of pain and distress, and she mentioned the fact that she was about to be confined, and she wished him to come up and see for himself the state in which the place was. It was raining at the time, which would add some weight to her complaint that the roof was insufficient. I believe that the true explanation of the variance between the statement and Mrs. Archer, and the statement of Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Sansom as to the character of her complaints is, that she was thinking of one thing and they were thinking of another. I do not believe that she intended to beg; I think she intended to complain of being in a state of wretchedness, because the covering of the roof was insufficient; but I believe also, that Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Sansom understood her in another sense, and that when she complained of her want and suffering, Sir Robert Peel is quite sincere when he says he thought she wanted a blanket. He said, "I cannot give you a blanket." Knowing his position as a candidate, he said, I cannot do it, and seeing one of the children looking wretched, he said, I wish I could give some money. "Have you (Sansom) any money you can give to this poor woman or this child." She says they canvassed for Sir Henry Bulwer. Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Sansom say they did not. I believe she has been talking it over, as a great many other witnesses in the case have been talking over the matter, with her neighbours, till she believes the design imputed to Sir Robert Peel was really in his mind, and that he did go there to bribe her for Sir Henry Bulwer. I believe that she believes it. After the remarks I have made, I will not offer my common sense the insult of inquiring of it whether I believe it; I will answer at once, I do not. I think the petition upon that evidence against Sir Robert Peel was wholly unwarrantable, and I think the charge is as groundless (I will say no more) as any of so grave a character that ever was brought forward against any man in a court of justice.

Now, I proceed to discuss the question whether Sir Robert Peel, by his agents, is proved to have been guilty of bribery or undue influence. Each of those crimes was charged against Mr. Carmichael. Had I anticipated, when Mr. Carmichael was put into the box, what afterwards clearly turned out to be the case, namely, that he was no election agent of Sir Robert Peel for the purpose of the election, I should have endeavoured to spare the waste of public time which unquestionably has taken place in the long, pointed, personal, angry attack that was made against this person, Mr. Carmichael. I could not, however, anticipate that before I had heard the case. I believe that in an ordinary inquiry the petitioners would have been advised, and would have been compelled to act upon that advice, that there was no ground for making out that Mr. Carmichael was, in a sense to make Sir Robert Peel responsible, his election agent; that they would have been advised that Mr. Carmichael might be spared what he has been exposed to; which I cannot for his sake regret now he has been exposed to, because it has only tended to confirm the opinion opinion as to his character, which I shall express presently, and we should all have been spared the loss of nearly a day. Mr. Carmichael was the land agent of Sir Robert Peel; he was placed in an exceedingly disagreeable position; he had to manage one of the most troublesome and disagreeable of all species of property—property in small houses; a property of which I speak sincerely when I say that I would not accept it as a present from Sir Robert Peel at this moment, with the trouble and certain annoyance and vexation and litigation which would be likely to spring from it, and with the constant charges by persons who are sure to take part, probably some from generous sympathy, with any poor people who say that they are oppressed, and found upon their complaints some further charge of cruelty against the landlord. Mr. Carmichael was employed by Sir Robert Peel to manage that description of property in Fazeley and elsewhere. It requires, in consequence of the smallness of the amounts dealt with, a very methodical head. It requires rigid exactness, on the part of the agent, in order to do justice to his employer, and it requires great temper and great discrimination in order to be able to bear with the sorrows of those who are really suffering, to whom indulgence may be fairly extended; and to detect the practices and contrivances of those who occupy the property of others without paying regularly for it, or without using it well. That is the sort of task which Mr. Carmichael had to perform. It is said, that in the performance of that task he took unfair advantages to an extent reprehensible in the highest degree, and deserving of all the vehement attacks that have been made upon him upon the supposition that his misconduct was proved, and even of penal treatment if any single portion of the alleged misconduct had been established. One of the cases which was opened by the learned Counsel for the petition, as being of importance as affecting Mr. Carmichael, was that of a person, I think, named Richardson. It is true that this case was treated lightly in the end, and that it was put aside, as it were, the counsel for the petitioners saying, “Pay no attention to Richardson’s case; there is nothing in that; let us proceed to the others.” What is the meaning of that? An opening of a case, in which a person is charged with an offence of the gravest magnitude, coupled with other offences of a similar kind, founded upon similar evidence, deliberately brought forward at the opening, and not maintained at the reply; then to be shuffled aside, and the attention of the tribunal directed away from it and no weight to be attached to what has occurred! Far otherwise. This is one of a series of mis-statements and exaggerations of a gross character, which the learned Counsel for the petitioners was instructed (because, unless he was instructed, he would not have done so) to put forward, and which not only has not been sustained by the evidence produced, but, like many other statements which he was also instructed to make, has been negatived by the evidence, and then withdrawn. But can it be withdrawn from the mind of any person of impartiality and good sense, sitting down to judge whether this petition is founded upon real grounds, or whether it is only founded on suspicion and prejudice, and whether, with respect to Mr. Carmichael, what has happened as to him is really not so much an attack upon Sir Robert Peel through the side of Mr. Carmichael, as an attack upon Mr. Carmichael through the side of Sir Robert Peel. This Richardson said that he was promised, first of all by Pearson (who was a mere messenger), and whom he did not know to have married his wife’s mother—a likely story! And he (Richardson) alleges that Mr. Carmichael bribed him by stating that he should have the “Stone Cross” and the osier bed, if he voted for Sir Henry Bulwer. Is that true? It is admittedly not, but it is provedly not, because he alleged the presence of Mr. Shaw at one of the conversations, and he is contradicted not only by Mr. Carmichael, but by one of the few persons connected with the respondents, whom the instructions of the learned Counsel for the petitioners allowed of his admitting to be a respectable man.

The rest of the evidence affecting Mr. Carmichael points to the exercise of undue influence, and if that undue influence had been established by the evidence, I agree that (I think the word “infamy” was the word used) the infamy which attaches to those who grind the faces of the poor would justly attach to Mr. Carmichael, and in some sense to the gentleman who would in that case have had the misfortune of employing him. What is the evidence? Let me first take the case of the 21 houses without which, I presume, this charge would never have been advanced. The case of the 21 houses was this: Mr. Tolson held those houses as a weekly tenant under Sir Robert Peel. Sir Robert Peel, who appears to have gained some knowledge of the effects of the system of middlemen, was desirous to get rid of Mr. Tolson, a gentleman apparently of the highest respectability, and whose conduct in the course of the election has done him credit. He was desirous to get rid of him, not because he voted for Mr. John Peel, but because he was a middleman between Sir Robert Peel and the immediate occupiers of the place. Is that true? It looked not so until the evidence of Mr. Carmichael came; but Mr. Carmichael went through a series of statements, all admitting of being checked and contradicted, and to which no cross-examination of any consequence was addressed, proving that the dealing with the 21 houses was not for the purpose of the election, but that it was a dealing forming part of a large ordinary arrangement for the distribution of Sir Robert Peel’s property of similar kind, and that, taken as a whole, that arrangement was not fairly chargeable with the criminal sort of favouritism which was attributed in respect of the 21. Moreover, witness after witness connected with those 21 houses being examined proved no threat whatever of Mr. Carmichael; Mr. Tolson, the immediate tenant of Sir Robert Peel, proved no threat from Mr. Carmichael, no interference with him, and no attempt to make him interfere with his tenants. And Mr. Carmichael, the deep designing man that he is described, not having made use of any threats before the election to those tenants, did what? It is said he communicated to other persons from whom the intelligence would be sure to spread like wildfire to those tenants, that they would be turned out if they did not vote for Sir Henry Bulwer. Eloquence is admirable, and imagination is beautiful; but when you come to check the assertions of eloquence and the visions of imagination by the actual facts themselves, you expect that some attempt will be made to make the facts fit the assertions: not one single witness of those who were called from the 21 houses was asked whether he had heard anything of what is alleged to have been said to the Tittertons, and the Palletts, and the Clarkes. I leave out Walker, because in his case there was no threat pretended, and there was no notice whatever given to him until after the election. I am rather pleased by the indication upon that subject; I am rather pleased with the notion that it would be sure, if it had taken place, to spread like wildfire, and especially to spread like wildfire amongst the neighbours; and in this class, I have been endeavouring to consider what is the just conclusion and the just use to make of that suggestion, and I cannot help thinking that it is this: If those threats were made they would have spread like wildfire, and they would have been heard by one or two of those 21 people who were evicted from Tolson's. On the other hand, if those threats did not spread like wildfire, and did not spread at all, and did not come to the knowledge of any one of those 21 people, very likely they were threats which have been worked up in the fancies of those who said they were made since the election, and did not exist before, or they would have been communicated. The latter does appear to me to be, in point of reasoning, a sounder process than the former.

There is another remark to be made with respect to those 21 houses. Again, the designing Mr. Carmichael having plotted the intimidation which was to spread from the one, or two, or three, to whom it was made, to the 21 to whom it was not made, having plotted that for the purpose of getting in Sir Henry Bulwer, having succeeded in getting in his candidate, Sir Henry Bulwer, by means of this and other arts, which at another part of the case I was called upon to imagine existed, suddenly took it into his head to destroy the effect of the plot which he had hatched, and all he had accomplished; because whilst a petition must have been suspected and was possible, and I have no doubt was expected, upon the 30th of November, a week and more before the time for presenting the petition expired, and at a time when to take the course he did would add colour, if not, as it is said, foundation to the Petitioners' case, he proceeded to give his notice of the 30th of November to Mr. Tolson; why I must not only hold Mr. Carmichael to be an oppressor, as he is called, I must not only hold him to be a knave in respect of Sir Robert Peel, and an oppressor in respect of these people, but I must also come to the conclusion that he is a fool. I cannot do that; I believe that the charge against Mr. Carmichael, in respect of these 21 houses, explained by the evidence, the details of which it would be wearisome to go over, but from which I have drawn the conclusion I have already stated, is as groundless almost as the charge of bribery against Sir Robert Peel. I say "almost," because it may be that the Petitioners honestly believed the one; but I cannot think they believed that any judge could come to the conclusion of the truth of the other.

Now I come to the cases in which specific evidence is said to have been given. Specific evidence is said to have been given in the case of a Mrs. Titterton, James Pallett, Alfred Walker, and James Clark, confirmed, as it is alleged, by his wife Mrs. Clark. With respect to Mrs. Titterton, I pass her over with this remark: her evidence is in direct conflict with that of Mr. Carmichael; I must believe one or the other, and I am bound to say which I believe, and in testing their respective credibility I have nothing to assist me except the probabilities of the case. The first and perhaps the main improbability upon the side of her story is this: that Mr. Carmichael, for the sake of advancing the interests of Sir Henry Bulwer, said, in the instance of these people, and these people only (because of course every piece of evidence of this sort which exists has been ransacked, and every witness that could give any proof upon the subject or anything like proof upon the subject has been produced), that he limited his operations in this way, and that he just contrived to commit as much corruption as should endanger Sir Robert Peel without very much advancing the case of Sir Henry Bulwer, and which, in fact, did not advance his case, because it does not appear to have procured him a single vote.

The second is this: the same remark as has already been made as to the 21 houses, the fact that he should have defeated his own alleged plot by an immediate proclamation of it to the world, in turning out the people, and turning them out with angry feelings against him, which would induce them to fling themselves into the arms of Sir Robert Peel's opponents. There is another circumstance which ought not to be overlooked; there was a cause for turning out Mrs. Titterton, partly apparent upon her own evidence, where she admitted that she threatened, in language somewhat forcible, to break the legs of her neighbours for venturing to come into the house, as Mrs. Titterton chose to suggest, to make mischief between a man and his wife. There is this further circumstance, that upon the 20th of November, which would be perhaps some three or four days after the election, a letter was written to Sir Robert Peel (not to Mr. Carmichael) by a neighbour, complaining of Mrs. Titterton's conduct, and requesting that she should be obliged to leave, and she afterwards was obliged to leave. Now that letter has two aspects; the aspect in which it is put upon the part of the Petitioners is as part of the plot invented by Mr. Carmichael or by some person in his office, and placed before the tenant who sent it to sign in order to make proof that what Mr. Carmichael had done in the way of threat, and was going to do in the way of eviction, really was attributable to some other cause besides the desire to intimidate and to punish. That letter which Mr. Carmichael it is suggested so concocted as part of his wicked scheme, is addressed to Sir Robert Peel, the landlord. This is why I said, and I repeat it, that it is impossible to separate Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Carmichael in this matter. Let the proper person, the superior who ought to be answerable in the first instance, be struck at boldly if he is struck at at all. I believe that this suggestion is ridiculously groundless, unless Mr. Carmichael had a plot to which Sir Robert Peel was a party, and did not care to call his attention to the case of those tenants, because he knew that he had previously got him upon his side, and induced him to authorise the course of action which he is alleged to have pursued towards them. Testing this case, therefore, by every test which can be applied to it, apart from the question whether Titterton or Carmichael ought to be believed, I should pronounce that the story of Mrs. Titterton was a fabrication, and I am now satisfied that it was so.

The next was the case of Pallett. He is a person, apparently, not of stable mind. He appears, if I recollect rightly, to have been upon the committee of Mr. John Peel, and to have voted for Sir Robert Peel; a person, therefore, upon whom Mr. Carmichael's plot in favour of Sir Henry Bulwer had the singular effect of inducing him to vote for a person whom he did not intend to vote for, and not the person whom Mr. Carmichael is said to have intended him to vote for. His statement of what was said to him was a very ambiguous one; it did not amount to a threat to him, but it seemed rather to be an indirect statement that if some other person in the neighbourhood, whose name does not at this moment occur to my mind, took the course of getting rid of his tenants because they would not comply with his wishes, the same must be done by Mr. Carmichael. That Mr. Carmichael denies.

The next is Walker, and with respect to him no threat whatever was made. He must have said there was before he got into the box, because he was called to prove that there was. He must have informed those who instructed the Counsel for the petition that there was a threat. This is a test of the way in which such stories are got up; because when he was put in the box and exposed to examination he wholly failed, and proved no threat whatsoever.

Then there is the case of the Clarkes, who say that Mr. Carmichael used, amongst other words, to induce them to vote for Sir Henry Bulwer, that expression that "they would rue it," using, they say, offensive terms in describing Mr. Peel, which are doubtless wholly inapplicable. They say that he said that they would repent it, or that they would rue it, if they did not vote for Sir Henry Bulwer. Here I am obliged to decide upon a bare comparison of the testimony of the Clarkes and the testimony of Mr. Carmichael. Clarke was so indignant at what had taken place, that he says, in respect of that statement being made to himself and wife, not that he was turned out, but that he himself gave notice. I must decide upon what I believe to be the character of Mr. Carmichael's evidence, and the character of the evidence given by the Clarkes. I am obliged to say, point blank, which I believe. I have no hesitation in saying that I believe Mr. Carmichael. If I were to apply the test which the Counsel in reply admonished me was the proper one to apply to another part of the case, namely, to learn all from one, I am so satisfied as to one or more, that I the more readily adopt the same conclusion in respect to this one. I believe these persons have been talking over the matter together till that feeling and that capacity for crime which they wished to believe existed in the mind of Mr. Carmichael has been worked up, first into the belief that it already existed, next that it was expressed, and, lastly, that it was expressed in the terms in which they first thought it would have been expressed if it was expressed, and believe that it was expressed now, in which case their evidence, however, to be rejected in a court of justice, may have some colour or gloss of excuse for them; but, in any case, such evidence would be wholly insufficient to establish the case against Mr. Carmichael.

Now I will make a remark, and dismiss this case with it. Mr. Carmichael was the land agent of Sir Robert Peel. Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Carmichael have both stated that he was forbidden to interfere in election matters, and that he did not interfere in election matters for Sir Robert Peel. It is alleged that he interfered for Sir Henry Bulwer, and that he did so, Sir Robert Peel looking on, and therefore that he bound them both. Glancing at the petition, I find that that was not the view which could have been entertained in respect of this matter by those who advised the Petitioners, because there is no charge whatsoever in the petition, of intimidation against Sir Henry Bulwer, either directly or through an agent. The intimidation was charged against Sir Robert Peel only; the intimidation suggested is an intimidation which would affect Mr. Carmichael and Sir Henry Bulwer through him, if Mr. Carmichael were his agent; but Mr. Carmichael was not an agent for Sir Henry Bulwer. He was a land agent, and not an election agent, for Sir Robert Peel. He was not an agent, in any sense, for Sir Henry Bulwer, and I might have contented myself, in point of law, by stating these latter facts, which clearly show that the whole of the evidence introduced with respect to Mr. Carmichael was irrelevant, and could not have arrived, in any view of the case, however unfavourable to him, at any useful end for the Petitioners; and I think I am furnished with a clue by this consideration, to the reason for that which hurt and offended me at the time more than anything that I remember to have taken place for years in my presence whilst I have sat upon the bench; that is the manner and the tone of unmerited indignity which were applied to that witness, Mr. Carmichael. Allow that his position obliges him to be strict, and his duty to be so; and allow, if you will, that he, like others whom I have known coming from the same part of the country, is somewhat cold, and hard, and angular, in matters of business. I am not to judge of his moral character, but I have known such men, and I have known them not only as truthful but as kindly as those* who could gloze, and who could be lax in matters of fact and figures, which he has not been; and I could believe of him, though it is no part of my business to judge, that upon proper occasions he can be as tender as he showed himself in this court to be patient and truthful. It would have been shabby on my part, after the attack—quite undeserved, in my opinion—which Mr. Carmichael bore with dignity, and entirely defeated, if I had failed to express an opinion upon the character of that person; probably he cares little what others think of him, especially for an expression which, in some respects, is extra-judicial; but, if it be any satisfaction to him or his friends, he leaves this court, so far as I am concerned, with the character of a trustworthy witness.

Now I proceed to consider the next topic, and this is one in respect of which it has been said that the case of Sir Robert Peel and the case of Sir Henry Bulwer are especially identical. It was sought to be made out that they were identical from the beginning; it was said that, at all events, they were identical, and to some extent they were, after the 4th of November (or perhaps after the 26th of October), when Sir Robert Peel appears to have commenced to take active measures for the purpose of securing the interest of the new voters. I shall shortly dismiss that subject. I must make some remarks upon it; because, notwithstanding the failure of proof, which was singularly obvious to any observant mind in the course of the case, it was insisted upon in the reply, at least as strongly as any of the other topics which have been urged upon the Court, that there was a joint action, amounting to mutual agency, on the part of Sir Robert Peel and Sir Henry Bulwer. Let us take the measure of the evidence to establish it: they proceeded jointly, they were jointly represented at the register. True, everybody now knows the importance of attending to the register, and everybody also knows the importance of combining at the register the forces of those who represent one side in politics likely to be affected by the result; and I have no doubt, from the notice that has been produced, and also from the probability of the thing, that Sir Robert Peel and Sir Henry Bulwer anticipated the contest which was to take place; Sir Robert Peel wishing well to Sir Henry Bulwer from beginning to end, being satisfied with his coming forward, and desiring that he should be returned with him, but not at his expense, did unite with him in taking care that the register was properly framed, and their interests attended to—that registration would take place about September. September went by, then October, and then came November. In the course of that period these gentlemen appear to have pursued different courses. Sir Robert Peel did not employ any person to come down from London and make speeches and inquiries on his behalf. Sir Henry Bulwer employed a gentleman named Haley; Sir Robert Peel did not employ Mr. Shaw before the 4th of November. Sir Robert Peel did employ Mr. Neville, in whose room Mr. Shaw succeeded on the 4th of November. Sir Henry Bulwer did employ Mr. Shaw early in August, I think the first week in August, and Sir Henry Bulwer did not employ Mr. Neville. There was no person who could be suggested as having been employed by Sir Robert Peel. It has been denied by Sir Robert Peel; he was not cross-examined upon this point, though charges were made against him upon others. There was no person appointed by Sir Robert Peel to represent him, except Mr. Neville, up to the 4th of November. Baraclough was appointed for Sir Henry Bulwer in a capacity which I must deal with presently. Soon after Mr. Haley came down, and before Mr. Shaw was appointed, witness after witness asserted that at the meetings that were held previous to that 4th of November, after which these candidates unquestionably had the same agent, Mr. Shaw—I decline to call him a common agent for the present—witness after witness was called who said he was present at meetings that were held in favour of Sir Robert Peel and Sir Henry Bulwer. Is that true? Certainly not; they were people who acted upon mere rumour; they were people who in that respect gave evidence which is unquestionably exaggerated. Meetings were held up to a certain point, and I take it, up to the first meeting that Sir Robert Peel attended, which, I think was certainly not earlier than the 26th of October, meetings were held in the interest of Sir Henry Bulwer only, and local committees were formed to get in Sir Henry Bulwer. Baraclough, the person employed for Sir Henry Bulwer, went round; he was not seen by Sir Robert Peel. Those witnesses, therefore, are mistaken; they speak in that respect upon rumour or belief, and the evidence they give, instead of establishing a joint action with Sir Robert Peel, against the clear testimony of the leading facts to which I have referred, rather shows that their evidence ought to be scrupulously criticised in other points of view. There was a reason why Sir Robert Peel did not join with Sir Henry Bulwer. He was himself sure of success. He did become anxious, and he did become alarmed, shortly before the poll, and why? I could easily imagine, as was suggested in the course of the case, and some people even thought, that Sir Henry Bulwer might come in first. I could quite understand that, although Sir Robert Peel may have thought he would come in as the favourite if no foreign horse were brought into the course, Sir Henry Bulwer might possibly get the advantage of him amongst the new voters, in consequence of the organized system which certainly was resorted to to get in the new voters, in the country districts, for Sir

Henry

* N.B. As I understand I was supposed to apply these remarks personally, I think it right to state here that I was speaking generally of the class land-agents, of which I have known good and bad, and that I did not refer to anyone connected with the Petition, whether as counsel, agent, or party.

Henry Bulwer. That explains what appears strange at first, and was commented on as strange and almost incredible in the evidence of Sir Robert Peel. He had a reason for getting anxious, and when he got anxious he then proceeded to do, to some extent, what Sir Henry Bulwer had been doing before, and what, so far as I can judge from the accounts, Mr. John Peel did not resort to, or resorted to more sparingly than either of them. Baraclough was employed by Sir Henry Bulwer. Why Sir Henry Bulwer should have selected Baraclough, if he was the person who selected him, as his agent, it is difficult to divine. I suppose that Sir Henry Bulwer coming here unknown anticipated that it would be necessary to resort to the system to which I have referred, and to introduce himself at various rooms throughout the district (other rooms than those of public-houses if he could find them, which he tried to do, but in most instances failed to find), the large rooms which are usually to be found at public-houses only in the sort of neighbourhood in which Sir Henry Bulwer spoke, if he were obliged to resort to that mode of having the opportunity of bringing himself before the public, and I suppose that Baraclough being a person who himself kept a house of the description in which it might be necessary to hold meetings, was recommended to Sir Henry Bulwer by somebody else, and that it was not upon the principle of opposites coalescing, to which at first (being myself rather a man of books than of the world) I felt inclined to impute it, that Baraclough and Sir Henry Bulwer found themselves in company. Baraclough was not engaged by Sir Robert Peel, and Baraclough does not appear to have come into contact with Sir Robert Peel till after the election; and if the circumstance of Baraclough applying to Sir Robert Peel for the money to pay the 130 men, and Sir Robert Peel complying with his application, had not been introduced in evidence, I should have said there was no case against Sir Robert Peel to establish the affirmative of Baraclough representing him as agent. I must now deal with that piece of evidence as it has presented itself. Baraclough was stated in the opening to be an agent of Sir Robert Peel, the consequence of that joint system for destroying the independence of the borough. I wish to put it in the mildest form; perhaps I do not put it in the exact language; I am sure I do not put it in any language stronger than that in which it was asserted, which assertion has not been proved. He was first alleged to be the agent of Sir Robert Peel in consequence of association between that gentleman and Sir Henry Bulwer. Upon that, the evidence has wholly failed. Following the track in which I commenced, endeavouring to illustrate the law of agency, I think I may say (I am bound to speak clearly, and I will do so if I can) that Sir Robert Peel and Sir Henry Bulwer were no more answerable for the acts of their respective agents, in the position of Baraclough as regards Sir Henry Bulwer, than, if they were sailing in their respective vessels in company or under convoy, would each be answerable for the damage that was done by a collision occasioned by the negligence of the crew aboard the other's vessel. That is the broad principle of law. I shall endeavour to adopt and act upon the broad principles of law which justly apply to the facts that have been proved before me. It is a broad principle of law, that no man should be answerable for the act of another, except to the extent of the authority he has given him, or that he has allowed him to assume, or in respect of liabilities attached by the policy of the law to certain agencies in which it is thought well, for the benefit of the public, that the agent should be considered to represent his principal, whether he has actual authority from him or not, provided only he has an appointment as an agent. The rule applies, and none of the exceptions, to the present case. What was the effect of what took place between Baraclough and Sir Robert Peel? It is said, in the reply, that that made Baraclough the agent of Sir Robert Peel, by adoption. Well, I can conceive that a man may be made the agent of another by adoption. If, for instance, Sir Robert Peel were to adopt the act of Mr. Carmichael, in distraining for double rent, on those two occasions on which that remedy was resorted to, knowing what was done, he would become liable, even though he had not authorised it at the time; because it was an act which was done in his name, the character of which he was aware of at the time of the ratification. I put that by way of illustration, because, with respect to those distresses, they do not fall within my province to decide upon, as they are under the consideration of another tribunal, before which I have no doubt justice will be done; and if a mistake has been made in point of law, in resorting to double distress, which is only permitted by law in respect of a perverse holding over by a tenant against his landlord, the tenant will recover; and I heartily wish he may, if in the right, recover, and with ample damages. I refer to it as an illustration of the law of agency, by which a man may become answerable for the act of his agent, the act of a person who was not his authorised agent at the time, but who has done something in his name which he afterwards thinks proper to adopt. The rule is plain that a ratification after the act is equivalent to an authority given at the time. The rule is also plain as limited to the case in which the principal, the person sought to be made liable as principal, is acquainted with the character of the act at the time when he ratifies. Sir Robert Peel, in consenting that the men employed by Baraclough should be paid, and paid out of his money, did what would be a sufficient adoption of the act, provided Sir Robert Peel at the time was acquainted with the character of the act. Was he acquainted with the character of the act? He swears himself that he was not. He had employed, not Baraclough, but his agent, Mr. Shaw, who was also agent for Sir Henry Bulwer. Baraclough, acting for Sir Henry Bulwer, complained of the hostile feeling against him, and desired to be protected against an anticipated attack. Mr. Shaw and Baraclough described that as being a statement that a few men would be required. I think the authority given by Mr. Shaw was abused to a very gross extent by Baraclough, in getting the 130 men, but I believe that Mr. Shaw was as astonished as a man could be when he learnt that abuse, after the election was over. I am satisfied that Sir Robert Peel did not know of it. He says he did not. Mr. Shaw stated that he gave express directions not to employ voters. Sir Robert Peel says that he gave the authority for payment, under the supposition that the men had been employed, and without knowing anything of the details, and without knowing that voters had been employed. Mr. Carmichael, who made the payment on the part of Sir Robert Peel, expressed that which I presume Mr. Shaw also felt, astonishment when he was informed by Baraclough that Sir Robert Peel had authorised the payment of the 130 men for his protection, and the protection of the voters in the course of the election. But Mr. Carmichael paid because he was satisfied that Baraclough had the authority from Sir Robert Peel. Mr. Carmichael states that he did not know that there were any voters amongst them. The conclusion, therefore, is clear, not only upon the evidence given by Sir Robert Peel, but also looking at the support which that evidence has received from the circumstances to which I have referred, that Sir Robert Peel was not acquainted with the illegality of the act of Baraclough, if it was illegal at the time when he did the act, which would, if he were so acquainted, have amounted to a ratification, and that his case, therefore, does not fall within the rule of agency by adoption.

So much for the opening of a partnership in the shape of an association between those gentlemen, as it were to coerce or cajole this constituency into adopting the nominee of Sir Robert Peel. So much for the alleged agency of Baraclough by adoption. I need hardly say to those who have attended to the remarks which it has been my duty to make, in disposing of this most important case, I need hardly say to those who have followed with intelligence those remarks, that this disposes mostly, if not altogether of the case, as regards Sir Robert Peel.

I proceed to consider the case as affecting Sir Henry Bulwer; and with respect to that I think it is not improper to say, that I believe that but for the existence of this case, and the evidence which has been offered in support of it, Sir Robert Peel never would, and never could, have been subjected to the ordeal through which he is called upon to pass upon this occasion. Every assertion throughout the case has been, not that Sir Robert Peel got in by an unfair advantage over Mr. John Peel, but that Sir Robert Peel, being sure to get in by an overwhelming majority, was determined to get in some other person who was to be his nominee, and who, if that term means anything, was to be his creature, to be under his influence and to do his bidding. I have not the honour of Sir Henry Bulwer's acquaintance; those who know him will be able to say how probable that may be. I have no sufficient knowledge of his character to be able, if indeed it would be pertinent, to pronounce any judgment upon it. Suffice it to say, that any such case, however vehemently it may have been asserted upon expected evidence, which has wholly failed, is not such as to satisfy any candid or impartial or rational mind.

As for Sir Henry Bulwer, his case may be divided into two heads: first, as affecting the employment of the 130 men who were employed by Baraclough on the day of the election. It appears that either the day before the nomination, or the day of the nomination; I think it must have been the day of the nomination, because that was Monday, if I recollect rightly, there having been certain collisions between the parties; though with the exception of one broken head amongst the 130 persons who have been called such various names in the course of the inquiry, and by-the-bye, what took place at the accident when the floor came down, I think at the "White Lion," I have not heard of any injury to any of Her Majesty's subjects during the course of the election. However, there had been collisions, and there had been assaults, or what were called assaults, which were taken before the magistrates, and which they appear, I think, to have disposed of by telling the parties on both sides to go about their business, and to conduct themselves as peaceable people for the future. But there was, or was alleged to be expected, a force at the election, in respect of which Baraclough asked to have some men to protect him and to protect the voters.

Now I must deal with this first, in point of law, and afterwards in point of fact. It is not illegal for private individuals to employ persons to prevent a breach of the peace. It is a most dangerous practice, and one that ought rarely, if ever, to be resorted to. Even if the three policemen only, who at first (upon the evidence given by the Petitioners under a misapprehension, no doubt suggested, I think, upon a question of mine not at all untruthfully upon the part of the Petitioners, or the police) appeared to have been the only persons upon the scene, even if they only had been present, great blame would have attached to the authorities; great blame would attach to the authorities, and great blame would attach to the candidates who sought to supplement the law by engaging a force so large upon either side, that if a similar force was engaged upon the other, collisions were almost sure to take place, the peace almost sure to be broken in consequence of the awkward means which had been adopted to preserve it; but there would be no bribery in employing persons who were not voters. I think it would have thrown a suspicion upon the character of the election; it would have thrown a suspicion, as the employment of these 130 men threw, and even now to a certain extent throws, a strong suspicion upon the character of the election, so far as the conduct of one of the parties engaged in it was concerned, even if there had not been a single voter amongst them. And I must, in stating that (in the absence of violence or intimidation) it would not have been illegal, say that for the misconduct of every one of those those men, any person who presumed to appoint for himself a number of persons whom he called private police, or by whatever other name he might designate them, would be answerable as their master, they being his servants. Possibly this may tend to deter any person of substance from resorting to such an expedient for the future. Happily the question of actionable liability has not arisen, because these, and whatever other persons may have been employed by other candidates, if any, turned out to be "most quiet constables," and with the exception of one of them getting his head broken no great harm appears to have resulted from their employment; it is in respect of there having been voters amongst them that the difficulty arises.

The law with respect to the employment of voters has been discussed in a great variety of cases which have come before Election Committees; I think it right, as this is the first case in which I have had to decide upon such a question as is raised here, to refer to some of the decisions by name, in order that those who may have to deal with the amendment of the law, if any amendment of it is to follow as the result of these inquiries, may be informed of what has taken place, and what is likely to be the view of those who sit here. The cases in which the employment of voters has been considered are the Leicester case in 1st Power, Rodwell and Dew, page 178, where the principle laid down by the Committee was that the colourable employment of voters under the pretext of giving them wages for services which were not rendered is bribery; that the colourable employment of voters for the purpose of inducing them, or enticing them, to give their votes for the candidate who employs them is bribery. The next case on that side of the question is that of Oxford in Wolferston and Dew, page 109, which took place in 1857, and the Hull case in Wolferston and Bristowe, page 87, which took place in 1859. On the other hand, there is a list of cases in which Committees have refused to come to the conclusion that the employment was colourable upon various grounds, in some of which the services, though not rendered, were expected by the candidate or his agent to be rendered, and the intention to bribe was negatived by the circumstance, that though no service was rendered by reason of the misconduct of the voters employed, service was contemplated by the candidate or his agent, and so the intention to employ by way of bribery, or as a colour and a cloak, was negatived. The cases having that tendency are, first, the Cambridge case in Wolferston and Dew, pages 23 and 41, which took place in the year 1868, and which is remarkable amongst the cases before modern election committees for a reasoned judgment pronounced by the then member for the county of Cork, Mr. Deasy, now one of the Barons of the Exchequer of Ireland, a gentleman of the highest business capacity, and the soundest knowledge of law, and in that case he pointed out the reasons (which are more or less applicable to the employment of the voters here) for withholding a decision of the Committee (upon the principle of the Leicester case, which, however, it recognised) adverse to the case of the sitting Member. There is then the case of Lambeth, in Wolferston and Dew, page 129, where the Committee also had the advantage of being presided over by a gentleman of great experience and acknowledged worth, respected by every member of the profession who has had the happiness to form his acquaintance, and sound in his views both of business and of law; that gentleman was Mr. Robert Ingham, the member for South Shields. There the Committee had to perform a very delicate task, because in the Borough of Lambeth, to which their decision applied, there was adopted an organized system of local committees and paid canvassers, treating was charged but not proved, the bribery which it was sought to put in its place, and which I take leave to say, notwithstanding the eloquent preferences which have been asserted for that crime, in point of magnitude, to treating, is in my mind at least as bad. The bribery which was alleged to have taken place consisted in the payments of members of the committees, voters who were selected as paid canvassers in the borough. Some of the small tradesmen gave their services gratuitously, other voters were employed who would not give their services gratuitously, and received various sums which it was alleged were bribes, their services being colourable. The Committee decided that that system of organized canvassing, whatever abuses it might lead to, and they are many, though accompanied by the payment of the canvassers, which might be bribery, was, under the circumstances, legitimate, and did not defeat the election, though payments were made to the voters who were employed in the course of the system. I refer particularly to those latter cases, because of the importance which attaches to them for the reasons I have stated. Then there is the case of Preston, in Wolferston and Bristowe, page 76, in the year 1859, where the Committee had again to consider the subject of paid canvassers, and though they reported to the House that the system of paid canvassers was, as it unquestionably, in my mind, is objectionable, yet they declined, as in the Lambeth case, to set aside the election, on the ground of the system having been resorted to. These cases throw cross lights upon the question of the employment of the 130 men, and also upon the case of treating, because, substituting treating for bribery, and bearing in mind that the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, directs that the judge sitting here shall act upon the principles upon which Election Committees acted, where he has no light from the rules which his own professional experience supplies him with, substituting bribery for treating, those cases throw light upon the treating, so far as it is properly to be referred to refreshments supplied to committee men engaged in the local committees, and they throw light upon the case of the employment of the 130 men so far as the number consisted of voters.

Now I must proceed to deal with the facts, and I must remember that the principle to be acted upon may be represented by this question: Was the employment of those 130 men a colourable device to cover bribery, or is it to be referred to motives and to springs of action other than an intention to procure votes? Here I am brought more closely into contact with Baraclough, and I must state my view of the sort of evidence which he gave. Baraclough was represented to the court by one of the learned counsel for the Respondents, and I am deeply indebted to both the learned counsel of the Respondents for the manner and the matter of their addresses to me upon Saturday evening. One of those learned counsel would represent Baraclough as a knave. I leave out the adjectives. Another would designate him as a patriot, and certainly they had the disadvantage which advocates to a certain extent, representing the same side, must necessarily have when they differ in their views of a fact of some little consequence to ascertain the exact proportions of. It does not seem to have occurred to either of those gentlemen that though a knave is very unlikely to be a patriot, yet that it is possible that a patriot may be a little of a knave. Having said this much, I think it right at once to add of Baraclough, whom I shall treat with all the respect which is due to him, whatever that may be, taking a reasonable view of his conduct in the transaction, that I do not adopt either the one view or the other. It appears to me that Baraclough is a man of considerable activity of mind, possibly with intelligence somewhat superior to that of the generality of his fellow-workmen, who seem to make him a sort of centre. It may be not quite so superior as he may represent to himself, if I may judge from the way in which he began to give his evidence, which certainly made an unfavourable impression upon me, but which was removed towards the end. His superiority, I think, was not of so high an order as he would be inclined to raise it in his own mind; but he is a man who, for one cause or other, certainly exercises a great deal of influence amongst the body of working men, especially one class of them mentioned in the course of the inquiry; a person who, in consequence of those qualifications, was employed for the purpose of regularly organising the system of local committees for the added voters, and as it were accidentally and upon the occasion to employ some few men to protect himself, which few men were magnified to the number of 130. Why did Baraclough employ those 130 men? for that is the question to be inquired into. I believe that Baraclough employed those 130 men because he desired to gain popularity for himself, and because he desired to make a handle of their employment for the purpose of gaining favour amongst the class to which the men belonged. I believe that he did it for the purpose of making capital for himself, and I believe that in doing that he acted unfaithfully to his employer. I believe that he gave no notion to Mr. Shaw; he certainly gave none to anybody employed on the part of the Members, nor was there any means of discovering until after the election; he gave no notice that he was going to engage this multitude. They were utterly useless, and could be of no benefit to either of the candidates, so far as 101 of them were concerned, because they were not voters; their names have been given, the names of the 101, as well as the 29 who were voters, and it has not been suggested that anyone of them was a person of influence with voters or likely to bring one in. It is inevitable to conclude, therefore, that this person, Baraclough, whatever may be his qualifications, good or evil, in respect of the other portions of his employment, did, in employing those men, what was not to the advantage of his employer, what was not to the advantage of Sir Henry Bulwer; on the contrary, what has redounded in strong suspicion and some degree of discredit to the cause on the side of which those men were employed; and if after the strictest scrutiny of the evidence with respect to them, after carefully examining the list, and going through the register and the canvass book, I had arrived at the conclusion that the intention of employing those 130 men, was to engage one voter to vote for Sir Henry Bulwer, who would otherwise have voted for Mr. John Peel, I should have said this election is void. Ought I to arrive or to have arrived at that conclusion? Of those 130 men, to begin with, 101 were not voters at all, and they are not shown to have been in a position to influence voters; 19 of them voted according to promise for Sir Robert Peel and Sir Henry Bulwer; 10 who were voters and had promised Sir Robert Peel and Sir Henry Bulwer, did not vote at all; one who had promised Sir Robert Peel and Sir Henry Bulwer voted for Sir Robert Peel and Mr. John Peel; and one, Allsop, who had promised Mr. John Peel, voted for Sir Robert Peel and Sir Henry Bulwer. I ought to mention, that the 19 who voted for Sir Robert Peel and Sir Henry Bulwer, were persons all of whom had promised to vote in that way, and that the only one therefore who is shown upon the part of Mr. John Peel to have promised him and voted the other way, is the person Allsop. Of course, there was an opportunity of showing if anybody else had been influenced in a similar way. That opportunity has not been taken advantage of, and I cannot assume that it could have been taken advantage of. The question, therefore, is reduced in reasoning to this: Am I to conclude that for the sake of securing this one person, Allsop, all the other 129 men were employed? Before I answer that question, I must refer to another fact; five of those persons were called as witnesses for the Petitioner, and no one of them says that he was asked to vote against the party for whom he had previously decided to vote. Circumstance the first. Many of them stated that they were employed to do nothing. To begin with one of them; I think Farnsworth first stated one thing and then another. Several of them, upon being pressed, admitted that they attended at the poll-booths; that they had brought up voters; that they had made way for voters. It is quite obvious, therefore, that those persons have been called as witnesses before the court, who felt most favourably towards Mr. John Peel, or rather (I ought not to introduce Mr. John Peel's name so) towards the Petitioner's tioner's view, and who have given the best and the worst evidence for the one party and the other, of which they were capable. Now, let me place this question in another way. How stands the account? £. 64 was charged for these nondescripts in the accounts. Assuming that the 28 voters only had been employed, I think even with the force of police which we learn really was present at the election, it would hardly have been said there was no object in having some such persons present for clearing the way for the voters to come up to the polling-booth, but of course the evidence, though it would have been less in point of amount, would also have been less diluted, for there would have been a removal of the 101 parts of water which go to make up the 130 of the mixture. But following that up by a reference to the figures, what is the state of things with reference to the employment of people of the description of messengers in the accounts of the respective candidates? I must turn first to Mr. John Peel's account, which I have before me. I find a charge in that account of posting and delivering bills, journeys, &c. (messengers, I presume) 79*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.* Then I find for clerks and other persons (which I do not add to the 79*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.* because the "other persons" have nothing to do with this matter), a charge of 72*l.* 5*s.* Turning next to Sir Robert Peel's account, I find a charge, independent of the 64*l.*, of, I think, 21*l.*; for messengers and booths, 7*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*; messengers during the canvass and election, 14*l.* 10*s.*; 21*l.* in Sir Robert Peel's account as compared with 79*l.* in Mr. John Peel's account. Nobody has suggested that Mr. John Peel has been guilty of any illegal practice at this election. I am quite sure, in the heat of the proceedings, if he had been, something must have oozed out, showing he had done wrong; but if I were to compare the accounts and to decide this matter by figures, of which it is said you may make anything if you try, I should draw a very unfavourable conclusion, which is quite foreign to my mind at present, comparing the accounts of Sir Robert Peel and Mr. John Peel. But now, coming to compare each of them with the account of Sir Henry Bulwer, apart from the 64*l.*, I find the sum of 53*l.* 16*s.* in Sir Henry Bulwer's account, which amount includes clerks, those persons being, as I have already mentioned, included in the second item of 72*l.* 5*s.* of Mr. John Peel's account, which I rejected. I certainly cannot, either from any knowledge of my own, or from any experience of the character of this election that I can gain from the figures appearing in the respective accounts, come to the conclusion that the 64*l.* spent upon those people was spent by way of profusion and show, to attract voters by its glitter; and for the reasons which I have referred to, I come to the conclusion that it was an unauthorized act, done by Baraclough, for the purpose of obtaining popularity for himself, and that it was not either in respect of the question of law, or upon the established facts, an act which I can designate as having been bribery. I must leave it, however, by saying this, that it is an act in the course of this case that has weighed most heavily on my mind, which, so far as I judicially can, I reprehend and condemn, and which if I thought it had been done by Baraclough, with any view to advancing the interests of his employer, or, if I believed even that it had advanced the interests of his employer so that I must impute the intention to do that which was the natural consequence of the act, I must have held this election to be void. If such practices are resorted to, those on whose behalf they are committed must take the consequences of a less favourable conclusion where the circumstances do not allow of, or rather, I should say, do not call for, that at which my mind has arrived.

There remains to be dealt with, that portion of the case to which the greater part of the evidence has been directed, which again, though not given to view circumstances which come before me in any other than a dry way, certainly would furnish to any person who was to decide upon a simply moral view of the matter, a subject of lamentation. I allude to the evidence which has been given to maintain the case of treating. I think before I go on to that, in case anybody should be mistaken as to the mode in which I have disposed of the case of the 130 men, I ought to observe that, by the 11th section of "The Representation of the People Act, 1867," a voter who is employed for pay loses his vote. I think I ought to add another circumstance before proceeding to this case of treating. Adopting the conclusion that Baraclough meant to bribe at the election, what was his conduct according to the opening? Again, I cannot help going back to the opening, because nothing can be more true, either in fact or in reasoning, than that people are sure to diminish in the end what they exaggerate. In the opening it was said there was concealment; people were going in one by one; you heard of a man mysteriously pointing to a half-sovereign, instead of saying, "Take your wages." What is the fact in the evidence given? Why, that this crowd of people were allowed to assemble outside the tavern at which Sir Robert Peel had his committee-rooms, and that upon the very day after the election. More might be said upon the subject. I have said quite enough to explain the views in which I see very clearly that I ought not to arrive at the conclusion, however I may condemn the act, that it was an act properly designated as bribery; I think it was an act of vanity to gain popularity for Baraclough, and not an act of bribery for Sir Henry Bulwer.

I must now proceed to deal with the charge of treating. The charge of treating is a charge of extreme seriousness, and it must be dealt with with a determination to enforce the law, but at the same time with caution, to take care, not as one was invited to do on the part of the Petitioners, to "cleanse the boroughs and counties of England" at the expense of doing an injustice, and making an example of some person who has not broken the law. The first requisite is to find your corrupter, and then it will be time enough to consider what is to be done with him. If there was corruption in this case made out upon the evidence, and traced to Sir Henry Bulwer, or his agents—and for this purpose I should treat Baraclough as his agent—the election was void. The question is, whether treating in the sense of the Act of Parliament was established. In order to make corrupt treating, without reading the words of the section, it is sufficient to state that it must be treating under circumstances, and in a manner that the person who treated used meat or drink with a corrupt mind, that is with a view to induce people, by the pampering of their appetites, to vote, or to abstain from voting, and in so doing to act otherwise than they would have done without the inducement of meat or drink. It is not the law that eating and drinking are to cease during an election; eating and drinking by voters is specially provided for by the 23rd section of the Corrupt Practices Act, 1854, and that section forbids and makes it illegal to give meat or drink to voters upon the day of the nomination, or upon the day of the poll; to give meat or drink by way of refreshment, however moderate, to voters on account of their having voted, or being about to vote; and even in the case of persons being about to vote, it imposes a penalty of 40 s., only upon the person who so treats by way of fair refreshment.

Now, nothing therefore can make it more obvious than that the Legislature did not intend that every bit of bread or sup of drink given to a voter in the course of an election should have the effect of defeating that election. If the Legislature meant so, it would have said so in the section to which I have referred. It has imposed a special penalty and made such an act illegal, but it has not said that such an act shall avoid the election. What the Legislature has said in the 4th section is, that such an act, if done corruptly, for the purpose of influencing the election, shall make the election void, and that by virtue of the 36th section of the statute, which classes together bribery, treating, and undue influence, the committing of either of them by the Member or his agent shall void the election. The question therefore is, whether it has been proved that there was corrupt treating by Sir Henry Bulwer or his agents. It is admitted that there was not treating by Sir Henry Bulwer personally, but again, this is one of the admissions that must be taken with a grain of salt, because it is all very well to shuffle Sir Henry Bulwer off the scene, by saying that the Petitioners never meant to say that Sir Henry Bulwer treated personally, and by doing so to get rid of his important evidence, in which he contradicts one of the principal witnesses on the part of the Petitioners, who alleged that Sir Henry Bulwer addressed a meeting, in which there were two drunken men lying on the floor, one of whom rose occasionally upon his elbow, and hurraed or hiccuped for Sir Henry Bulwer. However, though now no formal charge is made against Sir Henry Bulwer of personal treating, I cannot forget the charges made in the Petition, and I cannot forget the evidence which was offered by a person, I think of the name of Hatton, which would have the effect of showing, if it has any effect, that Sir Henry Bulwer must have been a party to the drinking which took place at the houses which were said to have been opened, and, in one sense, opened for him. But it is said that his agents ordered drink, and ordered drink corruptly, and in the sense which I have explained. Now, I come to consider whether that is established in point of fact, and I must say with reference to what has taken place in other cases before myself, to the course there adopted, and also with reference to the saving of public time, and to the sparing of the pockets of both Petitioners and Respondents, that I think it would be well that some course should be taken (of course it must be in conjunction with the other judges who have to deal with this subject), for the purpose of in some way marshalling the evidence of treating under the direction of the Court. At Guildford, where a series of local committees were appointed, and where a great deal of evidence was given to show that there was a great number of persons, some voters, some hangers-on, some parasites who went round to drink, wherever they could find drink, and supped out of others' pots, without paying, I took the course of saying, that the Petitioners, if they thought proper to charge acts of that kind as being evidence of treating by the sitting Member or his agent, must give some evidence by calling the publicans, in order to show that the order was really given by one or other of such persons, and not call upon the Court to come to the conclusion that because there was lawful talking at the public-house, and because there was lawful drinking before or afterwards, and even to some extent during the talking at the public-house, that therefore a misdemeanor was necessarily committed which ought to be assumed from the fact of drink being supplied by the publican, and talk being supplied by the speaker. I acted upon that view there, my mind was not satisfied to connect the two, and I there decided, according to my own view—whether to the satisfaction of others I have not taken the pains to inquire—that such evidence was not sufficient. At Lichfield, acting upon that view, and desiring that the Petitioners should not be deceived as to the state of my opinion on the subject, I plainly stated that the Petitioners had better call the publicans, and let us at once know whether they could give any evidence as to the people who had given orders for the drink; that course was pursued, and the result was, that the whole truth was brought out during the Petitioners' case; and I was perfectly satisfied that though there was a great deal of drinking, and drinking for which payment had not been made, yet that that drinking was not traced to the sitting Member or to an agent of his. And I declined to apply that besom, to which I have been figuratively compared, to sweep drinking out of the borough, not seeing that by doing so I should have been doing otherwise than injustice in sweeping away along with it it for that purpose a person who was not proved to have committed any fault against the law. In this case, though it was perfectly well known what my views were upon the subject, my brother Ballantine (probably he was justified in doing so here, because in some respects the evidence here was stronger than that in, at least, one of the places of which I have spoken) took the course of not calling the publicans, and he did indicate (and here I must do him justice for taking a course which was convenient), he did indicate certain persons whom he expected to be called on the part of the Respondents, and whom he desired to have the opportunity of cross-examining, and I took a note at the time of the persons whom he so indicated, in order to put it in that way to watch whether there was any flinching upon the part of the Respondents, or any keeping back of evidence, such as I was sure would be charged upon them in reply, and was to a great extent charged upon them, for the purpose of being able to check that evidence when it was produced. Those persons were, and it is right to bear it in mind, the publicans, Radford or Preston, Job, Proudman, and Clamp. Preston was the person who kept the "Red Lion," at Fazeley. At first, the name that was mentioned was Radford, and it was only when it was stated that Radford had taken poison, and that Mrs. Radford could not possibly attend, because she was looking after him, that the name of Preston, I think, at my suggestion, was substituted for Radford; but the persons, in the first instance, called for and challenged to be produced were Radford, Job, Proudman, and Clamp. I rather think they have all been produced. I have read through all their evidence, and there was also produced a witness who turned out to be more important than any of them. That was the witness Moore, who may be comprised with Job. Therefore, there was no keeping back of evidence on the part of the Respondents. It is quite a mistake to suppose, as the learned Serjeant seemed to do in reply, that he had established any case of suspicion by concealment on the part of the Respondents. I must deal therefore with the evidence as it stands, being satisfied that the agents on both sides have exercised their utmost ability and diligence in bringing forward and laying before me every shred of evidence which could possibly assist me in coming to an affirmative conclusion in the matter. Now, this is a part of the case upon which the Court has been especially invited to adopt what was called those broad or wide views which it was stated were appropriate to proceedings of this description. There are certain views, broad and wide, but nevertheless, deep and sensible, which are applicable to this and to all cases of circumstantial evidence. There is one principle of the law of evidence which may be said to be universal, that first ascertaining upon whom rests the burden of establishing the affirmative, you ought to judge of a case just as much by evidence which might have been produced if the affirmation were true, and which has not been produced, as by the evidence which has been laid before the court. In other words, that no amount of evidence ought to induce a judicial tribunal to act upon mere suspicion or conjecture that some evidence might have been given by the Petitioner which he has not thought it to his interest actually to bring forward, and to act upon that evidence, and not upon the evidence which really has been brought forward. The second principle which is more particularly applicable to circumstantial evidence is this—that the circumstances to establish the affirmative of a proposition where circumstantial evidence is relied upon, must be all, such of them as are believed, circumstances consistent with the affirmative, and that there must be some one or more circumstance believed by the tribunal, if you are dealing with a criminal case, inconsistent with any rational theory of innocence; and, where you are dealing with a civil case (otherwise expressed, though probably the result is for the most part the same) proving the probability of the affirmative to be so much stronger than that of the negative, that a rational mind would adopt the affirmative in preference to the negative.

Let us apply these principles here; who are the witnesses to whom they are to be applied? I have been at pains to read through the evidence in this case, not because I expected that it would affect the impression which it made upon my mind when it came from the witnesses in the box, but with a sincere desire to add to the information which I had picked up from the witnesses as they went through the examination, to correct my memory where it was erroneous, and to supply it where it was defective; and I find that, in addition to the witnesses who it seemed to me could have been called by the Petitioners, and were not called, but who were alleged to be agents without any proof whatsoever, or were assailed in points other than those in which their conduct could possibly affect the result of the Petition, there were many others. Those witnesses are Handley, Cotterell, May (some of these may have been called, but the majority of them were not called), Hunter, Young, Clements, Elliott, Ruffe, the umbrella-man in Church-street, Walker, Linford, Davis, of Two Gates, with his 6*d.* to the 3*d.* of the others, who treated the men that happened to have nothing in their pockets, who were allowed to sup out of other people's vessels; Miller, Sam Brookes, Webster, about whom that story of the leg of the bench was introduced, and Emanuel Stevens. With respect to those witnesses, as none of them have been called, and as no evidence has been given with respect to the majority of them on the part of the Petitioners, with the exception that they were present, and some of them were present under circumstances in which they must have observed and perhaps intended treating if it really took place, I must assume that no one of those witnesses could, if called, have assisted the Petitioners. With respect to one of them, Mr. Ruffe, he occupies a position that really makes it unnecessary that I should make any remarks upon his character; he is known to his fellow-townsmen; he seems to have been elected twice Mayor, if I understand the evidence. If his fellow-townsmen think he has done anything wrong, I have no doubt he will hear of it. Mr. Ruffe was alleged to have been present at treating at the "Carpenters' Arms," on Friday, the 13th of November 1868, some few days before the election—the very Friday before the Monday upon which the nomination took place. He unquestionably took an active part for Sir Henry Bulwer before he was re-elected Mayor; he had a right to do so. A man does not wash his hands of politics when he accepts office, with the one exception of the office which I am now discharging. Up to the time when he was elected Mayor, I do not understand what has been said of Mr. Ruffe. If he was an agent, prove it; if he misconducted himself as an agent, prove it; if he allowed treating or undue influence, prove it, or do not assert it. In the case of a Petition in which he might have been charged with misconducting himself as returning officer, and in which no charge has been made against him, I really do feel quite mortified that any person connected with the profession of the law, and occupying a prominent place in it, could have been so far misled by his instructions, as of course the learned Serjeant must have been misled in this respect, as to make such serious assertions with respect to a person who had no opportunity of defending himself, as have been made against Mr. Ruffe. But is it true? Yes; it is said it is true, and four witnesses proved it. Three of those witnesses state that he was there, and that he did give the health of Sir Henry Bulwer,—he, the returning officer, in a beer-house just before going to act as the representative of the State upon what ought to be the solemn occasion of the election of a Member of Parliament. Those three people—Blood, Beard, and Needham—alleged that he was there, and that he gave the health, I think, three times; that he sat in the chair and misconducted himself in the way he would have done if he had done as they described. Clamp, the landlord, on being asked, said, yes, he was there, but not he, one Lee was in the chair, and there was no health given. He was there for a few minutes to speak to Mr. Burgess, and then he went out; that is the fourth witness that brother Ballantine referred to. We have Mr. Burgess as a fifth. Every one of them said Mr. Burgess was there. I pondered in my own mind whether I should call upon Mr. Ruffe as a witness. I did not do so because, in the first place, he might have been subjected to the same sort of treatment which caused me pain as applied to Mr. Carmichael; but, in the next place, for this reason, that it would appear if the judge called upon Mr. Ruffe, not as if he were calling him because he disbelieved the story, and gave Mr. Ruffe an opportunity of contradicting it, but as if the judge believed it himself. I did not believe it; and it turned out I was justified, because Mr. Burgess, by far the soberest and most trusty-looking man of the body of five from whom that evidence as to Clamp's beerhouse came, being put into the box, stated that it was a mistake, and that the men were thinking of another occasion altogether. It appears that a municipal election was, to apply a big word to a comparatively little subject, raging contemporaneously with the Parliamentary election, and that that meeting with reference to the municipal election was held at that place some time in October, upon a Friday, the same day of the week, and just a fortnight before the meeting of the 13th of November, at which it would have been wrong for the Mayor to have been present and to have done what he did. Mr. Burgess, who made four speeches upon the occasion, under circumstances of a character which made an impression upon his mind, and who cannot be wrong, and who must be telling a falsehood if he speaks inaccurately, because he speaks circumstantially, whereas the others may all be mistaken without discredit to their honesty; Mr. Burgess says that it was upon that occasion, and not upon the 30th of November, that Mr. Ruffe was present. He further adds that he did not propose healths upon the occasion, and I certainly thought one or two of the witnesses who said he did, seem to have a very indistinct notion of what proposing healths meant. One of them was no scholar, he told us, and possibly they might all of them have confessed the same if they had been candid; but I very much doubt their power to draw a distinction between a toa stand a speech, and I am not at all sure that they are people upon whom I can rely, either from their state or from their observation, for drawing a minute distinction between the municipal and the Parliamentary election. It is quite clear that as to that subject we have a test of truth—a test to determine whether the evidence which has been given is exaggerated or not exaggerated.

Now I will pass on to consider the case with reference to the second broad rule, as applied to evidence expressed in legal inquiries, where the judge has to remind the jury of what ought to guide them, but instinctively acted upon by every thoughtful man in his own concerns of importance. Let us apply that rule to the circumstances brought forward and see whether, assuming that they are, and I think they are, consistent with a great deal of drinking having taken place, as I was early satisfied in the course of the case, and consistent with that drink having been ordered by persons who would compromise the Member, because it may have been so ordered, and on some occasions there was evidence that it was so ordered—treating the first branch of the rule as having been thus put out of the way and disposed of satisfactorily by the case made on the part of the Petitioners, but subject to the opposing evidence for the Respondents, let us deal with the second, and see whether there are credible circumstances in the case so inconsistent with the conclusion that the beer was not ordered by the agents of the Member, or was not ordered under circumstances in which it was intended to or could influence the election, that the court ought to arrive at the affirmative rather than at the negative conclusion. Here, again, I must refer to the opening. If the opening had been proved to the

the extent of a single pot of liquor being supplied to a single voter by any proved agent of the Member, under circumstances in which I could be satisfied that it was intended thereby to gain the vote of that man, this election must have been declared void. I shall consider presently whether evidence to that effect has been given. But I go further: had the opening been proved in respect of another proposition, which was laid down with equal confidence—namely, that there was general drunkenness throughout the borough, or any great part of it—though it could not be traced distinctly to the Member or an agent of his, if it produced obvious demoralisation to an extent which must have influenced the election by producing the vote of one or more of the constituency in favour of Sir Henry Bulwer, who would otherwise have voted for Mr. John Peel; if it had been established, I should have considered that a strong case had been made, to be rebutted on the part of the Respondent. I desire to say, and I take the opportunity of doing so the more readily, because it should be known that the judges are of one mind upon this subject, I entirely concur in what was done by my brother Martin at Norwich, where it appeared that large sums of money were spent—half-sovereigns distributed to almost anybody who desired to ask for them in certain districts, finding their way to the hands of voters or persons connected with voters, and that there was the circumstance of a person fairly traced by the evidence to connection with the Member being out of the way in a mysterious manner, I entirely agree with him when he said that no man who laid claim to common sense could come to any other conclusion than he did upon the facts that there was bribery, and that although the Member was satisfactorily proved to be entirely innocent of it, that that bribery must have come, and ought to be concluded to have come, from a person who must have been an agent of the Member, or, at least, whose act must have been known to and connived at by an agent of the Member; and, therefore, the seat was forfeited. General bribery unquestionably, from whatever quarter it comes, will vitiate an election, even without proving any such connection, probably because of the propriety of acting upon the presumption that it must have been from some person so interested in the Member, or so connected with his agents, that it ought to be attributed to the one, or at least to the other. It has been said that the same law applies to general treating. I desire to abstain from giving any opinion upon that, because I observe that, in one of the cases to which I have already alluded (the Lambeth case), the committee, acting upon sound advice, no doubt, stated that there was a distinction between bribery and treating; and committees, notwithstanding they were empowered to, and generally did, go into evidence of bribery in the first instance without requiring evidence of agency to be given, appear latterly to have taken the course—no doubt with a view to that marshalling of the evidence which one must consider, I think, some means of effecting for the advantage of suitors in these Courts; the committees appear to have arrived at the conclusion that it was better, in case of alleged treating, that agency should be proved first, and they did so on very sensible grounds, which I will deal with in a moment. But I must first dispose of this case of general drunkenness—men, women, and children drinking as they pleased. I do not know whether the expression was used, but I have an impression upon my mind that the word “rolling” was used; I rather think the term “rolling in the streets” was used. I dislike dealing with an expression which is a very good one and a very true one, when the facts are so; but it is an expression which, if it was not used in this case, is a sort of expression which would be applied to a case of general drunkenness. Where general drunkenness is resorted to on the part of the Member, there is this distinction between it and bribery. You have people commonly brought up drunk to the poll, as, I think, was the case at Bewdley; you have drunkenness continued up to the time at which it is likely to influence the vote of the man who is so vulgar-minded that he will sell himself for drink. If you make a man drunk to-day, the election being about to take place upon the 1st of March, it may, or may not, incline him in your favour; he may be your friend in his maudlin state, but when he comes to his senses the next morning, and feels a huskiness in his throat, and has got rid, more or less, of his vice of yesterday, if he were of my mind he would rather feel disposed to be indignant at the person who he discovered had been endeavouring to win his affections with drink; he would form a very mean opinion of the man who endeavoured to get him to vote upon the 1st of next month by making a hog of him on the 15th of this month.

That is not so with bribery. You give the man the money; he has had the advantage of it; he has committed the odious offence, but he has at least the advantage of retaining, and of spending for himself the wages of his iniquity. Drunkenness, in the way of general drunkenness, with a view of influencing the election, according to my reading, and according to what I can imagine rather than have seen of scenes of this description, would be drunkenness operating upon men at or near the time when you wanted them to come up to the poll to give you votes; and, therefore to prove that this borough was generally made drunk in the first week in August in order that people might be induced to vote upon the 17th of November, requires drawing a much more far-fetched conclusion than to say that each man got a 5*l.* note in the first week in August in order that he might vote on the 17th of November. It is possible that this distinction may be too subtle for practical application; though, indeed, no argument is too subtle which is founded upon true premises, and in which no fault of reasoning can be discovered.

It is very material, therefore, to consider what was the evidence of this general drunkenness; and upon reading the evidence from beginning to end, I find that general drunkenness is not only not proved to have taken place, but it is proved not to have taken place; and in various ways. In the first place, the only person who pretended to give evidence of it was the chief and main witness upon the subject of the drinking that actually took place—a man who has been contradicted over and over again by other witnesses, who are worthy of reliance, upon different points; a man who stands alone in his statement of the general drunkenness, and that statement was elicited from him after several questions, to the first of which he answered that the drunkenness consisted in the “regular characters,” I think he said, indulging in that vice; and at last he said that he never saw more drunkenness during the 17 years he had lived at Fazeley (Fazeley was the place selected) than he had done during and shortly before the election. Is that true? Let me apply the first test—the broad view, that you are to judge of a case as much by that proof which is not produced, and which might have been produced if it existed, as by that which is proved. Who would have known if there was an extraordinary state of drunkenness at Fazeley during the period referred to by Hatton? Of course, as Mr. Keane observed, the police, who have to look after drunken people, and to take care that the peace is not interfered with by them; and the police were not called, that is to say, they were not called upon this point. On the part of the Petitioners one policeman was called, Lester, for the purpose of proving that there was no commotion in the borough, and who actually left the Court with the impression that there were only three police during the period of the election, an impression which again I say I am sure he did not mean to suggest; but it did not occur to him at the time that we were speaking of different things. He said so, and not one word was asked him about any such state of things as general or any drunkenness; and that is a witness called by the Petitioners, whose evidence was, no doubt, taken down, and who might have been interrogated as to every matter which it could be material to prove. So much for the absence of evidence. There is an absence of anybody else than Hatton. Women were suggested to him, but he would not make women drunk, far less children. According to the opening, women and children were drinking. One other person did speak of women drinking who had children with them, but that I think was upon the occasion of the drink that was given after the work at “Job’s Barn,” where unquestionably there was general drinking, in which anybody to whom no objection existed no doubt was allowed to join. So much for the negative, the absence of corroboration which might have been given. Let us test Hatton’s evidence in another way; what evidence is there to the contrary? Mr. Rowbotham was called on the part of the Respondents; Mr. Rowbotham must have known of it if it existed. There was another witness who heard a noise in his bed; I pass that over. If I were to refer to every petty circumstance that I have had to weigh and reject in the course of considering this evidence, I should be attempting a duty almost like reckoning the sands of the sea, and very little more useful. So much for Mr. Rowbotham. This causes one to suspect what at first one did not at the time suspect, that Hatton is not very accurate in his statements. One desires, therefore, to compare what he said with the evidence of other witnesses, and to see how it agrees with it. He is the person who speaks of Mr. Burgess; another person, whose name I forget, and Barraclough, being present at the “White Lion.” I say nothing of Barraclough, because I think in the respect I have pointed out, he allowed himself to do a thing which was wrong; for that reason only I leave out any reference to his evidence upon this subject. I have again the evidence of Mr. Burgess. I have a distinct contradiction between Hatton and Mr. Burgess as to what took place at the “White Lion,” because Mr. Burgess says no drinking went on to which he was a party, nor of which he had any knowledge; there was no drinking that could be called treating while Mr. Burgess was there, though at first Hatton said the drinking was after the speaking; he, in order to prove that the act was by the agency of Barraclough, said that he went out of the room in a mysterious manner, and soon afterwards drink was brought in, and that that drink was there while Mr. Burgess was speaking. That is contradiction the first; upon a small matter it may be, but still a contradiction. There is another witness; compare Hatton’s evidence with that of Sir Henry Bulwer. I have arrived at a period of life when men do not find it easy to learn new arts. I have had to study the art of deciding upon facts, and I desire to say, if it is at all interesting to those who may have to practice before me hereafter, that I never will permit my mind to be influenced by a suggestion against the veracity of a witness upon a point as to which there was an opportunity of examining him whilst in the box, and as to which no cross-examination has been administered. I have said that, in another form, of Sir Robert Peel; I say it here of Sir Henry Bulwer. I am not acquainted with either of those gentlemen, and I must judge of them by their conduct in court. As Sir Robert Peel was not asked any question to establish the graver charge which lurked under that which was laid against him, so Sir Henry Bulwer is not cross-examined, or not cross-examined with any effect as to the circumstance of his witnessing the disgraceful scene to which he is alleged to have been a party in addressing an assembly, of which those two drunken men formed a part. He says no such circumstance occurred; he says so in a manner, and referring to details which satisfy me that it could not have occurred without his knowledge; and in this respect, therefore, Hatton is contradicted. He is contradicted by another witness, who is apparently worthy of belief, he is contradicted circumstantially, and there is no effected cross-examination of the witness; whom am I to believe? Of course, Sir Henry Bulwer, and not Hatton. Then, moreover, he is contradicted by Mr. Carmichael, whose name I introduce for the last time, because Hatton, I think, is a witness, who in addition to the evidence which he gave of treating, was called for the purpose of showing that Mr. Carmichael had made made use of some menacing expression as to what he would do with the tenants in case they took part against him or in case somebody else treated the tenants badly for taking part against him. Here is another confirmation of Mr. Carmichael, and here is another condemnation of Hatton, because again I say if Mr. Carmichael had been the knave to do what is suggested in respect of the poor people he was accused of having oppressed, in addition to the acts of folly which I am called upon to believe as against him, and which I have detailed, we are to suppose that he was guilty of the further act of folly in boasting of what he was doing, or about to do, to a person like Hatton. Hatton is a single witness to general drunkenness not sustained by any other witness on the part of the Petitioners, contradicted by four persons upon whose testimony certainly I place more reliance than I could upon his, and whose testimony taken together is an overwhelming answer, not only in respect of those circumstances as to which he has used misrepresentation, but sufficient to throw suspicion on the whole of the evidence which he has given. And, again, if instead of the jog-trot rules of law, I am to adopt as called upon in the reply, the rule of learn all from one, instead of judging of each according to his own individual merits, if I happened to be a hasty man, I might at once sweep away this class of evidence by saying "One of your witnesses who was called to establish your graver case has wholly failed both as to facts and time, he has been proved guilty of gross exaggeration; he has been proved to have misrepresented a variety of circumstances, therefore all your witnesses ought to be treated in the same way and disbelieved." There is however a point of view in which, in this case, I ought to judge of all by one. I think in respect of that part of the case where the Petitioner has failed, I ought narrowly to inspect the case of the Respondents for the purpose of seeing whether it supplies those gaps which the Petitioner's case, viewed in the way which I have rather indicated, I fear, than explained, does unquestionably present, and I especially refer to the specific evidence which has been given with respect to the various acts of drinking. I will take Mr. Shaw, and I will dismiss him from the case. Women were treated. Who treated them? Shaw, unquestionably. Shaw was the agent of Sir Henry Bulwer, therefore, Sir Henry Bulwer's election was void. Is it? Were they treated in order that they might influence their fathers, brothers, or sweethearts, which unquestionably would be corrupt treating, and would void the election? It appears that early in the system of canvassing adopted at the public-houses, whilst Sir Henry Bulwer was speaking, or trying to get into the room to speak, having first failed in securing the school-room, which he had attempted to secure up to 6 o'clock in the evening (in respect of which there is another contradiction, I do not pause to add to those which already exist), a number of factory girls, attracted, as girls would be by a crowd, in any place where there is excitement, probably wanting to hear the great man from London speak, or drawn there by the novelty of electioneering going on, appears to have collected at the "White Lion"; and they appear to have teased Mr. Shaw in the passage, and Mr. Shaw, instead of resenting the interference with his liberty, ordered, as he stated—and I believe him—not at all for the purpose of corrupting these girls, but for the purpose of getting them out of the way, attracting them so that they might leave the passage, and go into a more convenient place, ordered them 2s. worth of beer, which was taken into a room, into which they gradually flocked, and no more was heard of them. If I am to learn all from one, what sort of state would the Petitioner's case be in to prove the treating of these women? Other women drank. Take the evidence of Moore; Moore and Job may go together; but I take the evidence of Moore, because it is more distinct. Much has been said about Mrs. Moore not having been called on the part of the Respondents—not having been called, when it was stated by Croxall, one of the Petitioner's witnesses, that he had seen Baraclough, and that on the suggestion of Baraclough, he went to Mrs. Moore, and ordered some beer. That would be all very well, if no evidence had been given to explain the transaction; but it might have been a circumstance of suspicion, if not of proof, and the first rule I applied might have been retorted upon the Respondents. But I must observe, that having read the list of those persons whom Sir Henry Bulwer was challenged by the Petitioners to produce, I find that Moore's name is not in the list. That list consisted of four; Moore was not one of them. Job was one of them, and he was called; Moore was added by the Respondents, and I wondered at the time to myself why Sir Henry Bulwer was so unwise as to put a man into the box whom he was not challenged to produce, and who might, perhaps, prove something against him. The old habits of an advocate suggested that thought to my mind, though I kept it to myself. I was bound to listen to what Moore was going to say; but it soon appeared why Moore was called, because, in respect of the treating to which so much importance has been attached—spoken to by Croxall for the purpose of fixing Baraclough as the man who ordered the beer—the explanation is this: Moore had to prepare "Job's Barn" (if I recollect rightly, Moore is connected with "Job's Barn"); Moore is a man who had not a stable or horse-corn, and had to resort to Job when he wanted them. Moore was called for the purpose of showing that the drinking which took place there, and which unquestionably took place to a large extent, and, I daresay, from buckets, as alleged, was drinking which occurred under these circumstances: "Job's Barn" was a place not fitted for a popular assembly; Moore undertook to make it so, and a number of people in the neighbourhood lent a hand, and assisted Moore to fit it up. He took lamps there, and took down the door, either to make a flooring, or to allow of the people's easily getting in and out, and there was a great deal of preparation which in the end he represented to Mr. Shaw was worth in labour some 3*l.* or 4*l.* He was the person to whom 10*l.* was paid. To that 3*l.* or 4*l.* was added 3*l.*

Tamworth.

or 4 l., representing another occasion upon which the same barn was used, which would have made 7 l. or 8 l.; and then Moore appears to have asked for something for himself, or, it may be, and I rather come to the conclusion that it was, he asked for something for himself to be added, in order to make up for the expenses as well as the trouble he had been at upon the occasion, and upon the whole he was paid the sum of 10 l. That was in order to explain the drinking going on at Moore's. What had Moore to do with "Job's Barn"? How came there to be drinking at Moore's when the meeting was not there? Must not it have been a sort of chapel of ease to "Job's Barn" for the purpose of drinking? Moore gave the explanation, which appears to me, I own, to be a perfectly natural one. I think the 10 l. did include a charge for beer supplied at Moore's, and there was a like supply at Job's upon that occasion. It may be there was beer to the extent spoken of by Croxall. It may be—Baraclough does not admit it, but it may be—that there was beer ordered upon the occasion; but the evidence of Moore shows that the occasion was a special one, that the beer represented so much labour which was rendered to him by the people who assisted him in order to do that which Sir Henry Bulwer was entitled, and I think bound as a gentleman, to pay for, because he had the advantage of it; that the beer was given away as a sort of acknowledgment of the assistance that had been rendered, and was not given away to purchase votes. I will refer to another occasion to which great importance has been attributed, no more importance than it deserved, and I think that that, with Moore's, may be taken as fair specimens of the sort of cases which those of which we have the most distinct and satisfactory evidence have turned out to be when they came to be examined: I refer to the case of the "White Lion," at Fazeley. I was rather afraid—I mean afraid lest the interest of truth should suffer—that Mrs. Radford or her husband would not have been able to be present, that I should to some extent have been obliged to walk in the dark in deciding this case of the "White Lion," but that fear I am happy to say was removed by Mrs. Radford being able to attend, and I think there is now distinct evidence of what took place at the "White Lion." At the "White Lion" unquestionably there were meetings, very many meetings; at the "White Lion" unquestionably there was drink, and that drink has I think also been proved by more trustworthy witnesses than Hatton to have been partaken of by persons who did not pay for it, a large proportion of whom I noted especially, because I wanted to ascertain whether there was any corruption in fact in this case, whether the election had been affected, I will not say by the speaking, but by the drinking, a number (of whom I counted, I think, up to 14) appear to have been so little influenced by this drink, to which so much has been attributed, that they voted for Mr. John Peel. I think I am right in that. I counted up to 14; I will answer for a dozen. No doubt such drinking did go on and went on at the "White Lion," and no doubt the "White Lion" was a place where meetings were held, public meetings as they have been called, at which Sir Henry Bulwer addressed the electors, and also meetings of the local committee, presided over by a witness who has been called for the Respondents, whose name I will not stop to ascertain at this moment, for the purpose of advancing the interests of Sir Henry Bulwer. In respect of the payments that were made at the "White Lion," I find a charge of, I think, 20 l. allowed to Radford. £.20 was allowed to Radford, and 5 l. to Preston, the other man at Fazeley, the landlord of the "Red Lion," where meetings were also held for one or other of the purposes to which I have referred. I believe that that 20 l. does represent to some extent drink. I believe that when the accounts came to be squared, what Sir Henry Bulwer (who appears to be a man of a collected mind and to express himself with accuracy) stated the other day his directions in the case were complied with, and I think that his suggestion that though there might be a doubt about it, fair refreshments might be allowed to the committee men, was acted upon in the payment of that 20 l., and I believe that does include, like Moore's account, an amount for beer. I believe further that a very much larger amount of drink was supplied gratuitously, that is, without payment at the time, at Radford's public-house; and it may be also—though I ought not to say I believe it, without rather more investigation than I have been able to apply to the evidence, but there are grounds for believing it,—I will assume that drink was supplied to an extent something like what was spoken to by Mrs. Radford, probably it may have been as much as 200 l. worth. Here I have indeed a case which is worth considering. I have the one case to which it is unnecessary to apply the rule that from one you may learn all, because if that quantity of drink had been proved to have been supplied at Radford's by the orders of Sir Henry Bulwer or the agent of Sir Henry Bulwer, I must have come to the conclusion that it was supplied with the intention of influencing the electors of Fazeley. I think the supply of so large a quantity of drink as that, if traced to Sir Henry Bulwer or his agent, would undoubtedly have compelled my mind to arrive at that conclusion, and I must deal with this case a little minutely. Apply the second rule. There are circumstances consistent with and raising a strong suspicion of treating within the statute at the "White Lion." Are these circumstances so inconsistent with the negative of that view—namely, that the supply was not by the orders of the agents of Sir Henry Bulwer, and with the intention to influence the election, that I ought to adopt the affirmative instead of the negative? What are the circumstances? A suggestion by Hatton, upon whose evidence I have already commented, that Baraclough ordered some beer at the first meeting at the "White Lion," and afterwards ordered some beer at the "Red Lion," with all the contradictions of Hatton to which I have referred; a suggestion by Croxall with respect to Moore, upon which I have already commented, as to the beer supplied, which has been, I think, satisfactorily explained away;

Tamworth.

away; and the evidence to which I shall now refer, contradiction by Baraclough (as he is the person implicated I will not profess to say that I should attach any great weight to that, standing alone); evidence given by Sir Henry Bulwer that he prohibited from the beginning any resort to corrupt practices in the election; evidence by Mr. Shaw, whom he employed early in August (and who, as I said before, is almost the only person who has received a compliment at the hands of the counsel for the Petitioners, and, of course, upon instructions), that he did his best to avoid any such vice, and that when he heard that drinking had been going on he issued a circular, rather late in the day no doubt, in November, but connected with and confirming his previous verbal instructions, that no such practices should be resorted to; a witness produced who is interested in making out that Sir Henry Bulwer, through his agent, was liable to pay a sum, the larger it is the less likely is the person interested to withhold information with respect to agency for Sir Henry Bulwer at this stage while the sum remains unpaid. That person is Mrs. Radford; she confirms Barraclough as to no orders having been given by him, and she states that the only person to whom she can point as having given orders for drink at the "White Lion" was a person of the name of Handley, who was called the sawyer of Sir Robert Peel, but who was not proved to have had any other connection with that gentleman, and certainly none affecting his position in this election, and who was no further connected with Sir Henry Bulwer than by being a favourite of his; a person who is asserted, but who is not proved by any evidence, to have been the agent of Sir Henry Bulwer. But then it is said, and properly said, an appeal is made to the probabilities of the case—how improbable it is that those persons, the Radfords, would have supplied so large an amount except upon the orders of likely people. Let us inspect that, and see what the true proportions are of that appeal to probability. And here I must observe that this is one of the perils that environ Members who resort to this contrivance. I do not say contrivance in the sense of blame; it is quite out of my province to make any personal remarks at this part of the case, and I use it because a better word does not come to my mind—but this dangerous practice of organizing canvasses at public-houses—that practice was resorted to on the part of Sir Henry Bulwer unquestionably at eight places, all of which Sir Robert Peel appears to have visited at a later period of the canvass, and at some of which, if not at all of which, he incurred bills for rooms though not for drink. When the time came for meetings to be held, at which he addressed the electors at those eight places, but at many more houses, if I can judge, than were visited by Sir Robert Peel, Sir Henry Bulwer did hold meetings from the beginning of August, from time to time, down to October, when either he, or persons on his behalf, did speak, and did do various acts for the purpose of advancing his interests at the election. There was an organization like that in the Lambeth case, which might shortly be described thus: Workmen's committees were formed—respectable persons, who could be relied upon and trusted to preside at those committees, and to set on foot a canvass of the new voters—who were some of them working men in factories and some in foundries, some being engaged in agriculture—on behalf of Sir Henry Bulwer, and I think it may be taken that at the committees which so met there was beer drunk, a part of which is represented in the amounts which were allowed under the terms of fair refreshments when the bills came to be paid, upon the part of Sir Henry Bulwer. I have no doubt there was such an organization, and that such a plan was resorted to; I call that a dangerous practice.

One of the perils to which Members are exposed is this: persons who are no voters at all, who have no interest in either party, and who only care to swig at other people's expense wherever they think drink is going gratuitously, go round to such meetings, and are allowed to go in under the mistaken notion that they are voters on legitimate business with the committee, or out of good nature not liking to object to them. I should think nobody would like, from his appearance, to object to the pensioner who was called, who appears also to have a stout way of conducting himself when people do want to stop him, because somebody called "Chicken Brown," failed to stop the military man when he tried to get into the meeting. The Member is exposed to a number of persons of that sort, dropping in and drinking what they do not pay for, and then making a great show of it when the trial comes. If you could get 10 people who went round to the 27 houses, at each of which 10 meetings were held, you might get 2,700 pieces of evidence; and if you could disarrange it, and mix it up and down before the judge, more or less, and he is too lazy or too little perspicuous to be able to reduce it to its natural order, and to see exactly what it all means, you would run a very great chance of his assuming that sweeping character which it seems to be the fashion to invite judges to assume upon these occasions. The indiscriminate application of the besom may, for aught I know, put an end to some malpractices; but it certainly will put an end to all ideas of justice or fair play in these proceedings unless it be applied with discrimination and according to law.

Another peril is this: committee men who are employed, and who it has been assumed may be supplied with fair refreshments, never ought to be. The Lambeth people were wiser than the Tamworth people turned out to be in this way, for they did not allow their committee men to have drink, for the obvious reason that it was sure to lead to excess. The committee men are almost sure to bring occasionally a friend or two, and to introduce them under the same circumstances as the intruders and parasites to whom I referred as the first class of perilous people would have introduced themselves; and these again form a body of witnesses who add to the mass of evidence, out of which the judge has to extract the three grains of truth, or whatever number he may think are to be found in the mass of evidence—that is, as well as he can—without any suggestion upon the part of the Petitioners of any safe path through the wilderness of proof.

There is a third peril, and here I speak of what I know, because I speak from the experience that I have gained from the books, and also from my own observation. It must be now some 31 years, it was before I was called to the bar, that I remember to have heard a case argued in the Court of Exchequer before the judges there, and it impressed itself upon my mind by an odd circumstance, because I think if it be in the books and be referred to, it will be found that a publican could not fix the Member because he could not prove the agency; and then he brought an action against the person who had given the order, and he failed because that person, when he gave the order, was proved to have given it in the name of the Member; and it was not negatived in that action that there was authority from the Member; it struck me as being so odd an antic of the law—I was not called to the bar at that time—that it has fixed itself upon my mind ever since; upon looking at the reports of election committees it will be found that similar instances have occurred over and over again where the seats of the Members have been seriously endangered. The third dangerous class to which I was about to refer, is the class of the landlord himself, who, being called upon to lend his room for the purpose of holding meetings there, and having, it may be implied, authority to provide fair refreshment to the committee during their labours, which could hardly have the name of treating affixed to it unless it were excessive, takes upon him, either without any orders at all, upon the chance of being paid by the candidate if he should turn out to be successful, upon the chance of the candidate not liking to have an inquiry made which may result in a charge of treating, whether successful or not, especially if the tribunal were an uncertain one; or, being satisfied to act upon the orders of persons who do not even profess to represent the Member in addition to the drink which he is authorised by the Member or his agents to give, allows a long score to be run up, for which there is no authority at all. I will conclude by saying that, upon the evidence of Mrs. Radford, especially, that Handley was the only person who gave orders, and those as to some beer, and that Handley did not profess to give the order by the authority of anybody, and that if he did there is no proof that he was the agent of Sir Henry Bulwer, I arrive at the conclusion, and I do so without hesitation in my own mind, that the beer which was supplied in excess at the “White Lion,” is not proved to have been supplied upon the order of an agent of Sir Henry Bulwer, and that therefore there is no proof of corruption in that respect against Sir Henry Bulwer or his agent.

I have gone through this evidence, as I stated, with care, and I have taken out a variety of circumstances, all leading my mind to the same conclusion; if there are any that have struck me forcibly in support of the opposite view of the case, I hope it will be believed—I know it will be by the members of my own profession—that I should have brought them forward and discussed them with equal point and allowed them equal weight, as those to which I have adverted in inclining my mind to take the negative rather than the affirmative view.

The only other circumstance to which my attention has been much called, is to the question whether there really is proof that Sir Henry Bulwer made use of those public-houses for meetings and committees, in such a way as may be attributed to legitimate motives on the part of himself and his agents. That I have anxiously considered, and with a view to decide it, I have compared the accounts of Mr. John Peel with the accounts of the other candidates, and I find that the charge against Mr. John Peel, in respect of places of which three names are given, namely: William Tempest, Wildman and Son, and William Adcock and others, for hire of rooms, servants, gas, candles, fire, attendance, and horse-corn, &c., 89 l. 11 s. 2 d., he seems to have spent only 89 l. 11 s. 2 d. upon his rooms, whatever accommodation he required there. Sir Robert Peel appears to have been at more expense than Mr. John Peel, in respect of this sort of accommodation; he appears to have been at the expense of some 99 l. 2 s., the names are not given, but the places are mentioned of which Tamworth is one, and that consumed 74 l. of the entire; the smallness of the rest is accounted for by his having held a lesser number of meetings than Sir Henry Bulwer at the other places, the names of which have been referred to. Mr. John Peel charges besides 66 l. 17 s. 2 d. for carriages. Sir Robert Peel charges 41 l. 3 s. 8 d. for carriages. Now, I come to an item, which no doubt excited the suspicion of the Petitioners and their advisers, and I am far from saying in this part of the case an unjust suspicion, with respect to what had been done on the part of Sir Henry Bulwer, because the charge to Sir Henry Bulwer, leaving out those uncertain claims of which we heard, but which were rejected on his part, and the rejection of which, therefore, excludes the notion that he adopted them, and of which it was necessary to give proof, which has not been forthcoming, as in those instances I have referred to (and which I have selected as the most important), the charge actually admitted and paid by him is in respect of eight places, 231 l. Therefore he expended considerably more than double what Sir Robert Peel did, and more in proportion again than what Mr. John Peel did. I cannot, however, find in his account the separate claims in respect of carriages to which I have referred, and there is the explanation that Sir Henry Bulwer being a stranger he required more introduction and use of rooms than the other candidates, and he did much more than either of them largely resort to the use of meetings at public-houses, where he and others on his behalf made speeches. Now I leave those accounts with this remark. Mr. Serjeant Ballantine did not in his reply refer to that which appeared at the time of the examination of the receipts to be a suspicious item, “the horse-corn.” I really did begin to rouse up my suspicion when the item of horse-corn came out, and especially when I found that it was struck out of some of the receipts and left in others, and more especially when it was proved that Moore had no claim for horse-corn, and that whenever he did want any stabling for his horse, or corn, he had to resort to Job's, having no accommodation of his own: but I must observe that that charge for horse-corn occurs in a variety of receipts. It appears to have been a sort of form adopted, I do not know whether it is an electioneering form, but it certainly does appear in Mr. John Peel's account with the still more objectionable word "&c.," I certainly have not the slightest suspicion of that gentleman's account, even with the ambiguous "&c." I think upon Moore's explanation the horse-corn is shown to have been improperly in the receipt, but I think the suspicion arising out of that circumstance is removed. I further observe, with respect to the charges for carriages and their absence from some of the accounts, and their presence in others, Mr. Shaw stated incidentally, à propos of some other subject, there were carriages and horses employed for the purpose of this election, and expense was incurred, as we know it was incurred, in respect of carriages and horses going about to those various meetings, and, of course, such expense must have been incurred at meetings where the gentle were going to join the simple in efforts to produce such a result of the election as they desired.

I have endeavoured thus, very likely imperfectly, so far as the magnitude and importance of this case are concerned, but I have endeavoured carefully, with all my might, to apply my knowledge of the law as a lawyer, and my wits as a man to the law and the facts respectively. I have struggled to keep aloof from what I am afraid does exist between some of the persons whose names have been mentioned in the case, and which I sincerely trust will soon after the result be entirely allayed. Anger is a noble passion, probably it stands second in the rank of the nobler passions, but anger with respect to matters that are passed, and in respect of a quarrel which has been manfully fought out, in which each party has resorted to all the means that he could to win, and in which the lawful conclusion of the matter has arrived, would be deeply to be reprehended, and I do trust, if I was not mistaken in thinking that especially some of the witnesses, rather than the candidates, were the objects of that most infectious of feelings, that all parties who have quarrelled over the election will now shake hands, and that there will be peace in Tamworth for the future.

It only remains that I should dispose of the question of costs. I will not put it upon the counsel to make the application; I felt sure it would be made by the counsel for the party who happened to be successful. With respect to Sir Robert Peel I think there is no difficulty whatever; he has been returned for this borough by fair means, and by a majority which most unquestionably pronounces the opinion of the people in his favour. He never would have been petitioned against but for his alleged connection with Sir Henry Bulwer. There was no such connection proved to the satisfaction of the court. A personal attack was made upon him, which, upon the evidence, I am bound to say, has proved utterly groundless. I must order the Petitioners to pay the costs of Sir Robert Peel.

In respect to Sir Henry Bulwer, I draw no distinction between that gentleman and Sir Robert Peel personally; I must, however, observe that it must be obvious from the laborious manner in which I have been compelled to deal with the question of the 130 men, and with the question of treating, that his case has given me very great anxiety. I think if it had turned only upon the question of treating I might have pronounced the same conclusion as to that gentleman as I have already done as to Sir Robert Peel, but I look with so much dislike, it may be an unwise one, but I am bound to act upon principles I have learnt, which I am too old to change, I look upon the renewal of any system of private war or any semblance of it in this or any other country as so dangerous, so much to be deprecated should it be threatened, and so much to be abolished and put down by the strong arm of the law should it arise, that I think the fact of the employment of that mob by Baraclough, though it does not in point of law affect the fate of the election so far as Sir Henry Bulwer is concerned, ought, in a matter which is to be disposed of by discretion, to induce me to abstain from ordering that the Petitioners should pay the costs of Sir Henry Bulwer.

Therefore, in the language of the Act of Parliament which it is necessary I should recite at this portion of the case, I must deem and determine that Sir Robert Peel whose return is complained of by the Petition, was duly elected and returned.

That Sir Henry Bulwer whose return is also complained of by the Petition was duly elected and returned.

That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any candidate at the election.

That from the evidence before me it does not appear that corrupt practices have prevailed, nor that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the election to which the Petition relates.

WALLINGFORD ELECTION.

Wallingford.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Blackburn, 6 February 1869.

Mr. Justice Blackburn.] I DO not think it necessary to make any adjournment or delay. I have already, as far as I can, looked through the notes, and I think I could get no benefit by any further delay in giving my opinion upon this case.

First of all I will refer to the fact that there are charges made that the seat has been obtained by bribery. In answer to that, I may as well state in a very few words my opinion upon that subject, which is, that no case of bribery is actually proved at all; so that of course it is unnecessary to inquire into agency on that head. The charges attempted to be made are none of them charges of cases where the bribery was completed, where the person received a corrupt consideration; but it is alleged that something was done amounting to an attempt to bribe the voter, offering him a consideration for his vote which he did not choose to take. And there is no doubt that that equally, if brought home to the Member, or his agent within the statute, would avoid the election. But then, as a matter of fact, when one is coming to see whether or no it is proved, no one can avoid seeing at once that the evidence requires to be stronger, and to be of a different character in such a case.

The two cases that were relied upon were these: Gosby and Sargood were said to have had offers made to them by a man named Clarke; and Wellman is stated to have been induced by an offer made by the man whom we have heard so much of, Joseph Massey, a fishmonger. These are cases where it is said that there were offers made, where there were statements made something to this effect: that after the election they would probably get money if they voted on one side. I think that in Massey's case it went further, and he said that they would get directly 10%. Now, when it is shown that any bribery has been actually committed, one does not expect that the people who offered the bribes would be of a very high class or of a very high character; and when it is shown that money is actually paid afterwards, the very fact that the man who had offered the bribe, or brought the person the bribe, was not the person who produced the money himself would be very strong evidence tending to make one think that he must have been an agent authorised by others. Now, in this case, if there was any evidence that a sum of money was actually paid, that people had received money afterwards from some unknown or concealed persons, I should have said myself certainly, that there was very great reason to believe that such a man as Massey was employed for the purpose. But here we must remember that, as the evidence stands, there was not the least attempt to show by any evidence at all that any money was paid to anybody; and we have the distinct and positive oath of Mr. Vickers, and Mr. Vickers's agents, that not only was no money paid to any body, but that there was no attempt to pay money for any improper purpose. Taking it at the utmost, I think it very possible that there might have been some idle talk about there being bribery, but nothing that amounts to any actual bribery.

As to the other two cases that are alleged, Mr. Mereweather says that he does not rely upon the case of Solomon Brown. He says, very truly, that after Mr. Child and Mr. Sedger have sworn positively what they have, there may be a mistake on the part of Solomon Brown; or there may be an intended falsehood on his part, and I never can be asked as a fact to find that there was bribery in that case. Again, in the case which was talked more of, namely, that of Silas Martin, I think it very possible that there was a misapprehension on the part of Silas Martin as to what was really said. But in order to constitute that a bribe on the part of Mr. Vickers, it is necessary that what had been done and said by him should have made a contract, "If you, Silas Martin, vote for me, and lose a shilling by it, I will pay you 5*l*." there must have been at least an offer to make a contract. Now it would have been quite impossible that Mr. Vickers, if he had done that, should have forgotten that he had done it, or that those who were by should have forgotten it. On the other hand, it is quite possible that Silas Martin and the shopman, I pass by the little boy, because his evidence did not carry the matter any further—he had heard them talking about the matter afterwards—may, imperfectly remembering what was said, and discussing about it after, have made a mistake in saying that these words were used. But it is absolutely impossible that there could have been a contract of that sort made on the part of Mr. Vickers without Mr. Vickers knowing it, or without Mr. Vickers authorising it; and therefore I must consider that as set aside.

That being so, and there being no proof of bribery, we come to the much more important and difficult question of whether there is in this case sufficient proof of treating during the election. On that point, this is one of the cases that I have had a great deal of trouble in considering. For, on the one hand, it is not one of the cases in which there could be no doubt that the effect would be to unseat the Member, which would be a very easy case; nor, on the other hand, is it one of the cases in which it is clear that the Member is to retain his seat. It is one of the cases in which there is matter to be considered, and seriously to be considered, in order to say whether or no there was such such an amount of corrupt treating as to avoid the election. And I must say, first, that I quite agree in what was stated as to the law (I believe we all agree as to the law), that the 23rd section which enacts, "That the giving or causing to be given to any voter on the day of nomination or the day of polling, on account of such voter having polled or being about to poll, any meat, drink," &c., "shall be deemed an illegal act," and imposes a penalty of 40s., does not affect the question of treating or not. It imposes a penalty, wisely enough, for the purpose of checking the practice of giving meat or drink at elections, and it imposes a penalty of 40s. whether the person be a candidate or anyone else; the intention of the Legislature being, that there should not be any such entertainment given on the polling day. Whether that has been effectual or not, I do not know. I do not think I ever heard of the 40s. penalty being enforced; but the intention of the Legislature was to prevent it.

The other section, the one on which it all turns, is the fourth section, and that enacts, that "Every candidate at an election who shall corruptly, directly or indirectly" (and then it uses words to cover over everything), "give or provide, or cause to be given or provided, or shall be accessory to the giving or providing, or shall pay wholly or in part any expenses incurred for any meat, drink, entertainment, or provision to, or for any person in order to be elected, or for being elected;" and then it proceeds to say, "or for the purpose of corruptly influencing" a vote, "shall be deemed guilty of the offence of treating." I cannot doubt that the intention of the Legislature in construing the word "corruptly" was to make it a question of intention, which must be ascertained, as all questions of intention must, by looking at the outward acts of the parties, and seeing the degrees and extent, and then drawing the conclusion which, whether it be a judge or a jury that draws a conclusion from the facts, is one which may be to a certain extent doubtful, when we are considering what were the intentions. And, I think, that what the Legislature means by the word "corruptly," for the purpose of influencing a vote is this: whenever the candidate is either himself, or by his agents, in any way accessory to providing meat, drink, or entertainment, for the purpose of being elected, with an intention to produce an effect upon the election, whenever it is done in that way, then I think it amounts to corrupt treating. And I think that whenever the intention is by such means to gain popularity, and thereby to affect the election; or even if the case is, as very often perhaps it is, that persons are afraid that if they do not provide entertainment and drink to secure the strong interest of the publicans, and of the persons who like drink whenever they can get it for nothing (who are always a numerous body) they will become unpopular, and they therefore provide it in order to affect the election; when there is an intention in the mind, either of the candidate or his agent to produce that effect, then I think that it is corrupt treating, and that the seat ought to be considered vacated.

But then when one comes to look at it, everything is involved in the question of intention, and it becomes very important to see what is the amount of it. It is perfectly true that the statute does not say, nor does it mean, that it shall depend upon the amount of drink. The smallest quantity, as I think was said forcibly enough by Mr. Justice Willes in one of the recent cases, a single thimbleful of drink given with the intention will avoid the election. But then, when we are considering, as a matter of fact, the evidence to see whether a sign of that intention does exist, we must, as a matter of common sense, see on what scale and to what extent it was done. No one would think it reasonable to draw the conclusion from the mere giving of a thimbleful of drink (to use a strong expression) that it was done with any intent to influence the election so as to bring it within the statute. It is equally certain that in the case of a person giving a large number of thimblefuls, one would draw the conclusion that there was such an intention. Unfortunately it happens, and from the nature of things it must happen, that it must always be a question more or less of evidence; and the inference which the Court draws from the facts, whether they are left to a judge or to a jury, must to some extent depend upon the peculiar views of the minds which have to draw that inference. There must always be a certain measure of doubt in that respect. But I take it that there is no doubt that the point to be considered is, was it given with an intent to influence the election? and one must make up one's mind whether it was so given upon the whole of the evidence.

Now upon this there has been a good deal said by Mr. Mereweather (and I may clear it away at once) in reference to these seven men who entered Mr. Deacon's house. There can be no question at all as to what the facts there really were. These seven men, no doubt to some extent under Mr. Deacon's influence, were to go to poll the next morning. Deacon had requested by his servant that they would come at half-past seven to his house, and he would carry them there in his carriage. A great deal was said about the distance. They certainly do not seem to have saved any very great distance by foot. I presume that Deacon's object in doing what he did was to secure that the seven men should come to the poll early; and he asked them for that purpose to be at his house at half-past seven. Then it would appear, that without Mr. Deacon having directly asked them, Mr. Deacon's servant, whom he had sent to fetch them, consented to their sitting up all night in the kitchen, and Mrs. Deacon gave them when they were there, some pipes and tobacco, and I think, a small quantity of drink, and the next morning they were given coffee. And this was done at Deacon's, who was undoubtedly an agent of Mr. Vickers. And if it were necessary to go further, Mr. Vickers himself actually came into his kitchen and stumbled over the men, and, I think the evidence was, that he used some expression of courtesy to the effect that they were not to disturb themselves, and he hoped they were comfortable, or Mr. Deacon did so in Mr. Vickers's presence. There is no doubt that all this was known to Mr. Vickers. Mr. Mereweather is quite correct in saying too, that no one can doubt that this meat and drink was given to these seven men, because they were about to vote in the election. No one can for a moment suppose, and I cannot for a moment suppose, that these seven men would either have been invited to stay in the kitchen, or have been given the coffee, if they had been going to vote on the other side. And if, therefore, Mr. Mereweather was right in the proposition of law which he laid down, that anything of that sort done on account of the election would avoid the election, that would avoid this election. But, as I have already stated, I think we must see the degree and manner and way in which it is done, to see that it is really done with a corrupt intention, which I understand to mean with an intention to produce that result which the Legislature intended to forbid; and I cannot, upon that, draw the conclusion that such entertainment given to these seven men in this way was an act of treating within the meaning of the statute. I do not think I can draw a conclusion from this act of an intention to influence the election so as to make it a corrupt act, though of course it was evidence to be taken into consideration with other things, in order to see whether there was corrupt treating.

I have entered into that case rather at length, to explain my view of the matter. The same sort of remark would apply to the giving of the 3 s. by Mr. Vickers, at the house which was being built, to the workmen working in the house which he had been examining and which was given by him not, as I understand it, when he was gone to canvass, but when he was gone to look at the house. I do not think that that 3 s. would by itself be an amount to rely upon.

But then comes the question, which is much more important and much more difficult to decide in this case, what were the facts and what was the extent to which there was treating in the public-houses, and on that question I have had considerable difficulty and considerable hesitation. The manner in which the evidence was brought out, which I have already remarked and commented upon, made it difficult for one to be quite sure that he followed the whole of it so as to seize all the points. But, I think, upon the Petitioner's case there came out this much, which if it had stood uncontradicted and unexplained, I should have thought to prove corrupt treating; I think it sufficiently appears that at Benson, at the "White Hart," where there was a committee-room, and where other things were going on, drink had been given away in a way that would certainly lead one to the conclusion that those who gave it away were meaning to get the popularity of the village for the party to which they belonged. And there was some evidence, though not much, that it was given away at the "Star," and there was distinct evidence also that it was given away at the "Horse and Harrow," and the "Sweet Home;" and, moreover, it appeared that the villagers and people round these places had an expectation, and flocked to the place in the expectation, that there would be drink given to them. There was some evidence on these matters, and there was also some evidence as to a place called the "Cottage" showing that on a smaller scale there was drink given away there.

Taking that alone, it certainly did seem that, by somebody or other, drink had been given away in Benson to such an extent that if it had been done by the Member or by the Member's agents, it would seem to have been done with the intention of producing an effect upon the election. Then to show that it was done by the Member's agents there was undoubtedly this: The "White Hart," the principal house there, was a house where Mr. Vickers had a committee-room, and the "White Hart" was kept by a man named Dearlove. It appears upon the election expenses returned that a sum of 20 l. 15 s. was paid to Dearlove of the "White Hart." It is put down in one lump sum in the voucher; Dearlove was called as a witness; I commented upon the fact that as to many of the witnesses, it was not known what they would say, but I do not complain of it as to Dearlove. Mr. Mereweather was justified in his remark, and Dearlove himself produced the full effect upon my mind, that Dearlove was not meaning to tell anything, and that he meant to keep back everything which he thought would do him harm; and doubtless he thought that he knew something that would do him harm. And this much appeared from him, that his account was asked for, his account which he had made out by the aid of a Mr. Benjamin Belcher, and it did seem as if that account had been passed simply upon the ground that he brought it in; and I should have thought that that went very far to show, if unexplained and uncontradicted, that Benjamin Belcher was accredited by the sitting Member, or by the sitting Member's canvassing agents, to this extent, that if he vouched for the amount that would be enough, and it would be paid without further question. And if it had stood there upon the Petitioner's case, I should have said that that convinced me that there was treating which would avoid the election.

But a further thing there was relied upon, showing that in this town of Wallingford there was a very great and heavy expense incurred no doubt by Mr. Child and Mr. Vickers, people living at the "George" and at the "Town Arms." Some evidence was given, very slight however, and I do not think such as I could rely upon, that previous to the election beer had been given away at the "Town Arms;" I do not think that that was anything that I could rely upon, and consequently I pass it by; but this much appears clear: that on the election day there was a dinner, or a luncheon, whichever you choose to call it, laid out at the "George," and that that dinner or luncheon was in point of fact consumed by a great many persons coming into the "George," among whom there may have been voters, and that besides that, there was a sum of 4*l.* 10*s.* paid to Stormer, the keeper of the "George," under the head of refreshments for poll-clerks, though this dinner was represented to be for them. Whether or no that amounted to treating would be another question. Taking these circumstances together unexplained, I should have thought it probable that they did amount to treating; I felt at the end of the Petitioner's case, "This requires explanation, and would amount to treating if not explained," but it was met by the evidence of the Respondent. Then it comes to this question, whether that evidence has been sufficient to rebut the evidence for the Petitioner altogether. Upon that I have had a great deal of difficulty.

The first thing we have had in evidence is this: Mr. Serjeant Ballantine called everyone who had been specially mentioned, and he was quite right in doing so; I do not mean merely to say that he was right as a man, but that he was perfectly right as an advocate also. Everything kept back would have been supposed to have been kept back for a purpose, and consequently he was right as an advocate. And the first thing, which did amount to a great deal, was done by calling Mr. Vickers and all the agents to establish, as far as the testimony of men could establish it, that they had intended the election to be pure; they swore to that positively, not merely that Mr. Vickers intended it, but that his people intended it; that would go for nothing if in fact those people had made it an impure election by treating; but it goes a great way in considering the question, whether or no the people who did treat were their agents to treat. They say that it was not intended that there should be anything of the sort. It is positively sworn by the agents (and I do not myself see any reason to doubt that it was sworn with perfect truth), that they took great care to prevent any treating whatever; and that they warned the different people connected with these places, that if it were done they would not pay for it; that they not only protested, as at an ordinary election, that they intended purity, but that when there was a hint of the contrary, they took pains to explain that it was not to be.

And then this appears, with reference to the great thing which seemed to show that at Benson there was systematic treating. There were called Mr. Belcher, and the corn merchant (Mr. Weller), and Mr. Newton, who would also account for some of the treating at Benson; and it was distinctly sworn that Belcher was not an agent or employed by Mr. Vickers at all (he was not a voter, because he was resident out of the parish), and his account was that he did give a portion of what was given at the "White Hart;" and according to his account, that was given by him for conviviality rather than for election purposes, and at the "Beehive" (I think it was), and the "Horse and Harrow," where it was clearly shown that there had been beer given away, to an extent which, if it had been done by the sitting Member or his agents, would have amounted to corrupt treating. Mr. Belcher distinctly proved that he gave 2*l.* at each of those places, out of his own pocket, which he most distinctly swore was out of his own pocket, and in no way paid or asked to be paid by Mr. Vickers's agents. He said that he had supplied that 2*l.* out of his own pocket as a treat to the villagers, and that Mr. Weller the corn merchant (who is in much the same position, but who is no doubt a friend to, and thought well of Mr. Vickers), supplied 2*l.* more at each of those places, and that that provided the drink that was given there. As to the "Cottage," there was not such distinct evidence as to the way in which they furnished the drink, but it was a smaller sum, 1*l.* 7*s.* I think probably it was furnished in much the same way; and if we think that Belcher speaks the truth, and that Weller speaks the truth, and that really they were not agents in any way to Mr. Vickers, not people whom he had put forward in such a position that they would have a claim to be repaid by him, anything which they might have advanced for the purpose, if that was so done, Mr. Vickers would not be responsible for that.

The case of the "White Hart," comes be more difficult to deal with for this reason. The answer to that is this: "Mr. Dearlove was distinctly told, and was told that it was meant, that he was not to advance drink, but Dearlove did advance drink, on a speculation of his own, that he would do so." I think it appears that that really was the case. "We were honest upon that, and when he sent in the bill, there was a committee-room which we had taken, and for which we had agreed the price was to be 15*l.* 15*s.*" I should have thought that a high price, but still prices are high on these occasions, and that was the agreed price. "We will pay the 15*l.* 15*s.*, and also what he has done for our committee clerks we will pay him for; but he cannot have done more than five pounds, that we will pay." That is the answer given, that they could not ascertain and make out the figures, but they believed that 5*l.* might be what was due for messengers and clerks, and other persons, and they paid that; nearly the same thing, it is alleged, occurred at the "George," where the 4*l.* is charged, that the messengers and clerks were to be paid for, and that they could not charge it accurately, but they fixed it as nearly as they could at 4*l.*

Now this brings the matter to a point of considerable difficulty; I should observe that the large bill which was subtracted by Mr. Vickers's agents for staying at the "George," and the "Town Arms," have explained I think to a large amount; Mr. Vickers brought down Mr. Child, and Mr. Child brought down his clerks, and besides that Mr. Vickers had friends down here, who were engaged in assisting him in the election, and who I daresay were not of any great use; I think I may venture to say that; and they living at the Wallingford.

“George” during that time, it does appear, looking at the bill, that these people lived extravagantly, that they drank, I will not say it was champagne, but what was charged as champagne; and had these these people been voters it would have been at once open to say that their living in that way was colour for bribing or treating them, or something of the sort; but this was not so; there may have been extravagance, and I think myself that there was extravagance; it was something like paying the bellringers and things of that sort, and if it had been done for the purpose of influencing a voter would have been treating, but it is extravagance that does not amount to treating.

The other comes to be the much more serious question, and now it comes to this point: At some of the public-houses there was beer drunk which they did not get paid for by the people who drank it. There was the case of a man who was called for the Petitioner's case, Wadsworth, who keeps the “Sun;” he had done that; his bill was refused. It seems that Mr. Newton there was a large farmer, and had got plenty of labourers, and that he chose to do something analogous to what Mr. Belcher did. On that day he gave an order that all his labourers, 50 or 60, should have beer, because they were his labourers, not because they were going to vote with him, as he says; and Mr. Wadsworth took upon himself to supply a considerable quantity of liquor and drink to voters and others, which if it had been subsequently adopted and paid for, or had been previously sanctioned by the sitting Member or his people, would have looked like treating, but that they refused to pay, and it has been sworn that the refusal to pay was bonâ fide. They say, “We do not intend to pay and will not pay,” and consequently, unless I am disposed to doubt that which they have so sworn, I must suppose that that was not a matter for which the sitting Member was responsible.

Then again it does come to this, that both at the “White Hart” and at the “Crown” there was meat and drink supplied, part of which at the “White Hart” Mr. Vickers refused positively to pay for; and there has been a sum not excessive, a sum of 5 l. in one case and of 4 l. in the other, paid upon a kind of rough estimate. “This may be about the sum; it is a handsome allowance for what you may have honestly done without amounting to anything like treating; we will pay for that, and not be responsible for anything more.”

Then comes the question, is that to be considered treating; and I have had considerable difficulty about it. I feel that in cases in which the candidate in fact pays anything, where there is any treating of this sort going on in public-houses, there is always a very considerable chance that there is, in fact, treating disguised under the form of something to be paid for messengers, clerks, and others. That is the one side; then, on the other side, it may very possibly be that this is not treating, but that it is real, true, and honest refreshment, and the sitting Member may be imperilled. The seat is unquestionably imperilled, and it brings on a Petition in consequence of his having a score at the public-house. I cannot lay it down as a general rule, that to have a score at a public-house does amount to treating. I can only say that, as a matter of prudence, I would strongly advise all candidates in future to have, under no pretence whatever, any score at all; let them pay their paid agents, handsomely if they like, and let the paid agents find themselves; let them pay them nothing at all to supply refreshments for the committeemen and those who act gratuitously; let the committeemen and others, if they wish to have any refreshment, pay for it themselves; if they do that, and the candidate avoids any score at a public-house, he will not be in any peril of having treating put upon him; but if he does allow a score he does peril the seat very much; and in this case Mr. Vickers's seat was perilled. Had this case not been met by the evidence of the Respondent, but had rested on the weakness of the Petitioner's case, I think I should have found that there had been treating, which would have avoided the election. But it was met. I have never doubted that Mr. Vickers did not mean that there should be treating; but I further come to the conclusion that nothing has been done by him or his agents which amounts to this; that any person for whom he was responsible as his agent has given meat or drink in such a manner or to such an extent that I ought to draw the conclusion that it was given to influence the election, which is what the Legislature means by corrupt treating. That Dearlove did, for instance, on speculation for himself, in fact, do that, I do not doubt. That the man Wadsworth, who keeps the “Sun,” did so on speculation, I do not doubt. That Belcher and Weller did do what, if done by an agent for Mr. Vickers, would have amounted to corrupt treating, I do not doubt also. But, taking it altogether, I do not think that they were so connected with Mr. Vickers in the manner in which they were employed in doing those acts as to lead me to believe that they were agents acting for him to such an extent that for what they did, Mr. Vickers should be responsible, and lose his seat.

This is one of the cases where I have had very great doubt and hesitation in making up my mind. But in all such cases we must come to the conclusion, upon matters of fact, from which one judge will draw one conclusion and another will draw another. In the present case, I come to the conclusion that there is not enough to avoid Mr. Vickers's seat. Consequently I need not say that I shall certify that no bribery or corrupt practice of that sort was proved in the election by anyone; that I think that Mr. Vickers was duly elected, and that the election must therefore stand.

With regard to the costs, they must follow the ordinary rule, that where there is no reason to the contrary, the costs must abide the event, and the Petitioner will therefore have to pay the Respondent's costs.

Sir

Sir Wentworth Dilke.] I desire, my Lord, to tender you my best thanks for the patience you have shown in this case. If it is not incompatible with propriety I would ask permission to make a statement.

Wallingford.

Mr. Justice Blackburn.] If you wish to say anything that will explain any matter in connection with your conduct, I should be happy to hear it.

Sir Wentworth Dilke.] This is all, my Lord. The witness Dearlove stated that he had received from me or my party (I could not quite understand his evidence) on a former occasion, the sum of 50 l., I beg to state that, after making the best inquiries I could in the interim, I believe it to be absolutely untrue.

Mr. Justice Blackburn.] I think that very probable.

WARRINGTON ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Baron Martin, 4 February 1869.

Warrington.

Mr. Baron Martin.] I AM of opinion upon the evidence before me that this is not a void election. What occurred was this; there was no fraud in anyone. A man was appointed to be poll-clerk (upon the resignation of another man), who was deemed fit for the post. The gentleman who was first examined selected Mr. Dickson, and it is clear that it was an honest selection. He believed at the time that Dickson was a proper and fit person to take the poll. He went to the booth and took his seat in a place which was said to be not the usual place, and I daresay that was so. Upon Mr. Harrison going there in the course of the morning, he removed Dickson from the corner where he was sitting to the middle, which was a better place. It was stated by Mr. Price that it was entirely through the fault of this man that the poll was not properly taken. That is not a correct statement of the fact. The truth is, that the persons who did the wrong (if you can call it a wrong) were the persons who went to vote; they rushed up to the poll, and, instead of going in one by one steadily, there was a rush made, and a crowd in front of the poll-clerk, holding up their tickets for him to take, and thrusting them over on to the book. Now the ticket is merely given to the voters, to enable them to vote with greater ease, but it has nothing to do with the voting. Properly speaking, the poll-clerk ought to have nothing to do with tickets, but to take from the mouth of the voter "for whom" he votes, and his number on the register, and his address. Therefore, to say that this was entirely the fault of Dickson, is wrong. It was quite as much the fault of those persons who were crowding up to him, and presenting their tickets in such a manner as to prevent him from taking them one by one. I say nothing with regard to the gentlemen who were there; they meant not to do anything wrong; but Mr. Lowe ought never to have taken a ticket from a voter; he was not the man to poll; the man to poll was the voter, and instead of letting him go to the poll-clerk, he took the tickets, professing to say for whom the man voted. Do not suppose that I mean to insinuate that Mr. Lowe meant wrong, or any of the other gentlemen who were there; but it was Mr. Lowe—the gentlemen with him—and the voters, as well as Dickson, who were the parties to the irregularity which unfortunately took place. Then the question is, is it to be declared a void election? How can it be so declared? Supposing that this happened to half-a-dozen, where there are 2,000 or 3,000 voters, are all their votes to be set aside, and the election declared void? It would be, in my opinion, ridiculous to say, that because at one booth there was an irregularity, the whole of the rest of the borough should be put to the trouble of a new election, and all that has taken place declared null and void. I adhere to what was said by Mr. Justice Willes, in his judgment in the Lichfield case, that a judge, to upset an election, ought to be satisfied beyond all doubt, that the election was void; that the return of a Member was a serious matter, and not lightly to be set aside.

I am of opinion, that this is not a void election, and that, instead of doing justice, I should be doing the grossest injustice, if upon the evidence before me, I were to set it aside. I regret that the votes of the persons omitted were it not taken at the poll; but that is no reason why I am to lay down that because there was confusion at one of the polling booths for an hour or so, the whole election is to be upset. If Mr. Price's argument be correct, the same might be used, notwithstanding the other candidate had got a majority of hundreds. With regard to Mr. Dewhurst, the Act of Parliament enacts, that the returning officer shall appoint a clerk to take the poll; and in a subsequent part of the Act it is stated that the poll-clerk is, at the conclusion of the election, to seal up the poll-books, and publicly deliver them to the returning officer. It is therefore clear, that the person to take the poll, is the poll clerk, and it is the duty of all persons who go to vote, to ascertain who that poll-clerk is, and they must take the trouble to inquire. If they make a mistake or commit an error, would it not be monstrous to hold that their votes should be considered as taken when they were tendered, not to the poll-clerk, but to another person who stood by?

Warrington.

What a door that would open to fraud, although I see none in this case. It is plain that the Act of Parliament means that it is to the clerk whom the returning officer has appointed to take the poll, that the communication of the will of the voter must be made, and that the communication of that will to any other person will not do. As to saying that what may have been said was said loud enough for others to hear, that might have been so, but I think it would be an improper and wrong thing to hold that a communication made by a voter to a person not the poll-clerk could be considered a legal tender of his vote. I am therefore of opinion that Mr. Dewhurst's vote was badly tendered, and cannot be taken into the calculation. So far as that goes, you have my decision.

After a short adjournment,

Mr. Price.] My Lord, after the interval which your Lordship has kindly given us to consider our position, I will trouble you with a very few words. From the evidence which has been laid before the Court, I think that your Lordship will agree with me that my clients, the electors of Warrington, had good reason to complain of a grievance in the last election, and that that grievance has been, to a certain extent, substantiated, and that we had good cause therefore for seeking to have that grievance remedied, in the only way the law points out, because the notion of the electors bringing an action against the returning officer would be a very invidious thing to do, and not the right course to pursue.

That being so, I have now to consider your Lordship having decided that although in respect of some of them they had such a grievance as you would have remedied by amending the return to the extent of placing their names upon the poll book, yet with regard to several others, you do not think that they have made out a case to have their grievance remedied in the same way; that, therefore, the result would be, so far as the amending of the return was concerned, simply that the present Member, Mr. Rylands, would remain as the Member for the borough. Everyone perfectly well knows that all these inquiries create and keep up a great amount of political excitement in a borough long after the election, and the sooner anything of that kind is put an end to it is a very great blessing to all parties. And I have also considered the position in which I now stand, as counsel for the Petitioners, with respect to the other allegations in their petition. As your Lordship knows, and nobody more so from the immense experience which you have had, I can only speak of the result of any case from the instructions given me; I can only tell what it is upon paper. And although, my Lord, I consider that I have a sufficiently strong case to present to you, on which I should have a perfect right to ask for your Lordship's deliberate judgment, I have taken into account the circumstances in which I now stand, and I have given my clients the best advice I can; and I think, my Lord, that in view of the fact that if Mr. Rylands were unseated, and I, as counsel against him, have a right to say that I believe he would be unseated, there is at the same time a determination, and a very proper one and very natural one, on the part of those who oppose Mr. Greenall, to go into what is called a recriminatory case, which would involve an inquiry prolonged far beyond the time that your Lordship could devote to this case at present, and as it would be prolonged at very considerable expense in money to the parties, and as it would be prolonged at what is very much worse, at considerable expense to the harmony and good feeling of this borough for an almost indefinite time, I have taken upon myself, telling your Lordship candidly, as I am sure you will believe as candidly, that having a case against Mr. Rylands, which I should have no hesitation in putting before your Lordship, I say I have, nevertheless, taken upon myself the responsibility, as the counsel for the Petitioners, to say, that having submitted, as they must submit, to your Lordship's judgment this morning upon their very reasonable grievance (for they have made it out); under all these circumstances, they will take the best course for themselves, and for their neighbours and for their friends, and for both the candidates, if they say that they decline to go further into the case, as to Mr. Rylands being unseated. Having taken upon myself that responsibility, a responsibility which I know that your Lordship thinks all counsel ought to take upon themselves, to do the best they can for their clients, and to advise them not only as advocates, but having in view these particular circumstances, with all consequences and all possible results,—I have taken upon myself the responsibility of advising my clients to go no further with this case, not, I repeat again, from any fear with regard to the case which is presented to me, but simply because I believe that it is the wisest and most prudent course with regard to the borough and its future interests.

Mr. Baron Martin.] I have no doubt that you have taken a prudent course, the judiciousness of which you alone can know. I must say it is exceedingly creditable to Mr. Greenall that he abandons, for the reasons you have stated, a contention in which he thinks he has a reasonable hope of success, with the view of preventing further litigation and probably bad feeling in the borough. I know nothing more than what you state to me, but I do not entertain a doubt that you are exercising a wise judgment in the matter.

The only thing that remains for me to deal with is the question of costs. I had made up my mind that if the Mayor had been put to costs, he must be paid them. Therefore, if any costs have been incurred by him, he ought to be re-imbursed. But with respect to this petition, I am of opinion that both parties should pay their own costs. I think it reasonable reasonable when this occurred at the booth, persons might be desirous that the matter should be brought before the proper tribunal.

I entertain no doubt of the propriety of my decision, but it has occurred to me that I ought to add, that no complaint was made of this man during the day when this occurrence took place. I do not say I doubt, for I think it is true, that he did not perform his duty as he ought to have done, but I must say that others were quite as much to blame as he.

Mr. Price.] There is evidence that complaint was made to Mr. Lawrence.

Mr. Baron Martin.] But not to the Mayor.

Mr. Quain.] I was going to call Mr. Lawrence, who would show that the complaint was rectified, and that he took those cards.

Mr. Baron Martin.] It was the Mayor I was thinking of; I am not at all saying that there was not a miscarriage at the booth, but that it was not of that serious character, which certainly it must be for the purpose of avoiding the election. My opinion as to costs is, that if the Mayor has been put to any costs by reason of the petition against him, he ought to have them. But with regard to the party petitioned against, I think that each should bear his own costs; I think it was a reasonable and fair petition.

The formal judgment will be that Peter Rylands was duly elected and returned, and that the election was not void. I think that that is the only matter to which I have to call attention. As to the allegations of bribery, there has been no bribery proved at all, and no treating.

I can only further say that there is not the slightest pretence for any action lying against the Mayor. You might as well bring an action against me.

Mr. Price.] I never said a word about it, except that the statute thrusts upon us the necessity of making the returning officer the Respondent.

Warrington.

WESTBURY ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Willes, 5 February 1869.

Westbury.

Mr. Justice Willes.] THIS is a petition praying that it might be declared that Mr. Phipps was not duly elected or returned, and that the election was null and void, and that the Petitioner, Abraham Laverton, was duly elected, and ought to have been returned. The latter part of the prayer has been abandoned by the notice given on the part of Mr. Laverton; he does not claim the seat, and the question remaining upon the petition is, principally, whether or not the election was a valid or a void election, but secondarily, in consequence of the seat having been claimed, whether proof by way of recrimination has been given to such an extent as to amount to a conviction of Mr. Laverton, of one of the offences which would impose upon him penalties under the statutes made against corrupt practices. The former is the main—the latter, since the abandonment of the claim to the seat, has become a collateral inquiry, but one which it was necessary, and I am far from saying it was not proper, to pursue to the end.

With respect to the question whether the election was valid or void, that depends upon the effect to be given to a great mass of evidence, directed to show that Mr. Phipps, either personally or by one or more of his agents, was guilty of corrupt practices at the election. The effect of proving that Mr. Phipps was personally guilty, or cognizant, of any corrupt practice at the election, would have been to disqualify that gentleman in various ways, not only to deprive him of his seat, but to fix upon him the discredit of being incapable of voting at any election, or of holding any judicial office, involving the striking of his name out of the commission of the peace, where I presume it is at present, and also involving his being incapable for seven years of representing this or any other borough in Parliament; I at once say, I think the case against Mr. Phipps personally has, I will not say wholly, failed, because there was a case requiring an answer, but I will say has been entirely and satisfactorily answered. There is no ground whatsoever for imputing to Mr. Phipps any corrupt practice, and I entirely believe in his statement, that he did not intend that any such practice should be committed in his name, or on his behalf.

There was then a charge against his son, Mr. Phipps, junior, and a great variety of persons who were alleged to have been Mr. Phipps' agents, including two persons, one named Walling, and the other named Joseph Harrop. With respect to Mr. Phipps, jun., I must equally acquit him as I have done Mr. Phipps his father; and with respect to the other agents, except those two whom I have named, it appears to me that the charges made against them respectively, have been sufficiently answered, and I do not think they require any further observation, besides those made upon them in the course of the case; some of them have been withdrawn, others of them have been presented and disposed of in the course of the case; it would be tedious to go through them, and it is not my duty to deal with them any further.

With respect to the case of Walling, it is right that I should observe, in passing, I think he conducted himself in a manner which, if he be a person of right feeling, he will deeply, and I hope sincerely repent, because there can be no doubt he allowed his angry feeling, to say the least of it, to get possession of him to an extent which induced him to write two letters, one, I think, on the 31st of August, and the other, I think, on the 24th of October, which being written and not being repented of, would leave a stigma upon any man, however high his previous character may have been, the stigma of being a person not merely angry, but angry to the extent of being vindictive. The case of Walling is so mixed up with the case of Mr. Barnes, who appears to have rescued Eyres the voter, against whom Walling's indignation appears to have been excited, that it would be impossible, I think, to extricate the one case from the other. I could not well report Walling without reporting Barnes; I could not well report Barnes without reporting Walling. If I were satisfied as to the one it would seem necessarily to follow I must be so satisfied that I must report the other, and, I think, I can at present arrive conscientiously, in the case of Eyres, at the conclusion of "not proven." I by no means make the observation upon Barnes after his explanation of this morning, which I should have been prepared to do if that explanation had not been offered, and I am happy that I did not allow the impression, which it must have been perceived was on my mind yesterday evening, to weigh me to a conclusion, without asking to hear Mr. Barnes again; I leave the case of Walling with these remarks.

With respect to the case of Mr. Joseph Harrop, that requires some careful consideration. I am deeply conscious of the serious character of the question raised for decision by the conduct of that gentleman in the course of the election; I hope I feel the extreme importance of the case, and the deep responsibility which the law imposes upon me in deciding it. I am satisfied, however, that the clearness of the conviction upon which I act is all but equivalent to the sense of the responsibility which I feel. I must proceed to pronounce that conviction, and to explain my reasons for arriving at it in the best manner I can. I cannot take the conduct of Mr. Joseph Harrop with respect to anyone of those individual men as standing by itself; I cannot look at his conduct as being the single act of an angry person dealing with one voter who was under his influence; I must look at the whole of it together. I must not only look at the fact that in the latter end of the month of October he resorted to a course which has been correctly summed up by my brother Parry as amounting to this: that he threatened never to employ again any workman of his who voted for Mr. Laverton, his rival in trade, but I must remember that he was working at the same object from the very dawn of the election. Taking his own account, and I should be satisfied in this case to be judged of in the decision at which I arrive by any person who took Mr. Harrop's own account of the matter, although I am far from thinking that I ought to depend upon his account only, that I ought to take the account of a person who was actuated by passion of a not commendable character with respect to what did not so much concern him, because he was in a good position, and it did not affect his livelihood, against the evidence of persons whose memory has been sharpened by the pain of what they endured. Taking his own account, at an early period when he found it possible or probable that Mr. Laverton, his rival in trade, against whom he entertained an angry feeling, was likely to come forward as a candidate for the borough, he began interrogating his men as to whom they were likely to vote for. It does not require any very great amount of reasoning to come to the conclusion that he thought that the majority of those men were likely to vote for Mr. Laverton in the event of his setting up as a candidate; and he appears to have asked them, as he represents in a casual sort of way, whether they were going to vote at the election; and at that time, the election being far off, the men apparently not having made up their minds, or if they had, not being desirous to communicate to their master what might be disagreeable to him, and produce uncomfortable consequences for them, the men, or some of them, appear to have told him they did not intend to vote at all. He commended their resolution, and according to his own account he treated it as a promise made by the men to him that they would not vote, the breach of which afterwards by two or more of them he thought proper to treat as a piece of untruthfulness which rendered them unworthy to be any longer in his employ. He early extracted, as he says, a promise from his men that they should not vote at the election. As matters rolled on, he appears to have been applied to to be upon Mr. Phipps' committee, he was willing to join, and he was upon it from the beginning, his name appears in the three editions of the committee; he did attend at meetings and took part, such part as the committee took, in the business that was done in the room; and moreover, treating the promise made by his men at the first as being a one-sided promise to be kept by them without any corresponding promise on his own part to adopt the course which he considered would be wise for the workmen, he appears to have commenced canvassing on the part of Mr. Phipps, not canvassing out of his place of business, it is true, but canvassing within his place of business and according to his own account, canvassing the men of the class whom he says he had engaged not to vote at all at the election, and some of them who voted afterwards for Mr. Laverton, and would not give up their intention of doing so, he charged with untruthfulness. What strange inconsistencies people's angry passions bring them to! I pass over that; it was necessary to comment upon it; I do not do so out of even incivility towards Mr. Harrop, but in the course of my duty as showing that one of the reasons which he suggested other than that of desiring to influence the men in the sense of intimidation, namely, the fact that they had proved themselves to be untruthful men, is a thin guise, entirely transparent, which cannot for one moment prevent anyone from seeing the truth: Mr. Harrop proceeded to canvass his men to vote for Mr. Phipps. In the course of that canvass am I to suppose that his wishes that his men should vote for Mr. Phipps had not become known? Am I to imagine that the men seeing Mr. Phipps's carriage come up to Mr. Harrop's from time to time, and no doubt seeing his name on the placards in the streets, were not aware that their master wished them to vote for Mr. Phipps? Am I to suppose that he did not canvass, on the part of Mr. Phipps, as effectually as he could every person who, he thought, could be induced to vote for that gentleman? I am satisfied he did, and if I am asked for proof that this was so, I would point to the account given both by Millard and by Mr. Harrop himself of the conversation with Millard. Mr. Harrop begins it by saying, "I did not know you had a vote;" Millard says, "Oh, yes, I have had a vote for some time." Mr. Harrop says, "Oh, I was not aware of that," and then immediately following is the conversation with reference to Millard's voting. I must arrive at the conclusion, and I do so, that Mr. Harrop did canvass for Mr. Phipps, and if I arrive at that conclusion before I proceed to what took place at the end of October, it is right to consider whether in doing so he acted as agent for Mr. Phipps; I cannot avoid the conclusion that he did. For an agent to bind another, it is not necessary that there should be any payment; it is only necessary that the act done by the agent upon which the question arises, whether it is to bind the principal, should be an act done by the procurement of the principal, and there can be no doubt that, so far as the act of canvassing went, Mr. Phipps not only did desire Mr. Harrop to canvass for him, but he also did convey (whether expressly or impliedly, whether by words or actions, is quite immaterial,) that desire to Mr. Harrop. The evidence amounts to this, that Mr. Harrop, desiring to canvass his own men, Mr. Phipps did say, "Pray, go and canvass your own men for me," though I do not at all say that those words were the words which actually passed. If Mr. Phipps said they did not, I should believe that they did not. Yet that passed which was equivalent to them; whether by words or actions, it was expressed, "Pray, canvass your men in my interest." Then, canvassing, I need hardly say, may be either by asking a man to vote for the candidate for whom you are canvassing, or if you find him unwilling to do that, begging of him not to go to the poll, but to remain neutral, and not vote for the adversary. No distinction can be drawn, except in the amount of favour between voting for a man and abstaining from voting for his adversary. That such is the law as well as the common sense of the matter appears from the Act so often referred to, "The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854," which places upon the same footing inducing a man to vote at the election and inducing a man to abstain from voting at the election. This introduces the last scene of what passed between Mr. Harrop and his men. Mr. Harrop having canvassed for Mr. Phipps, and induced as many as he could to promise to vote for him, as they afterwards did, with the exception of three, Mr. Harrop thought there was another, but he could not name him. There were certain men in his employ who were determined to vote for Mr. Laverton, having promised him their votes; those men were Mark Millard, Alfred Toup, Samuel Grist, Joseph Francis, and George Oatridge: and there was one man who wished to remain neutral, namely, John Humphries. I will first take the neutral man, John Humphries. He did not desire to vote at all. I do not know whether it was his manner, or whether it is the manner of the persons in this neighbourhood; but I thought there was something piteous in the way in which Humphries described what took place between him and his master. He was unwilling to vote at all. He desired not to vote; then he is put upon with soft language: "Could you go against your employer; would not you vote for me, if I wanted two or three votes just at the end, towards four o'clock?" and at length, whether by conviction produced by argument or by persuasion, or whether really under fear of what might follow, I leave to others to judge, he is at last induced to give a reluctant consent by saying, "Well, I do not think I could."

he

We thus pass through the neutral ground, and we arrive at what occurred with those persons whose names I have mentioned, and who afterwards voted for Mr. Laverton. They were all in Mr. Harrop's employ till towards the latter end of October, and they all had to leave his employment before the election. They all intended to vote for Mr. Laverton, and that coming to the knowledge of Mr. Harrop, he brought them before him, and what passed between them did amount in substance to this: "I have determined that no man shall remain in my employment who votes for Mr. Laverton, and you shall have no further employment from me if you vote for Mr. Laverton." He does not appear, with the exception, I think, of Francis and Oatridge, to have asked affirmatively, "Will you vote for Mr. Phipps?" but he knew that the men had promised Mr. Laverton; he may have thought that it was in vain to do more than request them to be neutral, or he may have thought, if he had swayed them so far as to dissuade them from fulfilling their promise to vote for Mr. Laverton, that he might have further succeeded in inducing them to vote for Mr. Phipps. I cannot pay any attention to that topic taken in connection with the other circumstances to which I have referred.

Mark Millard was a person who had been three years in the employ of Mr. Harrop; he appears to have had his discharge (because as to his discharge there can be no doubt) upon the 31st of October; the receipt for his plant is dated the 31st of October. Alfred Toup was eight or nine years in the employ; Samuel Grist was six years in the employ; he was brought up, I think he said, or discharged, upon the 27th of October. There was a letter of the 28th of October from the manager, Mr. Futtrell, if I caught the name rightly.

Mr. Cole.] Grist's letter is the 28th of October.

Mr. Justice Willes.] A letter of the 28th of October, requesting him to send in the plant which he had of Mr. Harrop's, and upon which the work was to be done. As to Grist and Millard, therefore, they are confirmed, as it appears to me, by written documents, contemporaneous, showing that theirs was a case of actual discharge disabling them from remaining any longer in the service. Francis is a person who had worked as a washer for some five months; he appears to have gone on the 27th of October. I agree with my brother Parry that the evidence as to Francis is not so strong as to an actual discharge, as in the case of the men whose names I have already mentioned. At the same time, I can feel no doubt that that man went, because he felt it was no use for him to try to stay. The next is George Oatridge, who had been cleaning the ironwork for three years, and who was spoken to six weeks before the election, to "look himself over," and who was spoken to three weeks before the election again, to "look himself over;" and, I think, to see his wife before he concluded, and who, according to Mr. Harrop, promised to vote for Mr. Phipps; but after thinking over it in the night, probably, if one can judge from an expression of the wife, under her advice, he determined to stand to his promise to vote for Mr. Laverton, and when he came the next day he stated to Mr. Harrop that he had changed his mind, and would keep his promise to vote for Mr. Laverton; that man also went. Then there was his wife, who was there for 12 months; she stated that she was turned off, and I have heard no contradiction of that; and there can be no doubt upon my mind that she was sent away.

Now, what happened to the rest of the men? It appears there were seven men who voted for Mr. Phipps. Those seven men remained and continued to have work. There were three men remained who voted for Mr. Laverton, and those were Robert Reeves, Alfred Matlock, and William Bennett. Upon hearing that, it occurred to my mind, "Well, it may be a harsh judgment upon Mr. Harrop; he may not have been so bad as he seems. I ought to be cautious, and judges and juries do well to be cautious of acting upon the evidence of discharged servants, because ordinarily there are no people who are more disposed to exaggerate against their master; and a person who has to act upon the evidence of discharged servants ought to be exceedingly cautious how he believes every word that they say." I do not think that that is applicable to the men here. I believe that they gave a substantially true account of what took place. Bearing that in mind, and seeing that three people who voted for Mr. Laverton were retained in Mr. Harrop's employ, I became desirous of seeing whether he really did repent after all, and allow the men to have their own way; but, upon inquiry, it turns out that Robert Reeves was an exceedingly useful man, who had been in the employment a considerable time, a sort of foreman; that William Bennett had also been there a considerable time, and when I came to inquire into the case of Alfred Matlock, Mr. Harrop stated (and his candour in stating so did him credit; whatever discredit attaches to him in the transaction, certainly does not at all attach to the mode in which he avowed his reasons for keeping those men, because he said he wished to explain, and he gave a fair and candid explanation of it): "They remained in my employ because I had heard of legal proceedings against me, and took advice," and finally he said with respect to Grist, whose case I selected to test him by, having in my mind that letter asking for the plant, "I did send Grist away because of his not sticking to his promise not to vote at the election." Now, Mr. Harrop suggested against Millard, but not against the other men, that working for Mr. Laverton was or may have been the ground of dismissal; that could not have been the ground as to all; it was said to apply to Millard; Millard denied it, and there was no attempt made to prove that Millard did any such thing. Then it was suggested that it was untruthful to vote at all, after having first said that he would not vote, but I have said enough about that. The notion of saying that a man is untruthful, because he says months before the election, "I have made up my mind not to vote," and then when the excitement of the election comes he says, "Well, I have changed my mind, circumstances have occurred to make me change my mind, and I will vote"—to say that the man is untruthful is to say that a wise and truthful man never changes his mind, which would be about as silly an assertion as a man could well make. Then it was suggested by Mr. Harrop that those men or some of them left voluntarily; I hardly know how to deal with that; many a man does a thing voluntarily which he does not do willingly: a man may run away to avoid a great danger when he would rather not run away, but go quietly on unassailed in the other direction; a man may voluntarily take to his small boat in the middle of the ocean, because his ship is on fire; and a man may leave the service of an angry master upon his own feet, and by the exercise of his own will upon his muscles, without being carried out or without being taken by the shoulder and thrust out. But a man who acts so, although in one sense he goes voluntarily, in another does not go voluntarily; I think he may be said to do the thing by voluntary action, but not to do it willingly. It was well expressed more than two thousand years ago, when one did a thing which he disliked, under influence which he could not resist, that he did it "willing, with an unwilling mind." There was a compulsion put upon upon these men, which they could not resist; I cannot think that they, having been so long working for Mr. Harrop alone, some of them for years, and all of them for a considerable time, and earning their livelihood in his place, would have abandoned that livelihood of their own free-will, and I am satisfied that all these men would have remained in the employment but for their having promised to vote for Mr. Laverton, and I am satisfied that they would now be working for Mr. Harrop if they had changed their minds as he willed, and had voted for Mr. Phipps.

The next question is, whether this conduct of Mr. Harrop does amount to undue influence within the statute of the 17th and 18th of the Queen; whether it was intimidation within the 5th section of that statute. If he had threatened the lives or limbs of the men, there could be no doubt of that. That would have been within the section; but I do not know that it is mere poetry to say, for it might well occur to the mind of a man working for his bread:

“ You take my life,
“ When you do take the means whereby I live.”

A man who is sent out to live upon the charity of his fellow-workmen, or to go to the workhouse with his family, unless he does a particular thing, is intimidated; but is that an intimidation within the section? Now, I shall deal with this as I am bound to do, as a dry matter of law, and I shall deal with it very shortly, because it admits of being so dealt with. The Act with respect to corrupt practices strikes at three different classes of such practices. The 2nd and the 3rd sections forbid influencing men by mercenary motives, or their love of gain and reward. The 4th section forbids appeals to men's gluttony and meaner appetites. The 5th section forbids, in the terms which have been referred to, appealing to a man's fears by means of violence or intimidation. The Act speaks for itself. It says, that “ every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself, or by any other person on his behalf, make use of, or threaten to make use of, any force, violence, or restraint, or inflict or threaten the infliction, by himself, or by or through any other person, of any injury, damage, harm, or loss.” Upon those words a question might arise whether they are not to be understood in a strict sense, and whether you must not only show damage, but damage the result of some injury for which an action might be maintained at law, and it might be pleaded as to these words, that the damage resulting from being dismissed from an employment where the master had a legal right to dismiss was not a damage coming within that description, and therefore not within the statute. I need not, however, express any opinion upon that, because the following words are large enough to include every sort of intimidation, every sort of conduct which would operate upon the mind of another, and terrify or alarm him into doing what the person misconducting himself willed, against his own free-will, because the words are, “ or in any other manner practise intimidation upon or against any person, in order to induce or compel such person to vote or refrain from voting, or on account of such person having voted or refrained from voting.”

If any argument were necessary to induce me to hold that a threat of dismissal from employment which is beneficial to a man, in which he had as it were a good-will, and which he might fairly suppose would be continued as it previously was, unless he misconducted himself, that argument is supplied by the 2nd clause of the 2nd section relating to bribery; because amongst other things which are made bribery, is the promising “ to procure,” or endeavouring “ to procure any office, place, or employment, to or for any voter.” And reading the 5th section by the light thrown upon it by the 2nd, I can have no doubt that that which it would be bribery to promise the enjoyment of, it is in this case at least, and with reference to these circumstances, intimidation to threaten the deprivation of. The thing answers to common sense, and it seems to be within the intention of the Legislature, whether you take the general language of the 5th section by itself, or whether you refer for interpretation to the provisions of the 2nd clause of the 2nd section.

I must conclude with respect to this branch, therefore, by saying that in my opinion Mr. Harrop did violate the 5th section of the Act of Parliament, not only by intimidating the men whom he did dismiss, in order to compel them if he could to vote for Mr. Phipps, or to abstain from voting for Mr. Laverton, but that he did also intimidate indirectly all the other men in his employment to induce them to vote for Mr. Phipps, and not to vote for Mr. Laverton.

The only other question remaining is as to the effect of the violation by an agent of Mr. Phipps of the provisions of the 5th section by intimidation. What is the effect of intimidation, such as has been referred to, upon the election? Here I must observe that I do not treat this—indeed, I believe I have already observed that I do not treat this as a single case of intimidation—I must treat it as part of a system which continued throughout the time that Mr. Harrop was, in the sense I have described, and, as I think, within the meaning of the Act, an agent for Mr. Phipps for the purpose of canvassing. The question as to the effect upon the election depends first of all upon the common law of Parliament, and secondly upon the true construction of the 36th section. I entertain no doubt that, if I were asked to decide, I should decide in accordance with what has been laid down already in cases of this description, and especially laid down by my brother Martin, in whose opinion upon the subject I entirely concur. I can entertain no doubt that by the common law of Parliament a single bribe given by an agent at an election did have the effect of avoiding the election. I need certainly not look into any book upon the subject to ascertain that general bribery would avoid an election. Furthermore, I entertain no doubt that the doctrine laid down and acted upon by my brother Martin is correct, that a single bribe by an agent does avoid the election. It does not fix the candidate with penal consequences, it simply says, that for the public good, in order that the agents employed by candidates may be deterred from resorting to undue means, for the purpose of procuring their election, as a matter of public policy, an election in which an agent has so misconducted himself, shall be void; not to punish the candidate, although it so indirectly operates, but to protect the public, and to prevent the like practices, if possible, for the future.

But it is said there is a distinction between bribery and undue influence and treating, and that difference is said to exist in several particulars. Now, looking at this Act of Parliament, I think it will be found that if the plain primâ facie meaning was put upon it, one would suppose that it was intended that all corrupt practices should have the law equally applied to them: "If any candidate at any election for any county, city, or borough, shall be declared by any Election Committee guilty, by himself or his agents, of bribery, treating, or undue influence" (undue influence being already defined by the 5th section) "at such election, such candidate shall be incapable of being elected or sitting in Parliament for such county, city, or borough during the Parliament then in existence."

It is said that that section is inapplicable for several reasons: first, because a single act of undue influence ought not to prevail; that it is hard that Mr. Phipps should be liable for Mr. Harrop's conduct. Well, that is undoubtedly true. As I have already said, the law deals in this instance with the validity of the election, and does not deal with the penalties imposed upon the candidate.

Then it is said that a single act of undue influence by an agent ought not to defeat the election. I find no such limitation in the 36th section. I find that the candidate and his agents are put upon the same footing. The section says, "If any candidate" "or his agents, be guilty of bribery, treating, or undue influence." I will take an illustration. I will not suppose this of Mr. Phipps, because I believe that he is incapable of it, and I believe that he would be as indignant at undue influence being used by others as he is incapable of using it himself. I will suppose it of an imaginary candidate. I will suppose that a candidate at an election is a manufacturer—I will not take Mr. Laverton either, I must take a person somewhat in the position of Mr. Harrop—I will suppose that such an employer informs all persons in his employ (who may be 500 hands, or more), "I shall discharge every man who does not vote for me;" or, "I shall discharge every man who votes for that person who has injured me so deeply." Can I for a moment suppose that a candidate who does an act of that kind is to have any sympathy, or that the law did not intend an election to be void at which such misconduct was proved to have taken place? But if I must hold (and I should do so unhesitatingly) that an election was void which was so influenced by the Member it is inevitable that it must equally be void under the 36th section, if the undue influence was exercised by an agent, because the 36th section says, "or his agents."

Next it is said that it is left in the discretion of the judge to say how much undue influence shall or shall not affect the election. That is impossible. The 11th section of the Act under which I sit is imperative. I have no discretion either one way or the other. I must pronounce for the truth as I believe it upon the facts, and for the law, as I best know it, upon questions of law.

Further it is said that to put that construction upon the 36th section, that this election which has gone by is avoided, would be begging the question, because section 36 means that "if any candidate at an election for any county, city, or borough shall be declared by any election committee guilty, by himself or his agents, of bribery, treating, or undue influence at such election, such candidate shall in futuro be incapable of being elected or sitting in Parliament for such county, city, or borough during the Parliament then in existence." That is the argument, and it is no doubt a plausible one, and it was one which passed through my mind when I first had to consider the section (which of course I did before venturing upon these duties, and with the greater assiduity, because of the necessity of pronouncing a determination upon the spur of the moment); but the answer which I gave to that in my own mind is this:—It is in truth a begging of the question, to say that it is a begging of the question, because the question here is not merely whether Mr. Phipps shall in futuro be capable of being elected, but whether he shall in futuro be capable of "sitting" in Parliament in respect of what took place at the election which has gone by; therefore, the inquiry must be in respect of what took place at or concerning the election which has gone by, and to say that it is begging the question, therefore, is only another form of that mode of begging the question which is forbidden by the legal maxim that you can never set up, as an exception or objection, a thing the validity of which is in question. For the benefit of those who do not recollect this maxim in its original form, I will state it: "Non debet adduci exceptio ejusdem rei cujus petitur dissolutio"; it is quite obvious, therefore, that the begging of the question would be in not treating that section as applicable to the election in question.

It was said, fourthly, the influence to defeat the election must be influence operating as a kind of terror. I do not wish to use strong language, but there was a terror, more or less, whether it be more or less, still a terror, amounting to intimidation at Mr. Harrop's factory for some time before the election, and a strong feeling that men would be be dealt with differently, according as they voted the one way or the other, which feeling produced by illegitimate means is to be prevented, and the persons who are likely to feel it are to be protected by the law.

The next argument was that Mr. Harrop did it not as agent, that although he were an agent and did intimidate under the 5th section, he did not intimidate as agent, and that therefore his principal is not bound; and it was said, and very well said, by way of illustration of that view, that although a master is answerable for a negligent act of his servant in the course of his employment, he is not answerable for his wilful and spiteful act for his own purpose, not in the course of his employment; and that might be carried further, because a master would not be liable to some person run over by his carriage driven by his coachman upon some errand of his own, entirely out of the scope of the employment of the master. There can be no doubt of that; but I might put, on the other hand, a variety of cases in which a principal is held liable even civilly for an act of his agent which he never intended, and at which he is exceedingly displeased: the case of a bank held liable for the fraud of a manager or clerk; the case of a person who employs a man to navigate his boat for hire, held liable for the infringement of a ferry by the boatmen without his authority and against his will; and a case which occurred in London in the rivalry between the omnibuses, where the proprietor of an omnibus was held liable for the wilful act of his coachman in cutting in before another omnibus and injuring the vehicle and the horses, and I think, one of the passengers, for the purpose of getting a fare, having in his mind at the time the compound motive of effecting his own spiteful desire, and at the same time of getting before the other omnibus to get a fare for his master; a case very much considered in the Exchequer Chamber, and which was held by a large majority of the judges to be a case of liability; or I might put even the more apposite case of a man employing another to steer or assist in the management of his vessel in a race, when by the act of one of the crew wholly unauthorised by the employer, a foul takes place in wrong of a rival, and the employer's vessel wins; in such a case, even if it were proved to demonstration that, notwithstanding the foul, the race would have been won by the vessel on board of which the misconduct took place, it would surprise one if, by any rule either of honour or of law, the prize was given to the vessel which was in fault; no innocence of the employer could have any effect upon his loss.

Here, if Mr. Harrop did what he did out of hostility to Mr. Laverton, that certainly cannot add merit to his act; the question is whether the act was done with the object of assisting Mr. Phipps in the course of his canvass. I have no doubt on my mind that the object was to serve Mr. Phipps, though it was to serve him at the expense of Mr. Laverton. The object was to get Mr. Phipps returned, though the motive was to spite Mr. Laverton, and to prevent him from having the honour of representing this borough.

I have gone through the reasons why I was called upon not to adopt the construction which I am satisfied I must put, and if I were to allow myself to indulge any feeling upon the subject, I might say very sincerely I regret in this case to be compelled to put upon the facts and upon the 36th section. I do not regret it with reference to any of the parties concerned except Mr. Phipps himself; but I have no discretion, I must perform my duty.

The only remaining question is with reference to whether I must report the cases of Brown and Barnes, and the others which were brought forward in the recriminatory case against Mr. Laverton. With respect to these, I do not propose to add anything to the observations I have thrown out in the course of the case. Mr. Cole has not been heard upon them, and, at present, I do not think it necessary that I should deal with them. I think a very strong case for inquiry has been made out in respect of the transactions with Brown, and until I heard Mr. Barnes this morning, I even thought I should probably be compelled to report specially the transaction with respect to Mr. Walling, including, of course, what Mr. Barnes did in respect of procuring the 80 l. It is not necessary to go into the reasons why that feeling has been removed from my mind. I can only say that with respect to these cases, although there was a very strong case for inquiry, I have arrived, for reasons which I believe I stated at the outset, at the conclusion that I ought to say, "not proven."

What I must do in this case, in pursuance of the provisions of the 11th section of "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868," is to determine, first, that this election was void upon the ground of intimidation, within the 5th section of the Act, by Mr. Harrop, an agent of Mr. Phipps. With regard to Mr. Phipps and Mr. Laverton, each of them, I must report that neither candidate was guilty of any corrupt practice, and that no corrupt practice was committed by the consent or knowledge of either of them at the election; and I must further report that, upon the evidence before me, it did not appear that corrupt practices prevailed, nor is there any reason to suppose that they did prevail extensively in the borough at the late election.

I have already intimated that I do not propose to make any order (I am not bound to state any reasons why I make no order) as to the costs, and it is quite obvious why I do make no order. The scrutiny which was claimed has been abandoned; personal attacks were made upon Mr. Phipps, which, in the result, have entirely failed; and the recriminatory case, though it did not amount to proof to satisfy my mind to report against Mr. Laverton, was of so serious and weighty a character that I think it was quite right to bring it before the court.

Mr. Besley.] I am instructed to apply to your Lordship for an indemnity for two witnesses who were called on behalf of the Respondent, Joseph Harrop, and Nathaniel Walling.

Mr. Justice Willes.] I think I ought to grant an indemnity to every witness who came before me; I have abstained in the course of my judgment from saying anything with respect to the charge brought against Mr. Ludlow. I think I ought to say now, that that charge ought never to have been brought forward, and with respect to what took place before the magistrates, I appear to have had much stronger evidence before me than they had before them.

WESTMINSTER ELECTION.

Westminster.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Baron Martin, 19 February 1869.

Mr. Baron Martin.] It seems to me that this case lies in a narrow compass, and as I have in the course of the inquiry complained of the length of it, and of the number of witnesses who have been called (as it appears to me) unnecessarily, I think I ought to state that I have never in my life heard a case more ably advocated on both sides than this has been to-day. The argument has been concise—it has been to the point—and I wish that all gentlemen who appear before me on election petitions would make the addresses of Mr. Hawkins and Mr. Stephen models. I never heard a case more ably advocated than this has been upon both sides.

As I have stated, this case in my opinion lies within a narrow compass. If I thought that taking time would have any effect in altering the determination to which I have come, I would take until to-morrow to deliver my judgment; but as it is obvious that there is a very great deal of anxiety felt with regard to it, I think it better at once to state my determination and judgment.

The petition is presented by Mr. Beal and two other gentlemen, and alleges that Mr. Smith was, by himself and other persons on his behalf, guilty of bribery, treating, and undue influence, and that the result is that he was incapacitated from serving in Parliament for the city of Westminster. The petition is founded upon the Act of Parliament which has been so frequently referred to—the 17th and 18th Vict. c. 102, sections the 5th, the 4th, and the 2nd. And the allegations are that Mr. Smith has been guilty of undue influence within the 5th section, of corruptly treating within the 4th section, and of bribery within the 2nd.

There has been no evidence of undue influence.

There was evidence given on behalf of the Petitioners of treating within the 4th section, but it was very slight, and if that had been the only evidence adduced to affect Mr. Smith's election I should have been prepared, at the end of the Petitioner's case, to have said that there was no case calling upon Mr. Smith to answer. In the first place, there was no evidence that there was anything like general treating, that is to say the opening of public-houses where voters receive drink generally and gratuitously. Nothing of that sort seems to have occurred, and if there was treating, it was a treating in single instances, three of which have been given in evidence; but the material one was that which took place at the "Old Merlin's Cave," kept by Mr. Walker.

The evidence given on behalf of the Petitioners was that upon a particular evening, the 21st of October, there was a meeting held there, that Mr. Smith came, that he sat near Mr. Walker, that immediately, or shortly after, he entered a quantity of champagne was brought into the room, of which he partook, that his health was drunk, and that he made a short speech, and therefrom a very suspicious person might draw the inference that the history of the matter was that Mr. Smith came into the room and secretly directed Walker to produce the champagne, and that the champagne was produced for the purpose of corruptly treating the voters who were present.

I should draw no such conclusion from that evidence. If it be desired to prove before me that a man corruptly treats, I must have plain evidence of it. But Mr. Smith is called, and he gives the clearest possible explanation. He says that he went to the room, and that Walker, being then either drunk or half drunk, upon his going in ordered champagne, and that he (Mr. Smith) was as much annoyed about it as any man could be—which I can very well understand; that he did not get up and leave the room at once—and I think it can scarcely be expected that he would; but that he took a small portion of the wine, made a short speech, and left. I need hardly say, and indeed Mr. Stephen has said it already, that the answer is complete, and therefore there is no ground for impeaching this election upon the ground of treating.

The next head is bribery; and no doubt there is a substantial case; and there has been a great deal of evidence on this matter which is worthy of consideration. This is the fifth case which I have had to try; and the first inquiry I have made in every case has been, whether it has been proved to my satisfaction that the candidate really and bonâ fide intended that the election should be conducted according to law; that he would himself be neither a party nor privy to any illegal conduct, but that he bonâ fide and honestly meant to carry out the Act of Parliament; that he would not stand by and know of bribery being committed, or treating, or undue influence, but that he would set his face against these practices, and, as far as a man could himself do, prevent illegal acts being done. That is the first inquiry which I have made in the cases that have been before me. And I am satisfied in this case that Mr. Smith bonâ fide intended not merely that there should not be bribery or treating, for every man intends that and wishes it, but I am satisfied, upon his evidence, that he honestly and bonâ fide meant that there should not, on account of his election, be any illegal acts done. I am satisfied of that from the whole course of the evidence; I believe Mr. Smith's own statement, that he intended if he entered Parliament he would enter it with clean hands; that he would have nothing to do with bribery or any illegal conduct, and that, so far as he knew, that intention had been carried out. I therefore begin this inquiry with the belief that Mr. Smith meant honestly to comply with the law.

But I think that there is a matter which very much confirms Mr. Smith. That which strikes most against him, in my mind, is the enormous expenditure. I do not want to use language that would be offensive to any one, but it has been spoken of even by Mr. Hawkins as profuse, and it has been pronounced by Mr. Stephen extravagant; and perhaps another word might be used with regard to it, for an expenditure of nearly 9,000 l. upon an election is a thing almost incredible.

But I think there is an observation which arises strongly in favour of Mr. Smith. Both he and Mr. Isaacson gave an account of the sums which the latter received from him, and it appears that up to the day of election, the 17th of November, Mr. Smith had advanced only 4,500 l. I do not mean to say that that is not a very large and a very extravagant sum, for I think it is; but Mr. Smith, upon the day when his seat was either secure or not, knew only of an expenditure of 4,500 l. The residue was paid afterwards, and 2,000 l. as late as the 16th of January; and in all probability, if we had the whole truth of this matter, it would be found that Mr. Smith was very much surprised at being called upon to pay the additional sum of 4,500 l.; and I think Mr. Smith must be judged with regard to this matter upon the expenditure of 4,500 l., and not upon the expenditure of 9,000 l.

But if bribery has been committed by any person for whom Mr. Smith is responsible, it would unseat him. The law is a stringent law, a harsh law, and a hard law; but the amount of corruption that existed in this country, whereby boroughs were bought wholesale, was such as to constrain the Legislature to pass the Act of Parliament to which I refer. But it is a harsh law; it makes a man responsible who has directly forbidden a thing to be done, when that thing is done by a subordinate agent. It is, in point of fact, making the relation between a candidate and his agent, the relation of master and servant, and not the relation of principal and agent. It was what my brother judges and myself, in a consultation (so to speak) which we had upon the subject, unanimously arrived at; and it is what both Mr. Justice Willes and Mr. Justice Blackburn have more than once declared to be the law; but I think I am justified, when I am about to apply such a law in requiring to be satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt that the act of bribery was done; and that unless the proof is strong and cogent, I should say very strong and very cogent, I ought not to affect the seat of an honest and well-intentioned man by the act of a third person. When I came to apply my mind to the evidence I should require to see, in the first place, that there is agency; in the second place, I should require to be satisfied and certain that there could be no mistake with respect to the alleged act of bribery. I think that this is reasonable and right, and upon this principle I have acted hitherto, and upon it I will continue to act.

There are three cases, or three heads of cases, to be considered with respect to this alleged bribery. I will first take the case of Davis. With regard to Davis, I am of opinion that he was not an agent of Mr. Smith for the purpose of affecting him with bribery. I mean to give no opinion, for it is not necessary, as to whether Davis was telling the truth, or whether the other five witnesses were. I avoid, as far as I possibly can, coming to a conclusion that one man is perjured, or that another man is perjured. It is a very disagreeable duty for a single judge, especially if he is called upon to give his reasons why he arrives at one conclusion more than another. It is easy enough for a jury, whose verdict depends upon whether one witness or another witness, or one set of witnesses or another set of witnesses are perjured; it is easy enough, I say, for them to form an opinion and deliver a verdict, "guilty" or "not guilty," "for the plaintiff" or "for the defendant." But it is a very different matter for a person to enter upon a public examination of evidence, on the one side and the other, for the purpose of satisfying others that he has arrived at a correct conclusion as to whether one man or one set of men is perjured rather than another. But, in this case I am not driven to form any conclusion of that sort, for, as I have already stated, in my opinion Davis was not an agent of Mr. Smith for the purpose of affecting his seat.

It has been proved, as has been stated by Mr. Stephen, that there was this body who called themselves the "London and Westminster Working Man's Conservative or Constitutional Association," I have no doubt that the persons who were active in it were of opinion that their political opinions were right; but although the society was assumed to be formed of working men, the subscriptions coming from those working men were next to nothing. I see that there was a subscription of 1*l.* 18*s.* within one period, and of 1*l.* within another period, and that for the last period the subscriptions coming from them amounted to 7*s.*, and that all the rest of the funds of this society, which were considerable; came from a subscription of 60*l.* from Mr. Smith himself, but he had withdrawn from it upon his becoming a candidate; two subscriptions from his partner Mr. Lethbridge, and various other sums from other persons, who I have no doubt subscribed, expecting that this money would be beneficially expended for the purpose of promoting their political views. Mr. Davis was a person who canvassed for that society, and I think that the evidence is clear that there were two independent sets of canvassers, and that this society having got funds to a considerable amount, spent them in endeavouring, as far as they could, to induce persons to vote for Mr. Smith. But the evidence is that this was an independent agency, and that this body was acting on its own behalf; and I think that the letter which has been read from Mr. Edwards proves it, for he speaks of a desire that Charles Wheeler, who was a canvasser on behalf of a branch of this society, should bring his book, for the purpose of its being compared with the other books; and I cannot think that (they having attempted to canvass at first by memorandum-books, which did not give them the names of the voters) the circumstance of Mr. Edwards supplying them with duplicate canvass books, in which the names of the voters were written, was such as to create an agency.

The next evidence of agency is, that the name of this gentleman, Mr. Davis, is contained in the list which was handed up to me to-day. This is a list headed "Westminster election, 1868; committee for promoting the election of William Henry Smith; chairman, the Earl of Dalkeith; vice-chairmen, George Cubitt, Esq., and James Watney, junr." Then there follow a number of names, which are stated to be upwards of 600, printed in small print on this paper which I hold in my hand, and amongst them appears "F. Davis, Esq., 87, York-street, Westminster," which I have no doubt is Mr. Davis.

Now I have said, and the other judges have said, that bribing by one of his committee would affect the candidate, but I spoke of what I then understood to be a "committee"; I meant a number of persons, comparatively few—of course, in a county that extends over a considerable district it would be large—who were entrusted by the candidate with the work of carrying out his election, in whom he put faith and trust, and who in fact, were his agents for the purpose of carrying it out, but I have never supposed, nor do I believe, that either Mr. Justice Blackburn or Mr. Justice Willes ever considered that where a number of people (600 or 700) choose to call themselves "a committee," thereupon they become "agents" of the candidate, for the purpose of making him responsible for an illegal act done by one of them. I do not think that it is so, and I think it would be absurd if I were to take any man in this list (Lord Dalkeith, for instance, who, I suppose, merely lent his name as an influential man at the head of it, or Mr. Cubitt, or Mr. Watney), and to say that because one of these persons did an illegal act, such an act should affect Mr. Smith. I think it is a conclusion that could not be borne out by common sense. The committee man whom I mean, and whom I would hold Mr. Smith to be responsible for, is a committee man in the ordinary intelligible sense of the word, that is to say, a person in whom faith is put by the candidate, and for whose acts, therefore, he is responsible. For that reason, in my judgment, the Petitioners have failed to make out that Davis was an agent, so as to affect Mr. Smith by his act.

The next head of alleged bribery is that of acts of bribery by John Wheeler, and by young Halton. Now, John Wheeler is a person for whose acts Mr. Smith would be responsible, and if it were proved to my mind satisfactorily that John Wheeler's statement was the truth, I should feel, however reluctant, that I was bound to declare Mr. Smith's election void; that he, by the act of John Wheeler, had his status as a candidate destroyed; that he became incapable of being elected, and that, upon a bribe being administered and taken—administered by John Wheeler, for instance, to Overton—that would ipso facto destroy Mr. Smith's candidature, and render him incapable of being elected. But I should be doing an injustice to Mr. Smith if I acted upon the evidence of John Wheeler, contradicted as it has been by the evidence of Overton himself was by no means satisfactory, but, nevertheless, I do not think that I should be acting fairly in the administration of this law if I decided the case simply upon the evidence of John Wheeler, who is a traitor, and who admits that he is so, and gives evidence against the cause in which he was engaged. Believing, as I do, Mr. Ford's evidence that he stated to him at the time he called upon him that there was no bribery, and contradicted as he is by a variety of witnesses, I do not think that, sitting here judicially, and when I say judicially, I am not sitting as a judge merely, but as a jury, I ought to act upon that man's evidence as proving individual acts of bribery so as to affect Mr. Smith.

All the alleged cases of bribery have been gone through by Mr. Hawkins and by Mr. Stephen fully, and I do not believe that I should be conferring an advantage upon any one by going through them again. But if I were a jurymen, sitting in that box to deliver a verdict, I should find that I was not satisfied by the evidence of John Wheeler.

This disposes of two heads of those cases; I will only say, with respect to the case of John Hole, that his may be a strong case; but although young Holton seems to have been active with regard to the election, I cannot hold that an act done by him because his father was a person for whom Mr. Smith would be responsible, would make young Holton one also.

These are the cases. I think the case of Overton the strongest. As I have said, I by no means thought Overton's evidence satisfactory; I thought he dropped a few expressions which sounded as if what John Wheeler had said was true; but nevertheless he

he did in substance deny it. As Mr. Stephen very truly said, he did inadvertently in his cross-examination prove a case of bribery; I mean a case of bribery so far as Overton was concerned. Nevertheless, he was no agent of Mr. Smith's to affect him by this bribery, and I could not, because a board was sent to this woman, imply that therefore she was bribed by an agent of Mr. Smith's.

The most important part of this case, and to which Mr. Stephen principally addressed his observations, is whether or not the conduct of Mr. Smith's agents with regard to the boards was bribery. For me to decide that Mr. Smith was incapable of being elected by reason of these boards, I must be satisfied "that, when those boards were issued, there was in the mind of Mr. Grimston, or in the mind of Mr. Edwards, the intention that the payment with regard to them was to be, not for the purpose of compensating the persons for exhibiting them, but was in their minds intended to be a benefit given to those persons in order to induce their votes." I think that that is the real question which I have to decide, and when Mr. Hawkins was pressing yesterday the evidence of voters that they were not affected by reason of having those boards given to them, I stated to him that I did not think that that was the real question; the question which I have to try is whether in the mind of Mr. Grimston, or in the mind of Mr. Edwards, there was an intention that the benefit to arise to those persons from the exhibition of those boards should influence their votes or induce them to vote. In this Act of Parliament in some cases the expression used is to "influence the vote," and in others it is "to induce the vote," but I do not see any difference. In the section as to bribery, it is "in order to induce any voter to vote," and I ought to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt as to bribery, that that was the object with which they furnished those boards, and contracted to make the payments in respect of them.

Now, I do not say that there is not evidence to lead to that conclusion. In the first place, there is the enormous expenditure compared with that of Messrs. Grosvenor and Mill. I think that Mr. Stephen did right when he deducted from the two sums the payment made to the returning officer; the gross sum is divided into three, and each candidate bore a third of it. Mr. Smith's share of that expenditure was 254*l.* 10*s.*, and deducting that from the 8,900*l.* odd, the expenses of his election were 8,655*l.* 7*s.* 7*d.* That is a sum beyond reason. Deducting 509*l.* which was the sum paid by the other two candidates, the expenses of their election was 1,687*l.* I cannot but say that that is a suspicious circumstance, and taken together with other matters which I shall speak of, might affect very much the mind of a person desirous of arriving at a true conclusion.

But, secondly, there is the charge for the boards themselves; 209*l.* was paid for boards in this district. What a sum! 209*l.* paid to people for allowing a board to stand outside their windows! The thing of itself is a suspicious circumstance. But, again, there is another circumstance—there is the non-production of the vouchers. Mr. Isaacson, as I have said already during the inquiry, I have known for many years, and I believe he is an exceedingly respectable man. But Mr. Isaacson was called upon to obey the enactment which distinctly states that an account of the election expenses incurred on behalf of a candidate, together with the bills and vouchers relative thereto, shall be delivered to the returning officer. "Bills and vouchers," mean all the bills and vouchers. That is the plain meaning of the Act of Parliament, and when I find that bills and vouchers are kept back, how could anybody help suspecting that there was something wrong in this election; and what a strong circumstance it would be, standing by itself.

Thirdly, there was the employment of Mr. Edwards. I do not mean to say anything offensive to Mr. Edwards. I wish to avoid it. But Mr. Edwards, according to his own statement, was a person who, up to 1851, was for years employed in bribing electors at St. Albans, and he could not say, in answer to the question put to him by Mr. Stephen, that he had not expended as much as 18,000*l.* in the corruption of voters there. As I have said, I wish to say nothing offensive to anyone; but a more indiscreet act than the employment of such a person in an election I cannot imagine.

There is, then, this further circumstance, the alleged excessive charges with regard to those boards. There is contradictory evidence, and I do not think it necessary for me to express an opinion. But there was the evidence of three respectable men, one of them a man who is an inspector, on behalf of the theatres, of the boards exhibited in shops, as to the performances at the theatres. According to him, this charge was a hundred times as much as it ought to have been; according to him, it ought to have been at the rate of 7*s.* per hundred boards per week, whereas there was paid 7*s.* for each board per week. There is the evidence which you heard yesterday to which Mr. Hawkins has referred to-day to the contrary, I do not know that there is occasion to enter with minuteness into this matter.

There was next the evidence with regard to those two letters upon which Mr. Stephen commented very lately, and if I were satisfied that that letter which Charles Wheeler said he wrote—although Charles Wheeler was not an agent whose conduct would affect Mr. Smith, because he stands in the same position as Davis—if, I repeat, I were satisfied that the copy letter which he wrote in court was really and truly a copy of the letter that he wrote to Mr. Edwards, I do not know what effect it would have had upon my mind. But I am not satisfied of it. The evidence of Mr. Edwards, with regard to that does not convince my mind that the real contents of that letter have appeared. In addition to that, you have the evidence of the two Wheelers (taking it for what it is worth), of what was actually done with respect to the boards. I have already said what the point is upon which the case turns. It turns upon whether or not the exhibition of those boards and the payment for them was really bonâ fide and honest. What have we in favour of that? In the first place, we have the evidence of Mr. Edwards. I do not desire to say anything offensive to Mr. Edwards or that would cause him pain; but if his evidence had stood alone, I could not have failed to have taken into my consideration his antecedents. I daresay that what Mr. Edwards said is true, that in the year 1851 bribery was regarded as a different thing from what it was regarded in 1868 or is regarded in 1869, and probably persons who live to see another general election may find that further progress will be made in 1873 or 1874. That may be so; and if a case were to be tried, and the same evidence adduced in 1873 or 1874 as has been adduced here, the person who sits in the position which I occupy might form a different conclusion upon it. But, if the case stood upon the evidence of Mr. Edwards, it would go to negative that which is essential for the unseating Mr. Smith; and although circumstantial evidence was strong against him, yet if his evidence was true, it would negative that which is essential to unseat Mr. Smith. But Mr. Grimston has given his evidence upon this matter, and he has stated that which, if it be true, proves that the exhibition of the boards was not dishonest. He has sworn so. He is a gentleman of position and name; he was formerly a member of the Bar; he has retired from it, but he has been a public man; he has been the chairman of one of the telegraph companies, I believe the most extensive in the kingdom, and his character for honesty and uprightness and veracity has never been questioned. No doubt this was an imprudent thing; a suspicious thing; but he has pledged his oath that it was done bonâ fide, and that he had no intention, nor, as far as he knew, had Mr. Edwards of using it as a means of bribing. And therefore, believing Mr. Grimston's evidence, I am justified in concluding that the supplying of those boards was not colourable but a real bonâ fide act for the purpose of having them exhibited to the public. It has been proved satisfactorily, I think, that there was a difficulty in this district in finding places where boards and placards could be exhibited, and that this plan was had recourse to for the purpose of giving publicity to the candidature of Mr. Smith. It may have been overdone; it may have been that some persons have had improper views with regard to it. But I think when I have to determine whether there was passing in Mr. Edwards' and Mr. Grimston's minds a design to evade this Act of Parliament, and to act colourably, I am bound, believing, as I do, the evidence of Mr. Grimston, to say that, in my judgment, the case has not been made out against Mr. Smith. It is therefore my determination that Mr. Smith has been duly elected.

There are two other matters which I have to report upon. It is that I have no reason to believe that corrupt practices have generally prevailed in Westminster, and that I have no reason to believe that any candidate connected with this election has been guilty of any corrupt act.

The only other question is the question of costs. With regard to that matter, it has been my desire that costs should follow the event. In one instance I departed from that, because I thought, and apparently with the consent of the learned counsel for the Respondent, that the case was not one for costs. But although my impression is that costs should follow the event, I certainly should not give the entire of them, for in my judgment this case has lasted too long. If I make any direction as to costs at all, I shall probably make some direction, stating what amount of costs I think the Petitioners should bear; but I observe that some of the other judges, in more cases than one, have proceeded upon the principle of not giving costs, and if, in their judgment, or, I should rather say, if we, in our joint judgment, when I have an opportunity of seeing them, consider that we ought to be governed in giving costs by the consideration as to whether there was reasonable and probable cause for this petition, I should be inclined not to give costs, for I think that there was reasonable and probable ground for the petition, indeed I think there was strong ground for it. But with regard to that matter, I will take the first opportunity I have of seeing Mr. Justice Willes or Mr. Justice Blackburn, or perhaps both of them, and I will communicate to the Registrar (Mr. Avory) what determination I arrive at.

Mr. Hawkins.] With reference to any special directions as to costs, perhaps your Lordship will allow me to say this, that we had delivered to us a long list of 100 persons, who were alleged to have been bribed, and we were therefore obliged to be prepared with the evidence of all those persons.

Mr. Baron Martin.] I can only form my opinion from the evidence adduced to me. This case has now occupied nearly seven days, and I certainly have a very strong impression that it has lasted too long.

WEXFORD ELECTION.

Wexford.

JUDGMENT delivered by Lord Chief Justice Monahan, 12 January 1869.

Lord Chief Justice Monahan.] It fortunately happens that we can decide the question arising on the Wexford petition without considering at all the cases which have been cited cited in the argument. I think only a little common sense is required for the decision of such a case as this, unless there is some actual common law authority against common sense, which, happily, there is not in this case.

The facts appear to be these,—the election is duly held, the people are all properly assembled, the candidates are duly proposed and seconded, a show of hands is taken, and the sheriff gives a decision (I take it for granted very rightly and properly) that the show of hands is in favour of Mr. Motte, and he announces that decision. He does not, however, declare that gentleman duly elected, because the moment the show of hands is declared to be in favour of one of the candidates, it is the right of any elector present to demand a poll in favour of any of the other candidates. That poll was demanded, and the sheriff, in the proper discharge of his duty as returning officer, said, as he ought to have done, that the poll would be regularly taken on the day but one after, that being the day appointed by the Act of Parliament for the purpose. We are asked our opinion as to what could have been done, supposing that, instead of adjourning to the right day, he had adjourned to a wrong day. I can only say, when that case arises it will be time enough to consider it. In the present case the sheriff adjourned his court to the right day, and thereupon, as is usual in such cases, the parties set about bandying compliments to one another, to the sheriff amongst the rest, or to the Mayor “for his dignified conduct in the chair.” And then the court having been adjourned, and the parties having stayed only for the purpose of voting thanks to each other, Mr. Motte says, “I retire from the contest; I will not put the electors to the trouble of having a poll, as I am perfectly satisfied that the poll will go against me if it is taken.” Now, it is said, on the one hand, that Mr. Motte is in no default whatever, but it is clear that what afterwards occurred, occurred in consequence of that false step taken by Mr. Motte. Then it is said, on the other hand, that Mr. Devereux is in no default. He is in this default, that that false step having been taken by Mr. Motte in withdrawing after the adjournment of the court, he (Mr. Devereux) endeavoured to avail himself of it by inducing the returning officer to make a formal return to the clerk of the Crown that he had been duly elected. He did that before the time had arrived at which the poll was to be taken, and it was altogether a thing which he had no authority whatever to do.

It is quite plain upon mere common sense (and there is no authority against it) that the election was void, and that neither Mr. Motte nor Mr. Devereux was elected, and we must, therefore, answer the questions in the special case accordingly. The first question is, “Was the said Richard Joseph Devereux duly elected?” Our answer to that is, “No, he was not.” The second question is, “Was the said Standish Motte duly elected?” Our answer is, “No, he was not.” The third question is, “Was the said election void?” Our answer is, “Yes, it was.” Each party will bear their own costs.

The other learned judges concurred.

Mr. McDonogh (appearing for the plaintiffs).] I am requested to remind your Lordships that Mr. Motte is not the Petitioner here; it is the electors, whose rights have been invaded, who are the Petitioners, and they have succeeded in getting the election declared void.

Lord Chief Justice Monahan.] They have succeeded partially; they have not succeeded in obtaining the seat for Mr. Devereux, which they prayed for; therefore we shall not give costs to either side.

WIGAN ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Baron Martin, 6 March 1869.

Wigan.

Mr. Baron Martin.] THIS is a petition presented by Mr. Daniel Brayshay and Mr. William Atkinson, by which they pray that it may be determined that the election of Mr. Henry Woods and Mr. John Lancaster was void, and that they were not duly elected or returned. A great variety of grounds are stated, but there have been only four as to which evidence has been given, and with those four I need only trouble myself. The first ground upon which the election is said to be void, is that acts have been done by their agents (for no personal misconduct has been imputed to them), which of themselves destroy their candidature, and render their status as candidates not maintainable, and that those acts of themselves have rendered their election void. It is true, that if any act has been done by them or by an agent for whom they are responsible, contrary to the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act, the operation of that, together with the 36th section of the 17th and 18th of Victoria, and the 46th section of the 31st and 32nd of Victoria, will defeat their election.

I have tried several of these petitions, three of which have been similar to the present; that is to say, the candidates were sought to be unseated by reason of such acts as have been alleged. I have laid down a rule to myself, which I have acted upon in all these cases, and upon which, until I am satisfied that it is wrong, I shall continue to act; that is to say, if I am satisfied that the candidates intended honestly to comply with the law, and meant to obey it, and that they themselves did no act contrary to the law, and bonâ fide intended that no person employed in the election should do an act contrary to the law, their desire and object being that the proceedings in reference to the election should be pure and honest, I will not unseat such persons upon the supposed act of an agent, unless the act is established to my entire satisfaction. I will not act upon anything as to which there possibly may be a mistake or error; I will have it proved; but if it be proved to my satisfaction, and beyond doubt, I must obey the law, and I will obey it. But I think I do right, when an election is sought to be impeached, not because of an act done by the candidates themselves, but for an act which they have forbidden, in requiring to be convinced beyond possibility of error, that the act relied upon by the Petitioners which is to unseat the Members did actually take place. That is the principle upon which I have acted in the Bradford case, in the Cheltenham case, and in the Westminster case, and I shall continue to act upon it until I am satisfied by some higher authority that it is wrong. I apprehend that my function here is simply to act upon the law as if I were trying a case at Nisi Prius. I have no discretion in the matter; I must act upon the law and the Act of Parliament which imposes the disqualification, and read it according to what its words import. I have no right to go beyond those words. So also it is not because things may have been done at an election of which I do not approve; for instance, having committees at public-houses, hiring a number of carriages, which now, in borough elections, is prohibited, or hiring roughs. None of these things of themselves avoid an election, but at the same time they are ingredients which may be taken into consideration. If an act were done by a candidate as to which I was to determine whether it was a corrupt act or an innocent act, the conduct of the parties throughout the whole election may be taken into consideration. It may be that evidence is given as to acts done by the candidates which of themselves do not avoid the election. It may be, that although the election cannot be avoided for those acts, yet nevertheless those acts may show what was the real quality and meaning of an ambiguous act, which may have one effect or another, according as the judge's mind is satisfied that it was honestly or dishonestly done. It may be that at an election, certain acts may have taken place which the judge disapproves of, but which do not satisfy him that another act upon which the validity of the election depends was corruptly done. But if, upon a future election petition arising out of another election at the same place, acts similar to those of which the judge had expressed his disapproval were proved to have been repeated, the judge who tried the second petition might well take them into his consideration to aid his conclusion that the act upon which the validity of the election depended was a corrupt and dishonest act.

I will state first what I have to say as to the general conduct of this election. It seems to me it is impossible, so far as Mr. Woods and Mr. Lancaster are concerned, that any persons could have conducted themselves with greater propriety than they have done. They pledged their oaths yesterday that they intended throughout to act according to law, and upon pure principles, and there has not been a single circumstance which has occurred during these proceedings to indicate that anything else was their intention. There has been no general bribery; there has been nothing like that which has occurred elsewhere. There has been no treating; not a single public-house was opened during the time that the election was going on, which I think was a most commendable thing; for opening public-houses and having committees in public-houses are means of inducing partisans to go there to drink. Then, again, there have been no paid canvassers, which I think is also very much to be commended; no hiring of carriages, nothing of the sort. It is impossible that any two gentlemen can stand better than they do with respect to their general conduct during this election. But that will not do; for, according to the construction put upon the Act of Parliament, which we have all adopted, if there has been within the meaning of the 17th and 18th of Victoria, cap. 102, bribery, or treating, or undue influence exercised by any person for whom the candidates are responsible, their election is null and void.

With respect to the 49th section of the 30th and 31st of Victoria, it is not necessary that I should give any opinion, because I am of opinion that no agency has been proved in respect of Wilcock. It has been argued by the learned counsel for the Respondents that, upon the true construction of this Act of Parliament, the doctrine which has been laid down with regard to the 17th and 18th of Victoria does not apply, and that is rather my own impression; I do not mean to give an opinion upon it, because it is unnecessary in this case. The circumstances were these. There is a body in this town called the Liberal Association, and Mr. Giffard has argued that the persons who subscribe to that association are in the nature of a partnership, and that the giving funds to Mr. Stuart for the purpose of enabling him to carry on that association made him their agent, so that acts done by him would be obligatory upon them, and they would be bound by them. From that view I dissent. There is no similarity to a partnership. It has given to it the collective name of the Liberal Association, but the only person acting is Mr. Stuart. It was stated that Mr. Woods and Mr. Lancaster contribute to it, and that a number of other gentlemen, agreeing with them in politics, also contribute. But this does not make Mr. Stuart their agent, so as to bind them by his acts, either criminally or civilly, no more than the manager of a club to which a gentleman may belong could make him responsible for the acts of that manager. Mr. Giffard, in his observations, referred to the case of Limpus against the General Omnibus Company. This case was governed by the law applicable to the relation of master and servant, which is different from that of principal and agent. The relation of master and servant imposes upon the master a liability for an unlawful act done by the servant in the course of his employment, and notwithstanding a prohibition which may have been given to him by the master: notwithstanding that the instant before an accident occurred he had impressed upon his servant or coachman the necessity for driving with the utmost possible care, if the next moment that man disobeys the order received from his master, and inflicts an injury upon another person the master is responsible for it; and why? Because the relation of master and servant exists between them, and creates the liability. But the ordinary rule with regard to principal and agent is, that the principal is only responsible for that which he authorizes the agent to do, and in all other cases of which I am aware, except these Parliamentary cases, when you have a man who is sought to be made liable upon the acts of his agent, the question for inquiry is, did the principal give the agent authority to do the act? If that be negatived, the principal is not responsible, the rule of law, is, that if a man acts through an agent he can only be held responsible to the extent of the authority he gives the agent. In my opinion, as at present advised, it would be necessary, in order to establish that a person had corruptly paid a rate when the rate was in fact paid by a third person, to show that that person was authorized by the person sought to be charged to pay the rate. The enactment is, that any person corruptly paying a rate on behalf of a ratepayer for the purpose of enabling him to be registered, is guilty of bribery, and my present opinion is, that in order to make a third person responsible for that act you must prove that he gave authority to the person to do the act. However, it is not necessary for me, as I have already said, to express any opinion upon that. I have pointed out what, in my judgment, is the difference between a partnership and this Liberal Association; and that there is no partnership privity between the parties subscribing, and no relation of principal and agent. In fact, Mr. Stewart is the Liberal Association, unless so far as the subscribers personally interfere, when of course they would be responsible for their own acts.

I am of opinion, that there is no agency proved to have existed between the Respondents and Wilcock. At the conclusion of the proceedings on Thursday, I intimated a doubt to Mr. Giffard about it. Upon the following morning, Mr. Giffard called Mr. Wilcock, and, so far from his evidence proving agency, it proved directly the reverse. But putting Mr. Wilcock aside, and considering that he had done what may be taken for the present purpose to have been bribing within the 49th section of the 30th and 31st of Victoria, what is the evidence of Mr. Stuart? Mr. Giffard has not done more than justice to him; no man ever gave his evidence more fairly and candidly; and he swore in the most positive manner that he had had nothing to do with it, and did not know that it had been done until he was called upon by one of the agents of the Petitioners, that he never sanctioned it in any way. Wilcock was the person employed by him to attend to the register, or to be the objector-general, as he was called; that gave him no authority to bind Mr. Stuart by an act of bribery; and if Mr. Stuart had been indicted for the misdemeanor, upon the assumption that what Wilcock did was bribery, I do not believe any judge would, upon the evidence before me, allow the case to go to the jury. There is no evidence against Mr. Stuart, and much less is there any evidence against Mr. Woods and Mr. Lancaster. In my judgment, subscribing to the fund, for the purpose of having the registration attended to in the borough, whether it be a Conservative Association or a Liberal Association, does not make the subscribers to that fund partners, and does not confer any authority upon the person who manages it, to make them responsible for an illegal act that may be done by the manager.

I think, therefore, that the case against Mr. Woods and Mr. Lancaster fails so far as regards the payment of rates. Then the question arises, whether or not any acts have been done by agents which violate the 17th & 18th Vict. c. 102. I have gone through the evidence, and have written down the 11 cases which seemed to me material. There were a variety of others mentioned yesterday, in which William Hilton and Samuel Lancaster, and a man called Johnston, were concerned. These were acts done by them with regard to persons employed in a colliery. It seems that there has been lately established a company called the Wigan Coal and Iron Company, and that it consists of what were formerly 20 collieries, and many ironworks belonging to different persons, of whom Lord Balcarris is the principal; and of this joint stock company Mr. Lancaster is the chairman. But it appears also that there are other persons associated with him, and especially Mr. Hewlett; he is the manager, and the principal person in it. His views of politics are adverse to Mr. Woods and Mr. Lancaster. I do not know that that makes any difference; but it is not very likely that persons who were engaged under him would do acts of which he would disapprove, and which, if they came to his knowledge, or if complaint were made to him, he would rebuke, and probably bring the matter before the directors. But it has been said that a number of persons who were employed were asked for their votes by Hilton and Samuel Lancaster, in such a manner as to cause a breach of the 5th section of this Act of Parliament. It seems to me that Hilton and Lancaster have been sought to be made responsible for certain acts or conversations, which may be very easily misrepresented. They have sworn in the most positive terms that they did not, from the beginning to the end, either threaten or use threats to turn off people; and although no doubt active partisans of Messrs. Woods and Lancaster, they did nothing of the kind which has been imputed to them. Acting upon the principle that I have already mentioned, I think it would be absurd to unseat these gentlemen by reason of those acts, or supposed acts, of Hilton and Samuel Lancaster. Mr. Giffard seemed to rely upon the following cases. I will take first the case of Sloane, I have before me the shorthand writer's notes of the evidence of Sloane, and when I have stated what it is, it would be to bring the law into contempt if I were to unseat these two gentlemen by reason of it. The evidence is this: "Do you live at No. 19, Little London?—No, No. 23. Are you a tailor?—Yes. About two months before the election, did you see Messrs. Woods and Lancaster in Standish Gate?—Six weeks before the election. Were they on their canvass?—Yes. Was there anyone with them that you knew?—Mr. John Smethurst and other gentlemen—I did not know their names—were with them; Mr. Smethurst was with them, and other gentlemen, but I did not know who they were. Did you speak to Mr. Smethurst?—Yes. Did you tell him about your vote?—No. Did you say anything about the canvass?—No; he never spoke to me about voting; nothing to that effect at all; he never mentioned to me about the vote at all. Did Mr. Smethurst mention anything about the "Millstone" public-house?—Yes, he did. What was it?—Before that, he asked if we could direct him to a gentleman he wished to canvass; the gentlemen was gone away from the house, and we directed them beyond Ince Green-lane. I said I was dry, and Mr. Smethurst said, 'You can go into the "Millstone" and get two quarts of ale in my name, if they will let you have it,' and accordingly we did go, and we got it on that account; that is all that passed. How did you vote?—For Mr. Lancaster and Mr. Woods. Do you mean to say that nothing passed between you and Mr. Smethurst about your vote?—Nothing at all; that is all I know about it; that is all that passed." To say that that act was an act of treating, which must be corruptly done for the purpose of inducing a person to vote, when not one word was said about the vote, would be absurd. The next cases are three, These are what I will call Mr. Smethurst's cases. Mr. Smethurst is a man who stands in one of the most estimable positions a man can stand in in this country. It appears that 40 years ago he was a working collier, and that by industry and integrity he has attained to the position of being a large colliery owner, himself employing 1,200 men. He seems to be better than that; he appears to be a kind and generous man; he has not forgotten his old acquaintances, the people with whom he used to work. He is in the habit of coming to this town, and many of those men are at times out of employment. And it is clear that these colliers are in the habit of going to him to get a shilling or sixpence; and that he has assisted them in this way to a great extent. The whole of these cases with regard to him lead my mind to the conclusion that the 10 s. which he gave away was not given to operate upon votes, and that it would be a forced and untrue construction upon his conduct to come to such a conclusion. I do not believe that any jury, upon such evidence, would find that those acts had been done to induce men to vote. The first person to whom I shall refer is Thomas Hilton. He is not a voter at all; but it appears that he was standing with two other men, called Santoss and Barker, who were voters; that they came to him to get money to obtain drink, and he said, "I cannot give it to you, you know that I cannot give it to you"; but he did give a man called Bentham 2 s. 6 d. upon being pressed by them, and upon being told that Bentham was not a voter. The case seems to me to resolve itself into a case of treating rather than a case of bribery. Having got the 2 s. 6 d., they went away and spent it in drink together. How could any person, after the evidence which Mr. Smethurst has given as to the circumstances under which it was given, arrive at the conclusion that the money was given corruptly for the purpose of inducing voters to vote. It would, in my opinion, be an outrageous conclusion, and which I am certain no jury would draw. Then Fairclough's case; I believe that Heyes, who gave the evidence, committed perjury. I believe that he misrepresented that transaction. The transaction was this: Heyes was standing with five or six other men when Mr. Smethurst passed, and it appears that they applied to him to give them money for drink. He said that he would not do so, and walked away, but he beckoned Fairclough, and Heyes did not say that he heard what passed between Mr. Smethurst and Fairclough, but he says that when he came back Fairclough had 5 s., and the whole of them went to a public-house and spent 2 s. of it for drink. Now that is the case proved by Heyes. Mr. Smethurst is a man who rose from an humble origin, and he had an aunt who was living in an almshouse in the neighbourhood of this town. Upon the day before this happened a message had been sent to him, that his aunt was unwell. He came into the town; and Fairclough, and another companion of theirs, Ashcroft, were sons-in-law of hers; and he beckoned Fairclough, and gave him 5 s. to take to his aunt. That is the case, and Heyes stated, upon cross-examination, that he did not know anything of that money being intended for the aunt. I do not believe him, and I will state why I do not. The two witnesses, Ashcroft and Fairclough, were in company with him, together with another man; and it appears that they four, including Heyes, made up the 2 s. which had been spent out of the 5 s., and gave it to the woman on the following Saturday. That was proved by two witnesses; and, in my belief, that man wilfully kept back that fact, so as to give a colour to the transaction, as if it were a case of bribery. Then, as to the case of Unsworth, it is a question between the witness and Mr. Smethurst. It was stated that the witness was bribed by Smethurst with 2 s. 6 d. to vote. Mr. Smethurst has sworn that that is a false account of the transaction, and that the real transaction was this: Unsworth came to him, and asked him to give him some small sum that he had been in the habit of giving to men who had done a job for him, and stated that he had done a job in the month of February, for which he had not been paid. Smethurst thereupon gave him 2s. 6d.; he went to the Liberal Association; he had no change, and he got it there; and then he gave it to him publicly. I cannot think that, if Smethurst meant to bribe that man, he would have gone into the Liberal Association office to get a sovereign changed, and then openly give 2s. 6d. to the man. I believe Smethurst's evidence, and I do not believe Unsworth's. The next case is Abbott; that case was very properly abandoned by Mr. Giffard.

The next case is that of a man named Jolley; but that case, in my opinion, has been answered by Lund, the supposed briber.

The next case is the Finches; Mr. Giffard very properly argued that when a judge has to determine (which I am very sorry judges have to determine) what evidence they will believe when witnesses swear contrary to each other, that he must take all the circumstances into his consideration. Of all the witnesses who are produced in a court of law, those two men, the Finches, are just the kind of men who are the most unreliable; they are discarded servants. I have been now nearly 40 years in practice in advocating and trying causes; and the witnesses of all others whom juries less rely upon are discarded servants, especially discarded servants who come to give evidence, not of an act done, but of a conversation. Their case was that Cole said to them, "Will a pound or two be of any use to you?" Cole swears that it is a fabrication from beginning to end. If I had to decide which statement was the more to be relied upon, the circumstance that those two Finches were discarded servants would, as it seems to me, make the scale weigh in favour of Cole. I believe that Cole's evidence is true.

The next case is the breeches case, which I do not think it necessary to make any observation upon.

The next case is that of Thomas Finsley: it was alleged that William Bailey had told him that he would get him employment at 30s. or more a week, or, at all events, better employment than he then had. We have been discussing these cases of agency by canvassers, and agency by others, and I wish to say nothing disrespectful of Bailey, but when I saw him I did think that it would be an extraordinary thing if the act of a man like him could be held to affect the seats of the Members for Wigan, or any other place. I daresay he is a very respectable man; he is a porter, in the employment of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, and I think if many agents or canvassers were such as William Bailey it would be a serious question whether the act of such a canvasser must of necessity affect the seat. I think the case altogether fails.

The next case is that of John Taylor: he was the young man who stated that Fillingham gave him employment; he was a man that wanted employment, and had not tools to work at his ordinary work, but was put by Fillingham to work as a labourer, it was said that he must have got this work because he was a voter, and that he had afterwards been turned off after his vote was given. With regard to that, Fillingham was called, and he swore that there was not a word of truth in it. That he gave him work because he wanted a man, and then turned him off because he wanted him no longer.

The next case is that of Tyson; I think that that is not a case within the Act. I said so at the time, and I adhere to the opinion. The 5th section of the Corrupt Practices Act, the 17th and 18th of Victoria, is in these terms:—"Every person who shall, by himself, or by any other person on his behalf, make use of any intimidation;" and in my judgment it must be an act done by the person himself, or by some person on his behalf. It was an act of passion, and it may be, if Tyson's account is true, that it was not justified on the occasion; I think it cannot be considered an act done on behalf of the candidates; it was an act of his own, for which they are not responsible.

The only remaining case is that of Edward Davenport, who was said by Mr. Wright to be the greatest scamp in Wigan; he was not a voter, but he had a father-in-law who was, who has since died in such a state of poverty that he has been buried by subscription, and upon this particular day he was met by Wright taking the old man up to the poll, and at the time some observation was made with respect to his vote. After that he gave him 6d. or 1s., and that must be proved to have been a corrupt payment, for an act done after the voting must be done corruptly, and there is no evidence of its having been done corruptly. But then it appears that he also gave 3s. the following morning to the old man. Wright has two shops, and there is a yard communicating between the two; the old man's house was in the yard; he was in a state of the most wretched poverty, and afterwards died. He gave the old man 3s. as, he says, an act of charity, and I think that to convert that into an act of bribery, would be going beyond what is reasonable. It appeared that he had frequently given Davenport money; the man obtained his living by hawking oysters; he had not money to buy them, and he got money given to him for the purpose. Upon the evidence of such a witness I should find no man guilty.

I believe that I have now gone through all the acts alleged to have been done, and the result is that I am of opinion that Mr. Woods and Mr. Lancaster were duly elected, and I shall so certify to the Speaker. The costs will follow the event. So far as the rates are concerned, it was an experiment, and that is a case in which the courts uniformly give costs. Upon the other grounds the Petition has signally failed, and therefore the costs ought to follow the event.

WINDSOR (NEW) ELECTION.

Windsor (New).

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Willes, 15 January 1869.

Mr. Justice Willes.] I WISH to observe that Mr. O'Malley's statement makes it proper, especially as I have turned this case very much over in my mind during the night, I should restate, in order to prevent any misapprehension, the view which I take of the various cases which have been brought before me; and I will begin with those cases in which it appears to me that the evidence, as it now stands, assuming that no answer is given to it, is not such as I should be satisfied to act upon.

I will then refer to those cases which it occurred to me required explanation; cases upon which, if I were investigating the matter in a private room, I should ask either the Member or the candidate if they happened to be present, "What say you to this?"

With respect to the first class of cases, it begins with the case of Wilkins, the fisherman. Upon that I have stated, and I remain of opinion, that there was no proof of Mr. Lysley's agency. That gentleman is a witness, not a party, and therefore I shall make no observation upon the course which he took, beyond saying that it was unquestionably to the mind of any man of the world, an indiscreet one, considering the time when he ordered those nets; but his agency for Mr. Eykyn was not proved, and to my mind was disproved. With respect to Cavill's case, he voted for Colonel Gardner; and it appears to me that no proof has been given of Robert Herbert's agency, Robert Herbert being the person who was stated to have influenced him.

With respect to Hall's case, apart from the contradiction between Hall and Bishop, I think that there was no evidence upon which I could act of Bishop's agency. I have already stated that, in my mind, authority to canvass (I purposely use the word "authority," and not "employment," because I mean it to apply to persons authorised to canvass, whether paid or not paid for their canvassing) would constitute an agency. Authority for the general management of the election would involve authority to canvass. Therefore I need not say anything further as to that; and inasmuch as it is possible that my mind has not travelled over all the possible combinations of fact in which agency may exist, I do not say that there may not be cases of agency to bind the Member, besides those of authority to canvass, and authority for the general management of the election. As an instance of the sort of case which one might have to deal with, I may refer to an agent for election expenses, for instance. I do not say what other cases there may be; it would not be profitable upon this occasion to do so; but I think that a mere messenger cannot be considered as an agent. Apart from the contradiction between Hall and Bishop, the impression remains upon my mind that the agency of Bishop was not proved so as to defeat the election. There must be no mistake—indeed, after what has taken place, there can hardly be any mistake—as to what distinction exists between defeating the vote and defeating the election. Bribery by anybody would defeat the vote, but it must be either general bribery, or bribery by an agent, or by the candidate, to defeat the election.

Then as to Eden's case, to take that as a specimen of Mason's tenants' houses. Mason and Eden were called, and I retain my impression that there was no proof of any undue influence. There was proof of agency. Mason was an active member of the Committee, and was active in getting up the election. Probably being a member of the Committee only might not suffice, but he was more, he was an agent; but there is no proof, in my mind, of undue influence.

With respect to the colourable employment of voters at the county election, voters were employed at the county election by Mr. Darvill. Both in respect of colourable employment to influence their votes at the borough election, and in respect of agency, that case was so weak that I think I must consider it to have been abandoned on the part of the Petitioner at the time, and it left no impression upon my mind.

Mr. O'Malley.] Just so, my Lord.

Mr. Justice Willes.] I then come to the cases of treating. There is a case of treating with respect to a person of the name, I think, of Daniel Dobson, a lamplighter. I make no remark upon the circumstances. I think that the only general remark which one could make is, that assuming that that case stood unexplained, it would raise a question rather of taste than of treating electors. It was spoken to by witnesses who, I dare say, gave very honest evidence, but who certainly had very little opportunity of observing closely what passed; and Daniel Dobson, who, if I mistake not, voted in the end for Colonel Gardner, was not called. The absence of Daniel Dobson, under those circumstances, really makes an end of the lamplighter's case. I think that it rests where it began, in a question of taste, which is not for me.

Then I come to the Foresters' case; that, I think, failed altogether. It was not proved that Mr. Eykyn ordered any drink for the Foresters.

Mr. O'Malley.] It was with respect to the Odd Fellows that I intended to make the observation which I made to your Lordship, and not the Foresters.

Mr. Justice Willes.] You said the Odd Fellows; you were quite accurate, Mr. O'Malley, but I am going through the cases. This is not the case of an ordinary cause at

at Nisi Prius, where I could accept the withdrawal of the counsel for the Petitioner, without satisfying my own mind as to the circumstances which were brought before it in evidence. I say, with respect to the Forresters, that the evidence failed altogether to establish that any drink was ordered by Mr. Eykyn, and that is out of the case. Those cases are altogether removed. There were two other cases of treating mentioned: one was the treating with a gallon of beer in Russell-street, and the other was the treating of the Odd Fellows. I will take those cases, although not quite in order, so as to complete what I have to say on the question of treating; in both cases, according to the evidence as it at present stands, Mr. Eykyn was present; on both occasions voters were present. I think voters of both colours; I think that I am right in that, Mr. O'Malley, that voters of both colours were present on both occasions.

Mr. O'Malley.] No doubt, my Lord.

Mr. Justice Willes.] These cases seem to stand very much upon the same footing. The case in Russell-street upon the evidence is not so distinct as the case of the Odd Fellows, because the amount of drink ordered in Russell-street was small, and the order is stated to have been given by a black-whiskered man, whose precise relation to Mr. Eykyn, or to the election, has not been established. I will take the case of the Odd Fellows, therefore, as my text. In the case of the Odd Fellows the evidence is that, Mr. Eykyn was present, and was in the chair; and, if the evidence of the landlord is to be acted upon, Mr. Eykyn gave an order for wine to be put upon the table, and in pursuance of that, a large quantity of champagne and other luxuries, amounting to some 27 l., was put upon the table, and charged to Mr. Eykyn. Mr. Mason, if I recollect rightly, was one of the supporters of Mr. Eykyn, and came to be initiated, but changed his mind in the course of the evening's proceedings; and there was a third person, I think a Mr. Jones, who was in the vice-chair, and who, if I recollect rightly, was also one of Mr. Eykyn's supporters. In that case there were, I think, some 95 persons present, 25 of whom, or thereabouts, were strangers, and there were some 70 tradesmen and artizans of the borough, who were, or most of whom were, voters. There was a mixed company. The Odd Fellows do not appear to have been a political society. As I understand the constitution of those societies, it is of a benevolent character; and party politics as a rule are, I believe, excluded. It is not shown to have been a political society.

Mr. O'Malley.] I understand, my Lord, on inquiry, that the rules of the society exclude politics.

Mr. Justice Willes.] As a rule they do. As a general thing you find upon the books of those benevolent societies a rule excluding politics. It was not a political society, and the sting of that case to my mind was in the meeting having taken place upon the 25th of August, more than three weeks after the Act of Parliament under which we are at present assembled, was passed, and within a fortnight or three weeks of the actual canvass being commenced. I must own that I am impressed with the objectionable character, to say the least of it, of an intended candidate ingratiating himself with the voters of the borough, whether upon his side or not, by such a profuse expenditure upon the score of luxuries. And I must express my opinion that that is a questionable proceeding, and that it would be well to be abstained from for the future, and the more so because even if a man of wealth could spend 27 l. in an evening upon drink for others, it seems like an exclusion of men in moderate circumstances from being candidates, if profuse expenditure of this kind is to be resorted to. I am quite aware of the distinction between treating and bribing; and I must bear that steadily in mind in dealing with cases of this description. The terms of the section applicable to treating which were referred to by Mr. James, are different from the terms of the section relating to bribery; and there is, as we know, an express enactment with respect to treating of voters, which forbids the giving of any refreshment to voters during the election, under a penalty, which seems to imply that all hospitality is not struck at by the enactment as to treating. If every man at that Odd Fellows' meeting, taking seventy of them, had got six-eighths of the price of the champagne which he drank, or might have drunk, what would be said of it? If there were not a distinction between bribery and treating, what must I have said of that?

However, this case is not altogether without precedent. I find that it has been under consideration, and I find that it has been considered by Committees, and a distinction has been drawn between societies not having a political object and societies which have; and I may refer to the decision in the Pontefract case, which is reported in Wolferstan and Dew, page 68, and upon this point at page 71, in which treating Odd Fellows, certainly to a much smaller extent than occurred, as alleged in the evidence, in the present case, was held not to amount to treating within the Act, the society not being a political society. And there is the further case of Maidstone, in the same volume, page 102, and upon this point at page 104, in which it appears to have been taken for granted, and no doubt correctly, that similar treating of a society having a political character, if made out, would have amounted to an offence within the Act of Parliament. I am not bound by the decisions of Parliamentary committees except upon points of practice which are not provided for by the rules of the judges; and this is not such a case; but I may properly refer to the decisions of Parliamentary Committees for my guidance. Upon that case of the Odd Fellows not having, for the reasons which I have mentioned, quite disabused my mind of its importance, I think it proper to follow the course which I observe was followed by Committees in similar cases, where a doubt rested on the mind of the Committee, although the case was withdrawn; and I shall ask Mr. James to request Mr. Eykyn to give his account of that matter; he stated that Mr. Eykyn could give an account, varying from that given by the witness. It would be satisfactory to my mind to hear his explanation. That is the first of the cases; I pass over Russell-street, because I have already stated that, according to my mind, it falls within the same class, and I attach no importance to it, if no importance is to be attached to the Odd Fellows' case. The case of the Odd Fellows rather presses upon my mind.

There were two other cases to which it would be proper to refer; one was White's case, that did not make much impression upon my mind, but I suppose that it is proper that it should be met by some explanation from Mr. James Herbert, who was the authorised agent of Mr. Eykyn, that is the Painter's case. I think that it will be proper for Mr. James, for the satisfaction of my mind, to ask Mr. Herbert for some explanation of White's case, I think that he voted for Colonel Gardner.

Mr. O'Malley.] Yes, my Lord.

Mr. Justice Willes.] That to some extent diminishes the importance of White's case, but it would, I think, be more in accordance with the practice of Committees to ask Mr. Herbert to explain that. With respect to Wilson's case, the case of the payment of rates, I think that it would be proper to hear the explanation of Mr. Herbert, because, as it at present stands on Wilkin's statement, the registration was coming on, and was coming on under peculiar circumstances, because it was known that an election would speedily follow: he did not intend to pay his rates, and according to his account he had not the means of paying them, either by his own money, or by somebody else's, and he upon the suggestion of Mr. Herbert borrowed from Mr. Bedborough, who, as I understand, is a supporter of Mr. Eykyn, the sum of 2*l.* 10*s.*, out of which he paid his rates, which did not amount to that sum; that is the third case upon which I should like to hear the evidence of Mr. Herbert.

There only remains Smith's case, and upon that I should observe that I agree in what has been said, and what must be concurred in by everybody, that it was an act of indiscretion to have put a sovereign upon its way to a voter so shortly before an election. But taking the evidence of Mr. Carter, and looking at the letter of Mr. Carter, and the report of Mr. Roke, I am quite satisfied that the account given by Mr. Smith of the transaction is an accurate one. I am quite satisfied that the account given of the transaction by Wicks, in the letter which he wrote, or got written by his son, for Smith to Mr. Eykyn, after the election, is not an accurate one, and that that payment, however suspicious it must have appeared when it first came to Colonel Gardner's knowledge, and the knowledge of his advisers, has been explained as a payment which never was perfected. It was not accompanied by a promise, conditional on voting for Mr. Eykyn, and, in fact, it was an act done not corruptly, but for charity and God's sake, and therefore not a bribe.

Mr. James desires to have some time to consider what course he shall take.

Mr. James.] The shortest possible time, my Lord; perhaps your Lordship will give me fifteen minutes, and then I will call those witnesses whose evidence your Lordship wishes to hear.

After an interval,

Mr. James.] My Lord, I have to ask your Lordship's permission to call the witnesses whom you have mentioned, namely, Mr. Eykyn, Mr. Herbert, and Mr. Bedborough, before stating what course my clients take in the matter.

Mr. Justice Willes.] Do you propose to go on with the recriminatory case?

Mr. James.] I regret that, at this moment, I am not prepared to answer your Lordship's question. I wish those gentlemen who have been mentioned by your Lordship, to be called first, before giving your Lordship a final determination upon that point.

Mr. Justice Willes.] This is a little critical; one question which of course I should ask with a view to my Report to the Speaker, would be, whether in the event of your not going into your recriminatory case, the withdrawal of the claim for a scrutiny was the result of any compromise between the parties. That question, of course, I shall ask. I think that I ought to ask counsel whether they can assure me that that is not so.

Mr. O'Malley.] I can give your Lordship the most unqualified pledge, that there has been no communication whatever between the parties. It originated in the spontaneous motion of Colonel Gardner upon reading the "Times," this morning, before I was out of my room. While I was dressing, a note came in to me, as to the article in the "Times."

Mr. James.] It is needless for me to endorse Mr. O'Malley's statement. Upon my honour, there has been no communication of any sort between the parties.

Mr. O'Malley.] Not the smallest.

Mr. Justice Willes.] Then, I think that I may say, that if it will be of any assistance to you, Mr. James, in framing your course, that I should not consider it my duty to attempt what would properly devolve on a Commission of Inquiry, if issued in pursuance of the Petition, which I understand has been presented to the House of Commons—I consider that my duties are judicial and not inquisitorial, except in so far as it would be proper that I should follow up any clue which the evidence laid before me by the parties on the one side or the other presented. I do not think that it was the intention of the Act of Parliament to convert the judge into a magistrate to institute a preliminary inquiry, and I am the more satisfied of that because of the express provision with reference to issuing a Commission of an entirely different character from that under which I sit, in case it should become necessary to inquire into the existence of corrupt practices generally. It is only where where a clue to the existence of such corrupt practices is presented by the evidence, properly and formally laid before me, that I should think it necessary, as at present advised, to send for parties and papers, with a view to investigating a subject which at present I consider out of my jurisdiction. Windsor (New).

On the application of the Counsel for Sitting Member three Witnesses were examined, viz., Roger Eykyn, Esq., M. P., Mr. James Herbert, and Mr. John Bedborough.

Mr. Justice Willes.] I hope that the inhabitants of Windsor will continue in the same good humour and will display the good conduct which they have exhibited during these proceedings. I may also say that I am exceedingly obliged to the learned counsel on both sides for the great assistance which they have given me in the case, and I only hope that I shall have equally valuable assistance in the case of other Election Petitions with which I may have to deal in the course of this election circuit. I have written down the result, and I believe that it is proper, looking to the terms of the 11th section, if not necessary, that I should announce in court in the form of a judgment what I propose to certify to the Speaker of the House of Commons. I am very anxious, of course, to treat that great officer with the utmost respect, and I feel a little diffidence as to whether the section intended that a judgment should be pronounced in form, or that simply a certificate should go to the Speaker, so that the Speaker should be the first person to know officially what was the decision of the judge. But upon reading the section I incline to think that it is incumbent upon the judge to announce at the time in public in the form of an ordinary judgment what his opinion is. The 13th clause of the 11th section is that "At the conclusion of the trial the judge who tried the Petition shall determine whether the Member whose return or election is complained of, or any and what other person, was duly returned or elected, or whether the election was void, and shall forthwith certify in writing such determination to the Speaker, and upon such certificate being given such determination shall be final to all intents and purposes." Then the 14th clause requires that "Where any charge is made in an Election Petition of any corrupt practice having been committed at the election to which the Petition refers, the judge shall, in addition to such certificate, and at the same time, report in writing to the Speaker as follows: (a) Whether any corrupt practice has or has not been proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge and consent of any candidate at such election and the nature of such corrupt practice. (b) The names of all persons, if any, who have been proved at the trial to have been guilty of any corrupt practice. (c) Whether corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the election to which the Petition relates." I conceive that it is at all events proper, in order to avoid questions, and perhaps necessary, to announce the decision under clause 13.

Mr. O'Malley.] Would your Lordship allow me to say that I think that as far as disrespect to the Speaker is concerned, there can be none at all in that course, because, if your Lordship will refer to the law under which the old Election Committees sat, you will find that the form of words with respect to certifying to the House of Commons or reporting to the House of Commons was pretty nearly in the same way as this certifying to the Speaker is now substituted for a report to the House of Commons, and in those cases the invariable practice was that after the Committee had come to their resolutions, they read out the resolutions to the parties assembled.

Mr. Justice Willes.] That was so.

Mr. O'Malley.] And that will be the safer course.

Mr. Justice Willes.] If it is not necessary, at all events it will be the safer course to take, and therefore I shall proceed to read what certificate I intend to notify. I wrote this out subject to the condition that no recriminatory case was gone into. None has been gone into, and therefore I may announce what it is at once. I determine as follows: First, that the Member whose return is complained by the Petition was duly elected and returned to serve in Parliament as Member for the borough of New Windsor; secondly, that no corrupt practice has been proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any candidate at such election; thirdly, that upon the evidence before me, it does not appear that corrupt practices have, and there is upon such evidence no reason to believe that they have, extensively prevailed at the election to which the Petition relates; fourthly, at the close of the case for the Petitioner, and after the address of the learned counsel for the Respondent in answer thereto, the learned counsel for the Petitioner stated in effect that his client felt that the case was not made out as he anticipated it would have been, and that he did not desire to proceed to a scrutiny; fifthly, thereupon, and upon the examination of the Respondent and two of his agents, I was satisfied that this course was not the result of any compromise, and I did not require the learned counsel for the Respondent to proceed with any case of recrimination, nor did I consider it my duty to institute a general inquiry into the proceedings at the election. And I shall certify to the Speaker accordingly. With respect to costs, inasmuch as I conceive that the intention of the statute was to put the question of costs substantially on the same footing as in an ordinary action, and that as a general rule costs ought to be paid by the unsuccessful party, although I am of opinion that the Petition was neither frivolous nor vexatious, yet as it has failed, and there are no special circumstances to displace the general rule, I must order that the Petitioner pay the costs of the Respondent. (Loud applause.)

Mr. Justice Willes.] This ought not to be. If the inhabitants of this country wish to Windsor (New). be governed through the judges, they really must not indulge in applause when they like what the judge does, because otherwise they will necessarily indulge in groaning and disapprobation when they do not like what the judge does, and we judges, if not terrified, may be very much annoyed. I hope that this will not occur again.

After an interval,

Mr. Justice Willes.] I understand that one of the witnesses desires to have a certificate that he gave evidence upon this occasion, with a view to prevent criminal proceedings; I shall give such a certificate to any witness who makes application.

BELFAST ELECTION.

Belfast.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Baron Fitzgerald, 30 January 1869.

Mr. Baron Fitzgerald.] I HAVE considered this case, with certainly great hesitation upon one part of it, but I have come to my determination.

There are points in the case upon which I shall touch very lightly indeed.

There were very important charges of bribery which should not have been made against Mr. M'Clure, with respect to the direct act by himself, and the direct act by his conducting agent.

The act as to himself was the act deposed to by a man named Spence. Spence stated that having been on one occasion previous to the election applied to by Mr. M'Clure for his vote, and having given a doubtful answer to the request that he should vote for him, on the day before the polling he again was called upon by Mr. M'Clure, accompanied by another gentleman. He states that he was then again canvassed; and that the answer which he gave was that he had not made up his mind. Then he says that what Mr. M'Clure did upon that being said, was to take out a purse or pocket-book, take a 5*l.* note from it, and give it into his hand, and then again ask him for his vote. If that were a true story, a clearer, a plainer, and I may add a more mad act of bribery never could have been committed by man than was committed by Mr. M'Clure. Mr. M'Clure has however denied that fact upon his oath. He has said that he never spoke with the man at all; that he had no interview with him upon that occasion, and he positively swears that he never gave him money or anything of the kind. The man, upon his cross-examination, stated that he had kept this money for a day; and that after having kept it for a day, he changed it in a public-house in this town, which he named; he named a boy in it who had given him change for it, and specified the mode in which he got the change; 3*l.* in silver, the other two in notes. He added that he gave 4*l.* to his wife, and spent the rest. Not only has his evidence been denied on oath by Mr. M'Clure as to the act, not only is it a story improbable in itself, and the act one which if done would argue almost madness upon the part of Mr. M'Clure towards a person whom it does not appear he had ever seen or known before; but the boy has been produced, and he has proved that upon that day the shop was actually shut up; that he knows the person of the man, and that he positively did not upon that or any other occasion give him change in that mode. I have no resort under those circumstances but to believe the evidence of Mr. M'Clure, and disbelieve the evidence of the man. I should have a further duty, if I could perform it, and for that purpose I was anxious to have the case investigated to the utmost that I could; but I cannot convict the man of perjury, though I must decide between the swearing of the two, which swears true, and which swears false. I might have a duty, which however I cannot exercise for the power of mere effect alone, of directing the prosecution of that man for perjury. If I could I would. It might even by giving a direction, produce an effect upon this country, and upon the people who hear me; but on the other hand I cannot do anything, sitting here, for the purpose of mere effect only, and I ought not to direct that prosecution, unless I am reasonably satisfied that there could be a conviction upon it. I cannot see how there could be in this case with the information that I have, or, so far as I see, can have the means of obtaining. In order to convict a man of perjury, there must be the oath of two persons against his oath, or there must be circumstances imperatively leading to a conclusion in confirmation of it. I cannot see where the oath of a second person could be got in this case, and though it be true that there is a confirmatory circumstance from the fact, that he did not get the note changed, that can only be come at by proving another perjury on his part by the oath of one witness only. I ought not to direct a prosecution in a case, unless I was satisfied there was reasonable probability of conviction in it, because a worse effect might be produced in the end, whatever might be the present one. Therefore, with deep regret that I am not in a position to order a prosecution, I pass from this this case. Seeing that I cannot put this man upon his trial, and that he has been abandoned by those who called him, I am bound to disbelieve his story, and to believe the story upon the other side, and therefore that case fails.

The next case was the case of James Hutchinson. He swears also to an improbable story, one, perhaps, in some respects, still more improbable than as regards Mr. M'Clure; for that a man in the position of the conducting agent Brett should commit two offences in the same words, that is, tell a man, a paid canvasser, to plump for a party, and also offer him a bribe for the plumping of his vote, is a thing almost incredible in itself. But in the case of these Hutchinsons, I confess, though the evidence was given so as to appear to me that they are not, in many respects, faithworthy witnesses, I am not inclined to take precisely and exactly the same view of their case as I did the case of Spence. I am not perfectly satisfied that there may not have been some interview, and that relating to canvassing, with Mr. Brett, which Mr. Brett has forgotten. He saw these men hanging about. They appear to have been employed by him upon some previous occasion, though Garrett seems to recollect that they were rejected, and it is possible that a conversation of some kind may have taken place between them and Brett, and something or another might have been said which may have been tortured into this. I am bound to believe Mr. Brett's oath that nothing of the sort was ever said; and this case therefore fails also.

The next case is one of a class to which I confess I have been unable from the beginning of this case to give any weight at all, that is the subscription to the Orange Hall. I really confess, having listened with the greatest attention to the arguments on both sides, that I cannot see what effect it has at all in the shape of bribery. I am not here to try whether it was consistent upon the part of Mr. M'Clure to give support to an Orange Hall. I am not here to try whether it was done in perfect sincerity; that is a question with which I have nothing to do; but of this I am sure, that the profession by a candidate of holding certain opinions is a legitimate mode of influencing votes. If it were not, they would have no means in millions of cases of influencing votes at all; and if (for I am not going to try whether it was consistently or sincerely done) Mr. M'Clure thought that it would be for his benefit with reference to the election, and for procuring votes, to inform Orangemen and others that he did entertain opinions in favour of institutions of this kind, I can see nothing illegitimate in that. The case appears to me identically the same as if he had written a pamphlet in support of, or sustaining such institutions as Orange Halls, and had paid the printer for publishing it. I am not upon the question whether it was consistent upon the part of Mr. M'Clure to do it, or whether it was not. If by subscriptions of that kind he thought proper to indicate that his opinions were favourable to institutions of this kind, I have no right to try his consistency or sincerity, but it was perfectly legitimate for him to put forward his opinions as a means of procuring votes.

I now come to the part of the case upon which difficulty really exists, and I quite agree both with Mr. Falkiner and Mr. Kisbey that I am so to endeavour to construe this Act as to repress the mischief which the Act was intended (and, I presume, sincerely) to guard against. I am bound to do that, and for that purpose I am, so far as such common sense and such knowledge of the world as I possess, enable me to do so, to strip of every colour, of every dress, of every shape, any act which is brought before me, so as to discover what the true and real nature of the act is; and if, having so done, if, having stripped it of its colouring, taken off its dress, or varnish, or whatever may be about it, I find that in its true nature, the act is one of the corrupt practices defined by the statute, I am bound, notwithstanding what shape, notwithstanding what colour, notwithstanding any dress it may have, to give effect to the Act of Parliament. But I have not the power under the Act of Parliament to change the nature of the act itself (that I have no power to do) because the act proved may be clearly shown to me by most reasonable evidence to be fraught or attended with all the pernicious consequences which the Act was intended to guard against. I have no power, notwithstanding, to repress the act, unless the act be in its nature one of the corrupt practices specified, and I cannot make it so by reason of its being attended by circumstances which the Act of Parliament was intended to guard against. It appears to me that it is an application of real subtlety, when one endeavours, by reason of the mischief which follows, to alter the nature of the act itself for the purpose of repressing the mischief. That is what I cannot do.

Well now, the transaction, so far as it is necessary for me to state it, is one about which, until we come to the motives of it, there is in reality little or no controversy. It appears that early in the canvassing for Mr. M'Clure, Mr. Duffin, and certain other gentlemen who were his friends and supporters, did hold out an assurance to the friends of Mr. Johnston that a public subscription, instituted for the purpose of defraying the expenses of his election, would be contributed to by them, to the extent of at least 300 l., according to Mr. Duffin's evidence. Mr. Johnston, as it appears he stated to one of the witnesses in this case, Mr. Dysert (and it seems to be agreed by other witnesses that it was so publicly stated), had not the money or the means, or did not think he had the money or the means, or did not wish to apply such money or means as he had to the expenses of his election, and he declined altogether to stand at his own expense; but, as he told Mr. Dysert, he was perfectly willing to be of service to his friends and supporters provided they returned him. Now, so far as I can judge, I have no reason for believing that a subscription instituted for that purpose, that is to pay the expenses of a candidate, and relieve him from any expense in the matter, is in any way an illegal or unconstitutional proceeding. It would behove the candidate to look well that the money of which he availed himself of his own knowledge, is legitimately applied, because he incurs a responsibility the moment he holds himself out as a person to be elected by those means. But that a public subscription raised for that purpose, and contributed by his friends and supporters is itself illegal, I am not aware.

Now it was perfectly competent to the supporters of Mr. M'Clure, if they thought fit to be (for I am not to judge of the sincerity of their votes) in the interest of Mr. Johnston, if they could conscientiously support him, it was as competent to them as to any other persons in the community to contribute to this fund. Therefore there is nothing illegal in that, even though the fact be that they would not have contributed to the fund unless Mr. M'Clure had happened to be a candidate. I do not think it was made less legitimate by that.

That being so, it appears that the subscription went on very slowly up to the election; as far as I can gather there was little more than 300*l.* collected altogether by both parties, and complaints were made that the promises given by those friends of Mr. M'Clure who had engaged to give this subscription, were not carried out. Accordingly, they proposed to do this—and I should imagine it must have been in some respect, at least, with the object of bonâ fide seeing that the money was rightly applied, and placed under the control of parties who would rightly administer it—they proposed to give a guarantee of responsibility for the payment of 500*l.* to the treasurer and three other members of the association, who were also members of Mr. Johnston's election committee. They proposed to give that so that the money should not be forthcoming until the time came for arranging the election expenses. That guarantee was carried by the person to whom it was given by Mr. Brett, the conducting agent of Mr. M'Clure, to Mr. Kelly, the conducting agent for Mr. Johnston, the man being, in the first instance, satisfied with it according to the evidence.

Mr. Kelly objected to it. The ground of his objection, so far as I can gather, was that money would be more serviceable for the purpose; and it is very probable the difficulty may have occurred to him, without doubting the honour or credit of these gentlemen, that it was not a document that could be legally enforced on account of its form. Accordingly, he desires the men to take it back and return it, telling them, at the same time, that it would be better to have the money. But he then appears to have become apprehensive that the money might be paid into the hands of some of these parties, so as to be out of his control in the expenditure, and yet be paid with his knowledge; he was naturally, reasonably, and, I think, properly, afraid that the interests of his own client, Mr. Johnston, the candidate, might be affected by its being entrusted into the hands of these parties; and accordingly (and this is a part of the case that, I acknowledge, has pressed upon me throughout) he writes to Mr. Brett and waits upon Mr. Brett, also nearly contemporaneously, and warns him against making this payment. He offers himself to be responsible for the money; he would be satisfied with its being paid to Clarke, the regular treasurer of it; and Clarke and he appear to have been in communication upon it. But he positively warns him, and I think the fair inference from his evidence is that he must have been afraid that it would not be legitimately applied for the purposes of Mr. Johnston's election. In the face of that, the course adopted, upon the suggestion of the man, so far as I could see, and, so far as I understand Shannon's evidence, was, that 300*l.* of the 500*l.* should be paid in the mode in which Kelly required, and the remaining 200*l.* given to four of these active persons. Mr. Kisbey says—though it does not appear to me to be very material upon this part of the case—that they did not appear to be exactly the four named in the guarantee. Clarke was not one of the four to whom it was to be given, and instead of Clarke a man named McGladdery was one of the four to whom it was given, but his name is not in the guarantee.

According to Shannon, the ambassador of these men to Brett, the 200*l.* is given by Duffin. Duffin says his difficulty was this: he was under an honourable engagement, to secure a contribution to the sum to be raised for defraying the expenses of Mr. Johnston's election. He says, there seem to be disputes among themselves what should be paid. He says, "I could not tell what to pay." And under those circumstances 300*l.* of it was paid as one party desired, and the remaining 200*l.* to the rest.

Well, now I confess the strong inference to my mind would be that, even supposing the real intention of the gentleman who paid this money was to secure the return of Mr. Johnston, there would be strong ground for holding that money so paid to these parties, under such warning especially, would be a corrupt practice so far as the election of Johnston was concerned. If money paid to secure the return of a party means anything, it appears to me that money so paid, with almost the assurance and the certainty that it will not be regularly applied, is a corrupt practice, and if it be not a corrupt practice, I find it difficult to say what the first clause and the fifth clause of that section mean.

Then comes its serious bearing upon this part of the case. If I find gentlemen and men of business so acting, with a species of disregard as to the mode in which the money is applied, does it not afford something in the shape of strong evidence that (interested as they were for M'Clure, and the probable inference from what they did being that this money never would have been subscribed at all unless M'Clure had been a candidate) the real object of the money so handed over was something different, and that it was intended by its influence as money to procure the support of these men for M'Clure? That is the difficulty that has pressed upon my mind throughout this case; I put it as strongly as I can, but not more strongly than it has pressed upon my own mind.

On

Belfast.

On the other hand, if I could be fully satisfied that this money had been paid legitimately as a subscription to the fund, and that the real hope as to the mode in which it would affect Mr. M'Clure's election was by the impression produced upon the supporters of Johnston, and the community of feeling and desire to aid upon the part of M'Clure, it appears to me that the payment would be a legitimate one, and if the money was paid legitimately there would be no reason to complain of it.

Supposing I were satisfied that however corrupt the practice was as regards Mr. Johnston's election, the only effect it could produce upon Mr. M'Clure's election would be an identical one, and that that was the effect contemplated, can I make it a corrupt practice as to the election of Mr. M'Clure? It does not appear to me that the Act has said so.

The true way to try it is, supposing that state of facts to be clear, that is, that it was so clearly a corrupt practice to secure the election of Johnston that an indictment could be maintained against these parties for corrupt practice in order to procure the return of Johnston, and it further appeared that these parties entertained a hope or expectation that the effect produced upon the minds of the supporters of Johnston would be a community of opinion and aid from them in favour of the election of Mr. M'Clure, and that they would give their votes just in the same way as they would if the money had been directly so applied; can I say that an indictment could be sustained against them in the alternative in order to procure the election of Mr. M'Clure? If I cannot, then I say it comes to this, that it is a case not provided for by the Act of Parliament, though open to mischief, but I have no power to change the nature of the act itself, because it would have been followed by the same mischief, and to make it an act of the same nature as that which would be corrupt under the Act of Parliament.

The real difficulty that has been upon my mind is whether I must not regard this as a mere colourable proceeding, considering the mode in which it was done by men of business, by men well acquainted, several of them, with electioneering practices and contrivances of various kinds—whether I am not to treat this as a colourable act really done to influence the election, as distinct from the contrivance of which I have spoken, and which might operate in favour of the election of M'Clure. I acknowledge that there appear to me to be strong grounds for treating it in that way, and that has pressed heavily upon my mind throughout. But in order to do that I must act against the sworn testimony of men of respectability and character. I need hardly say that I pay very little or no regard to a gentleman who gets upon the table and says, with indignation, I never committed an act of bribery in my life, because I do not know what is the meaning of it, unless I know that the gentleman puts the same meaning upon the word "bribery" as I do. Trace this throughout, up to the moment at which the separation took place into two sums, and I am unable to see anything that can be treated as a corrupt practice to secure the election of Mr. M'Clure. Well, then, am I to distrust these gentlemen as to the instructions given, however loose they were, that this was not intended to impose any obligation whatever upon the parties to whom it was given that it was to be for the election of Johnston; that it was given in regard to the original promise, and so forth; and the positive oath of these men that they did it for no other purpose? It is a strong thing for me to do that. If I were to act merely upon the probabilities of the case alone, I acknowledge my conclusion would have been different, although even then there are circumstances insisted upon by Mr. Andrews as to the original innocence of this transaction, and the peculiar circumstances under which the alteration took place.

I cannot, in the face of that sworn testimony, whatever doubt I have; and I am obliged to put it under the same class of cases as the money given by Mr. Dysert.

With reference to the case of treating, I really shall not dwell upon that. It seems to me that the purpose mentioned in the Act of Parliament has not been proved in either of the cases which have been spoken to in evidence, and they appear to me to have been merely introduced for the purpose of filling up the case.

Therefore I have come to the conclusion to declare Mr. M'Clure duly elected, and, of course, I must say that he is not cognisant that any corrupt practice was resorted to at this election. And the costs must follow in the ordinary course.

BEWDLEY ELECTION.—(No. 2.)

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Blackburn, 29 April 1869.

Mr. Justice Blackburn.] I MUST take this case as a mixed question of law and fact, in order to see what the jurisdiction is. First of all, the Act of Parliament originally establishing the register of voters, and requiring the revision before the barrister, made the register conclusive at the time of the election; the returning officer must go by the registration, and the registration alone, at the time of the election; but there were some doubts as to the extent to which an Election Committee of the House of Commons might think Bewdley.

(No. 2.)

Bewdley.
(No. 2.)

that they should look into it; it was, no doubt, part of the scheme of the revision that points of law might be reserved for the Court of Common Pleas; and the decision of the Court of Common Pleas upon those points of law was made final. Questions of fact there was no appeal upon at all unless it was to an election committee.

Then the Act of the 6 & 7 Vict., c. 18, s. 98 (which is the one now in force) after reciting the doubts, says that "It shall and may be lawful for any such Committee" (and now the election judges stand in the place of the Committee) "to inquire into and decide upon the right to vote of any person who, being upon the register of voters in force at the time of such election, shall have voted in such election, or not being upon such register, shall have tendered his vote at such election, in case the name of such person shall have been specially retained upon such register, or inserted therein, or expunged, or omitted therefrom by the express decision of the revising barrister who shall have revised the list of voters from which such register shall have been formed; and also that it shall and may be lawful for such committee to inquire into and decide upon the right to vote of any person who, being upon such register, shall have voted in such election, so far as the same may be disputed on the ground of legal incapacity at the time of his voting under and by virtue of any statute now or hereafter to be in force, or on the ground of any legal incapacity at the time of his voting which may have arisen subsequently to the expiration of the time allowed for making out the list of voters from which the register of voters in force at the time of such election shall have been formed. There were some other provisions relating to other matters.

Now I consider the effect of that to be, that inasmuch as on matters of law there was an appeal to the Court of Common Pleas, yet upon matters of fact the decision of the revising barrister would be final, and it was not a matter that he could send to the Court of Common Pleas." Supposing, for example, the barrister had taken some peculiar view of the evidence, and had found that houses were of the value of 10 l. when most men would not have thought they were of the value of 5 l., or had held that houses were of the value of 10 l. when most men thought they were of the value of 15 l., such matters as that he could not have sent to the Court of Common Pleas; I think what the Legislature had in view was, that where a matter of fact has been fairly raised before the revising barrister, and the revising barrister has heard it, and come to an express decision upon it, then his decision may be reviewed by the election committee in order to see that injustice has not been done.

Now, in the present case, it comes with a rather peculiar sort of express decision; the first case coming before the revising barrister, the case of Chillingworth, being upon the overseer's list would have stood upon the overseer's list without any decision of the revising barrister at all, unless somebody properly objected to it. If anybody properly objected to it, then the revising barrister would have to hear the evidence upon both sides and to come to an express decision upon the merits. As was right and proper, it was first necessary to see that there was an objection, and that there was a notice of objection which was good, and consequently the revising barrister should have inquired into the merits of the case. The revising barrister after hearing and considering it came to a conclusion which I must treat as an erroneous conclusion, considering myself, as the superior authority, to be right and the revising barrister wrong; he decided that the notice of objection was bad when, in fact, it was good.

Then the first question is, is that retaining his name by "an express decision?" If the barrister had been right in saying that the notice of objection was bad, the name could not have been removed from the list at all; but when he, upon this preliminary point, decides that he will not enter into the merits at all, and erroneously decides so, when he ought to have entered into them, I think we must consider it as "an express decision" retaining the name, and consequently enabling me to enter into the merits. It would not follow from that, that Chillingworth's was a bad vote, and should have been struck off, but only that I have the jurisdiction to inquire whether it was a good vote or not.

Then after this had been decided, and after it had been stated that a great many names would depend upon this decision, and that the objections were the same, I find upon the facts before me (and I must take a view of the matter which is formed upon the facts), that in fact in each case where the form of the notice of objection was actually the same, the same objection to it would arise, the same infirmity, if it had been an infirmity, in the notice of objection. I come to the conclusion that the barrister having had his attention called to the fact that there were many such notices to the same purpose, it would have been neither respectful nor useful to attempt to argue against the decision he had already come to; and, consequently, the two advocates did say, There is no use contesting this further, and it will govern a good many cases. I come to the conclusion from the evidence that when the barrister was calling over the names, and when there was no objection made, he did not in fact know in which particular cases it was that no objection was brought forward, because there really was a notice of objection, but in the form of the one which he had already decided to be a nullity, and in which particular cases the objection was not brought forward, because there was really no objection at all, I think it is very probable that if I had the revising barrister here he would say he acted upon that assumption. Had the revising barrister been called, and had he given his evidence half-an-hour after this had happened, and had he been asked whether James Baker's name was one to which there had been really an objection, but which was not brought brought forward because it was in this defective form, and whether it was an objection which for some other reason was not a good one and was not brought forward, I feel little doubt that the revising barrister would have said, "It is impossible for me to tell; I know if the objection was in the same form as the other, they agreed not to bring the objection forward because I had decided it before; but whether it applied to the particular case of James Baker or not I do not know; if it did, they were quite right in not bringing it forward." I have no doubt the revising barrister would have said so if his memory had been sufficient to have enabled him to do so.

Now, coming to that conclusion, I have to see whether or not his not entering into the merits of James Baker's case was in consequence of his express decision, that the notice of objection in Baker's case was no objection at all, or whether it was not so to be considered. Well, I have stated the facts and the conclusion I have come to upon them. Therefore, in this case, I can come to no other conclusion than that it amounts in point of law to just the same as if it had been stated over again to him, and it had been said, "Sir, in James Baker's case there is a notice of objection, and it is exactly the same as the other case, and I do not press it;" and the revising barrister had nodded his head and said, "Very well." Of course it would have saved some discussion and trouble now if it had then been specifically said, "Well, then, sir, since you have so decided, it may be important at some future election, and we will make a list of 30 or 40 names which your decision in this case will govern;" and the barrister had said, "Yes," it would have saved time and trouble in the inquiry now; and in any future case that arises it may be well to do so. But I think the substance and effect is exactly the same as if it had been so said. Taking that to be so, I must take the decision in Chillingworth's case to be a decision which applies to govern the subsequent cases in which the point was exactly the same.

What I now decide does not go further than this, that Baker's case is one which was in the overseer's list, into the merits of which the barrister by express decision refused to enter, and it is now open to the petitioner to enter into the merits of the case to show that the name ought to have been struck off by the revising barrister. If they make out their case, I will strike it out now; if not, I will retain it.

BRECKNOCK BOROUGH ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Baron Martin, 9th April 1869.

Brecknock Borough.

Mr. Baron Martin.] It is needless that I should repeat what I have already said. It will be my duty to report to the Speaker that Mr. Gwyn was not duly elected. I shall further act upon his statement which I have just heard, and report that I have no reason to believe that he himself had anything to do with illegal practice: I shall further report that I have no reason to believe that illegal practices have existed to any extent in the borough.

The costs will follow the event.

CARRICKFERGUS ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice O'Brien, 26 January 1869.

Carrickfergus.

Mr. Justice O'Brien.] It is now my duty, at the close of this inquiry, to announce the decision to which I have come after a careful and anxious investigation of the evidence.

I think it well, in the first instance, to notice some matters connected with the general proceedings on this petition, namely, the allegations that certain witnesses were either spirited or kept away by the respondent, or those acting for him. The three that were named were William Hamilton, Mr. Dubordieu, and Mr. Borthwick. With respect to Hamilton, it is clear that, for some purpose or other, he left the town deliberately to avoid being examined here, but I see no ground for imputing to the respondent, or to any one acting for or authorised by him, any participation in Hamilton's departure; and indeed, from the evidence given by his wife and his son, who were examined, it appears to me that there was nothing in respect of which he could have given more evidence, if he had been examined. It is also to be observed that Mr. Dubordieu (another of the witnesses alleged to have been spirited away by the respondent or those acting for him) was himself a supporter of Mr. Torrens at the last election, and that on the very morning when Hamilton announced to his wife his intention of departing so abruptly, Dubordieu was with him, and that he and Dubordieu left his house together. With regard to Mr. Borthwick, I must say that I do not understand the allegation; he is a gentleman of position, a magistrate, a grand juror, and filled once the office of high sheriff of this place; he was also a supporter of Mr. Torrens. It is difficult to conceive that his absence could have been caused by any unwillingness or apprehension on his part as to giving evidence. It may be accounted for by the circumstance that he had no evidence to give beyond what has already transpired on this trial.

During the progress of this case, I felt myself bound, under the provisions of the Act which I have to carry out, to give every facility that I could to the production of witnesses. In some respects the petitioner came down here manifestly ignorant of the exact grounds upon which several of the charges in the petition were founded: I therefore thought it reasonable, upon a proper case being made, to allow petitioner, and those acting for him, to amend his Bill of Particulars, by adding such facts as recently came to their knowledge. In the early part of this trial an application was made to amend the Bill of Particulars, by stating that some tenants of Mr. Cornwall's, named in the affidavit of Mr. Boyle, the petitioner's attorney, had been "intimidated, or bribed, or treated." I considered the affidavit defective in many respects. It stated that Mr. Boyle was informed by Mr. Cornwall that he, Mr. Cornwall, was reliably informed that such tenants had been "either bribed, or intimidated, or treated." I considered the affidavit insufficient, having regard to settled rules of practice. Mr. Cornwall made no affidavit stating either the information he received, or his belief in it. I accordingly made "no rule," on that application. But I expressly stated, at the same time, that my not doing so should be without prejudice to any further application that might be made. No further application was made for that amendment, but Mr. Faulkner subsequently applied for an amendment of the Bill of Particulars, in other respects which I thought it right to comply with. As regards the summoning of so many witnesses, I can well understand the difficulty of petitioners getting information from the supporters of his opponents, and although the course adopted by the petitioner's counsel protracted this inquiry very much, I think it was a legitimate and proper course for them to take, namely, to summon witnesses who they thought would, when known, give information which they had not given before; and also to serve, during the trial, subpoenas on, and procure orders for compelling the attendance of any other witnesses whom, from the evidence given during the trial, they considered to be material. I mention this because much comment has been made on the number of witnesses who have been examined, and who proved nothing of any importance.

In the trial of these petitions, when the purity of the election is questioned, the most searching inquiry should be instituted, and it is the duty of the judge to afford every facility in his power to that investigation. I must, however observe, that during the progress of the case there was not (with the exception of William Hamilton, already mentioned) any difficulty in getting the production, almost immediately, of any witnesses who were required by petitioner's counsel.

With respect to the several grounds relied on for vitiating the election, I shall first refer to the charges of intimidation. The evidence on this point was that of Mr. Cornwall, Mr. Craig, and Mr. Wilson. That the assaults upon those two gentlemen, Mr. Cornwall and Mr. Wilson, were unjustifiable no one can doubt. A stronger word might well be applied to them, particularly to that upon Mr. Wilson, which appears to have been outrageous. Mr. Cornwall states that he was a member of Mr. Torrens's committee; that he voted for him about nine o'clock without any obstruction; that he remained near the booths for some time, and that about an hour afterwards, while he was standing near the booths, the following transaction occurred, which has been so much commented on by counsel. It appears that Erskine or Asken, a tenant of Mr. Cornwall, came up with three men about him; he had previously promised Mr. Cornwall to vote for Mr. Torrens, and had then a voting card in his hand, which he doubled up when he saw it was observed by Mr. Cornwall, and he then went into the booth to vote for Mr. Dalway. Mr. Cornwall went also into the booth because he saw what the man had done. Mr. Cornwall might have had no business in the booth, but I do not see why he was not at liberty to go in, although he had no business there. We all know, as a matter of experience, that the friends of both parties visit the booths. Mr. Cornwall remained there for some time, and on his coming out of the booth was assaulted in a very scandalous manner, pushed or jostled by the crowd, though not so as to injure him. It appears that after Mr. Cornwall left the booth his tenant voted for Mr. Dalway. Mr. Wilson was assaulted twice; once in the street near the booth, about half-past 10 or 11 o'clock, after he had been some two or three hours there, and afterwards in a still more violent manner, when he received the injuries from which he has suffered so much. These assaults cannot be justified or extenuated on the ground, either that Mr. Cornwall might be supposed to have gone into the booth for the purpose of influencing his tenant, or that Mr. Wilson was supposed, by his presence, to be endeavouring to influence the tenants of Lord Downshire, whose local agent he was, or that there might have been an ill feeling towards Mr. Wilson on the subject subject of the commons, about which there appears to have been previous litigation with the people. I do not regard such excuses, but the questions remain. Was Mr. Dalway responsible for such assaults, and were they of such a character as, within the authority of any decided case, would be sufficient to vitiate this election? I must express my regret and surprise that the perpetrators of those outrages, particularly of the gross attack upon Mr. Wilson, were not taken up, tried, and, if convicted, punished. Three of those who assaulted Mr. Wilson were identified by James Craig, a witness and supporter of the petitioner. One of those three men, called Strain, was identified by Mr. Wilson himself, and I regret that those three men who, I have no doubt, acted as Mr. Wilson and Mr. Craig have stated, were not punished for it. However, as I have already said, the question is how far Mr. Dalway is answerable for these assaults, and how far they vitiate or affect the election. The mob were certainly in Mr. Dalway's interest, that is to say, they were his supporters, anxious for him, and testifying their zeal in a highly reprehensible and criminal manner, so far as these two assaults were concerned. But we must not lose sight of this, that when Mr. Wilson was assaulted, some three or four of Mr. Dalway's prominent supporters tried to protect, and to a certain extent did protect him. He voted for Mr. Torrens, and Craig also states that he himself voted for Mr. Torrens, and there is no evidence whatever to show that any single voter on that day was prevented from voting; on the contrary, the result of the evidence, is that, with the exception of those assaults on Mr. Wilson and Mr. Cornwall, and one on Mr. Borthwick, which was of a much more mitigated character, there was not any such rioting, disturbance, or violence in the town, as would reasonably have deterred any person from voting. It also appeared on the evidence, that so far as the general mass of the electors on both sides, and the people of the town, were concerned, there was no hostility between them; that, on the contrary, on several occasions, the voters on the one side, and the voters on the other were seen together, and sometimes treated each other. But, what is more satisfactory, and what I more rely upon, is the evidence of Mr. Irwin, the resident magistrate; it was his duty to preserve the peace, and from his experience and knowledge of such matters, from the necessity he was under, in the discharge of his duty, of looking after the state of the town that day, he was peculiarly capable of giving satisfactory evidence. He states, in his evidence, that the town on the day of the election was remarkably quiet; that he had 120 men, which were sufficient to enable him to keep it quiet if disturbed, and that he witnessed the assaults on Mr. Wilson, Mr. Cornwall, and Mr. Borthwick. It is, I think, unnecessary to refer to the evidence of the assault on Mr. Borthwick, because it falls far short of the others, and that gentleman does not come here to speak of it. Mr. Irwin also states that those were the only instances of disturbance he saw during the day; that he never saw a more quiet election, and that he did not see very much drunkenness. Now, upon this state of facts, I cannot come to any other conclusion than that there was not any such intimidation or undue influence by means of intimidation upon that day as would be at all sufficient to affect the validity of the election.

I shall now consider another ground of objection, namely, that of treating, and the treating relied on, is the giving food and drink to voters upon the day of the election, or some day before or about that time.

Now, it is material to direct attention to the two sections of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854, which have been so much referred to. The fourth section provides that, "Every candidate at an election who shall corruptly by himself, or by or with any person, or by any other ways or means on his behalf at any time, either before, during, or after any election, directly or indirectly give, or provide, or cause to be given or provided, or shall be accessory to the giving or providing, or shall pay, wholly or in part, any expenses incurred for any meat, drink, entertainment, or provision to or for any person, in order to be elected, or for being elected, or for the purpose of corruptly influencing such person or any other person to give or refrain from giving his vote at such election, or on account of such person having voted or refrained from voting, or being about to vote or refrain from voting at such election, shall be deemed guilty of the offence of treating, and shall forfeit the sum of 50 l. to any person who shall sue for the same, with full costs of suit."

According to the obvious and grammatical construction of that section, the word "corruptly" at the beginning of it governs the entire of the section. It is not necessary to rely on the word "corruptly" which occurs in the middle of the section of the Act before the word "influencing," because that refers to only one of the acts mentioned in the section, but the word "corruptly," at the beginning of that section, renders it necessary that every act therein mentioned should be done corruptly in order to constitute an offence within that section. The 23rd section then provides, "That the giving or causing to be given to any voter on the day of nomination or day of polling, on account of such voter having polled or being about to poll, any meat, drink, or entertainment by way of refreshment, or any money or ticket, to enable such voter to obtain refreshment, shall be deemed an illegal act, and the person so offending shall forfeit the sum of 40 s. for each offence, to any person who shall sue for the same, together with full costs of suit." In that 23rd section the word "corruptly" is not used, and though that section does not mention the word "candidate," it applies as well to acts done by the candidate or his agent as to acts done by any other person. Upon those two sections of that Statute what is the reasonable conclusion? That the same act of a candidate which, if it fell within the fourth section (as having been done corruptly) would disqualify him from being elected, would, if it only fell within the 23rd section, render him only liable to a 40 s. penalty. There must therefore be a difference between the acts of the candidate, which were legislated against by those two sections. As it could not be reasonably supposed that the Legislature intended to subject the candidate to different penalties by the two sections for the same act; I think the difference is, that to bring the act within the fourth section so as to disqualify the candidate from being elected, the act should be done corruptly.

I have attentively considered the authorities which were referred to by counsel during the trial, and the first I shall mention is the case of Cooper v. Slade, which is reported in the sixth House of Lord's Cases (p. 746), and previously in 6th Ellis & Black (p. 447), when before the Court of Exchequer Chamber. That case was an action for penalties under the 2nd section of the same Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, which, by the first paragraph, provides that every person shall be guilty of bribery "who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, give, lend, or agree to give or lend, or shall offer, promise, or promise to procure, or to endeavour to procure, any money or valuable consideration, to or for any voter, or to or for any person, on behalf of any voter, or to or for any other person, in order to induce such voter to vote or to refrain from voting, or shall corruptly do any such act as aforesaid, on account of such voter having voted, or refrained from voting at any election." The questions in that case arose upon the 7th and 8th counts of the declaration. The 7th count proceeded on the first part of that first paragraph, and alleged defendant's promise before the election of money to induce the voter to vote. And the 8th count proceeded on the 2nd clause of that first paragraph, and alleges that the defendant, after the election, corruptly gave money to the voter on account of his having voted. The money given was for the purpose of paying the expense of conveying the voter. The case was tried before Lord Wensleydale, then Baron Parke. The verdict was had for the plaintiff on both counts, and the case came before the Court of Exchequer Chamber on a bill of exceptions, alleging (amongst other grounds of error), that there was no evidence to support the charge contained in the 8th count, namely, that the act was done corruptly. The Court of Exchequer Chamber held that there was no such evidence; and Baron Alderson, in delivering the judgment of that court, makes the following observations with respect to the 4th and 23rd sections of the Act. In pages 456 and 457, he says, "the 4th section only prohibits the corruptly giving of meat, &c., for the purpose of corruptly influencing a voter to give a vote. It does not prohibit the bonâ fide giving of such meat, &c., unconditionally, while section 23 absolutely prohibits any giving of refreshment to any voter on the day of nomination, or day of polling, on account of his having polled, or being about to poll, without using any such words as 'in order to induce'"; now, a giving of refreshment might clearly be within section 23, and not within section 4, because not given in order to induce the voter to vote.

Again, in page 459, he says, "We think the word 'corruptly' has a definite meaning. If, for instance, there had been a previous unlawful promise conditional on the voter voting, or if there had been a previous understanding to that effect, or a corrupt bargain, for the future, we think the case would have been within the Statute."

Baron Alderson then observes upon the consequences that would result from not giving to the word "corruptly" the meaning he contended for.

Upon that case coming before the House of Lords, the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber was reserved; but Mr. Rogers states, in his work on Elections, page 351 (last edition), that the decision was reversed without impugning the law laid down; and, upon looking at the Report of the Proceedings in the House of Lords, I find that, so far as the construction of the 4th section is concerned, there is no decision of the House of Lords opposed to the construction put upon that section by Baron Alderson. The case before the House of Lords arose upon the word "corruptly" in the 2nd section; and Baron Alderson had, in the course of his judgments in the Exchequer Chamber, referred to section 4 for the meaning of the word "corrupt." It has been urged that the majority of the judges, in answering the questions put to them by the House of Lords, expressed their dissent from the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, but they did so upon the ground that there was, in their opinion, evidence to go to the jury that the act was done corruptly. It will be found that Baron Channel, Baron Watson, Justice Williams, and Justice Wightman, in their judgments, referred to the fact of the promise having been made before the vote, as evidence that the subsequent performance of it was corrupt. It is true that Mr. Justice Willes goes somewhat farther, and expresses his opinion that if a man purposely does an act which the law forbids as tending to corrupt voters, then he does that act "corruptly." But, as he has since observed, Mr. Justice Willes, in giving that opinion, was dealing with the case of bribery, and with the word "corruptly," as used in section 2.

And Mr. Justice Coleridge, in pp. 784 and 785, states his opinion that, in case of payment to a voter after the election, it was material (in order to bring that act within the second section) that it should have been done corruptly. He also observes, that the Statute expressly made the operating motive in the mind of the party material, and required that that motive must be "corrupt"; and he further observes, that it would be against the proper construction of the Statute to make the act of itself evidence of corruption.

The judgment of the House of Lords in that case was given by Lord Cranworth and Lord Wensleydale. It is true that Lord Cranworth, in his judgment (page 788), states that he could not give to the word "corruptly," as used in the 2nd section with reference to a payment after voting, any other meaning than a payment in violation of that which the Statute was passed to prohibit. But Lord Wensleydale, in his judgment, pages 790 and 791, referring to the construction which he had put at the trial upon the word "corruptly," stated, that "he did not exactly understand the meaning of that word as used in in that Act"; and that he was not perfectly satisfied with the correctness of the opinion he had expressed as to its construction. In a further part of his judgment (p. 797), he also says, "I have, however, very great doubt whether I was right in my construction of the obscure terms of the Act, &c., in holding, that if a candidate, after the election, pays a voter money, the moving cause of his doing so being that the voter has given him his vote, the payment is 'corrupt.'"

The final decision of the House of Lords was, that upon plaintiff entering a nolle prosequi upon the eighth count he obtained judgment upon the seventh count; which did not raise the question at all. I have referred so fully to this case, being one of such importance and high authority, and because it was so much relied on by counsel during the trial as bearing upon the meaning of the word "corruptly," in the fourth section.

With regard to the acts that have been held to constitute the offence of treating, Mr. Kisbey, in his very able address, has referred to two cases decided by Committees of the House of Commons. One was the Roscommon case, in 1st Wolfstone and Bristowe, p. 107, in which the election of Captain Gough was voided, it appearing that voters had, when they came in from the country the night before the polling, been kept and accommodated in various refreshment houses in the district. That was held to amount to treating. The other case, referred to by Mr. Kisbey, was the Peterborough case, in 2nd Power, Rodwell, & Dew, page 259, in which the election was also held void upon the ground of treating, because, on the morning of the declaration (and of course after the election was over) cards were issued, announcing that a public dinner would be given to the successful candidate, and because the successful candidate going to the dinner paid for the wine.

This case certainly goes very far; but, with every respect for the decisions of Committees of the House of Commons, and admitting that so far as practice goes, and where a case is without precedent, they are decisions to be regarded, it will be seen that those decisions are by no means uniform upon the subject of treating. Thus, in the "Carlisle case," which is also reported in 1st Wolf & Bristowe, p. 95, immediately preceding the report of the "Roscommon case," it appeared that the petition was for bribery and treating. It was proved, in that Carlisle case, that the agent of the sitting Members had invited about 20 out-voters to breakfast at his house on the day of the election, that the voters came there in conveyances provided for that purpose by the agents of the sitting Members, and that the solicitor of one of the sitting Members had also invited four other voters to breakfast. But the ground relied upon by counsel for the sitting Members, as disproving the charge of treating and corruption, was that all the persons so invited had long before promised their votes to the sitting Members, and were all supporters of the political party to which the sitting Members belonged (a fact to which there is something similar in the present case), and the Committee adopted the view pressed by the counsel for the sitting Members, namely, that what was done was done bonâ fide, and that the treating was not corrupt, and accordingly the election was held good.

Mr. Kisbey also relied on the Falkirk case, in 1st Wolverstone & Dew, p. 170, in which case the Member was unseated on the ground of treating, it appearing that not only on the polling day, but on previous days, eatables and drinkables were supplied to voters, without payment or stint at several inns in the town, and that the treating went on at the committee-rooms on the polling day; and that the agent of the sitting Member, for election expenses, ordered some of the refreshments supplied on the polling day to be put down to the committee; but, in the very same book, pp. 111 and 113, the Tewkesbury case, relied on by Mr. Law, is reported, in which the Committee held that the charge of treating was not sustained, although it appeared that on the polling day, from early in the morning until evening, refreshments (not certainly considerable in quantity), were supplied in the house of the sitting Member's agent for election expenses, and were partaken of by some voters and others.

I shall also refer to the Aylesbury case, in 1st Wolverstone & Bristowe, pp. 13 and 15, in which it appeared that refreshments were supplied at the hotels to various voters; that the agent of the sitting Members was "in and out of the inn during the whole day," which would imply his sanction of what was done; and yet the Committee found that the charge of treating was not proved. I refer to these cases, to show that the decisions of the House of Commons cannot be said to be uniform upon this question of treating; they are decisions which it would be difficult to reconcile one with the other, and therefore we must consider each case upon the facts proved in evidence.

I shall now refer, in the first instance, to the alleged treating at Gray's house. It is clear, in my opinion, that Gray should be regarded as the agent for Mr. Dalway. That has not indeed been controverted; and what I have to consider is, whether the act of supplying drink there was done "corruptly" within the meaning of the 4th section. If it was it would subject the parties to a severe penalty, and under the 36th section the sitting Member would be subject to the further penalty of disqualification for sitting for this borough during the present Parliament. I feel, therefore, that I should not come to such a conclusion except upon satisfactory and sufficient evidence. I need not go in detail through all the evidence on this matter, which could not be done within any reasonable limits, and it has been already very ably commented on by Mr. Kisbey in his reply. But it appears to me that the result of such evidence is, that all the voters who partook of drink in Gray's house had come there with the express determination to vote for Mr. Dalway, that all of them, with the exception of some 10 or 12, had their voting cards with them; that the great majority of them were country voters who had left their houses very early; and that the principal part of the drink supplied upon that occasion (namely, that supplied by Adamson & Logan) was not got till the election was virtually decided, namely, about half-past 11 o'clock, when, it appeared upon the evidence, that Mr. Dalway's majority was one that could not be got over, and that his return was morally certain. It is not shown that previous to that day there had been any promise or announcement that such drink or refreshment would be supplied. Gray states that nothing was said to any of the voters about their votes at the time of their getting the drink, and he also swears that what he did was of his own motion; and that in giving the people drink he had no intention whatever of influencing their votes. This is not similar to cases found in the reports of some election proceedings in England, in which it appeared that the treating was going on during the canvass, and that the candidate before the election had solicited the votes of the electors at public-houses, or other places where drink was supplied, and in which cases the election on various occasions have been properly voided upon the ground of treating.

Imputations have been thrown out upon the veracity or candour of some of the witnesses produced for the petitioner, who were supporters of Mr. Dalway, and I must own that, with regard to some of them, the imputation of want of candour appears to be not without some foundation. But I have been asked to do what I do not think I can do, namely, to go beyond the evidence, and assume facts of which no evidence has been given. The witnesses who have been impugned were called, not for the respondent to disprove the case made by the petitioner, but they were called upon by the petitioner to prove his case, and I cannot act upon the conjecture or suspicion that there are facts within the knowledge of those witnesses, but withheld by him, which, if stated, would make out or strengthen the case of the petitioner. I must decide on the evidence that has been given. If facts were proved by the petitioner from which, if uncontradicted or unexplained, inferences unfavourable to the respondent would reasonably be drawn, then the want of such explanation or contradiction might well be relied on, as showing that those inferences were well warranted; but the case is different when no facts are proved which would warrant such inferences. So far as the drinking at Gray's is concerned, I do not consider it necessary to refer to the evidence more minutely. I think I have stated the fair result of it; and, upon these grounds, and considering that the charge of corruption should be clearly made out, I cannot come to the conclusion that the drink in that place was given corruptly, or constituted the offence of treating within the 4th section.

Before I consider the other cases of treating relied on, I think it convenient to refer to the charges of bribery which have been brought against Mr. Dalway and his agents. It was properly admitted by the counsel for the petitioner, and indeed in making that admission he only stated what was the fact, that up to the close of the third day of this trial on Saturday evening not a scintilla of evidence was given to sustain this charge of bribery, although 49 or 50 cases of bribery were mentioned in the bill of particulars furnished in accordance with Judge Keogh's order. By that bill of particulars various persons of respectability and position are charged as bribers; and various other persons, some of them apparently of respectable position in this town, are charged as having been bribed. Some of those alleged to have been bribed and some of the alleged bribers were examined during the first three days of this trial. I need not go through their evidence, because it is admitted that the result was the same as to all. They positively denied that there was any foundation for the charge of bribery, and I see no reason whatever to doubt their evidence in, or to imagine that any of the witnesses, even those alleged by petitioner's counsel, to be subject to the imputation of want of candour in their evidence with respect to the charge of treating, are subject to the same imputation in respect to the charge of bribery. But on yesterday, the fourth day of the trial, evidence was given upon which it was sought, by Mr. Kisbey, to rely as proof of bribery, but I must say it was not pressed by Mr. Kisbey as if he felt he had a very strong case; I refer to the transactions with Thomas Boyd and John M'Dowell, who were examined yesterday. The transaction as to Boyd is that Mr. Dalway canvassed him, that the man said, "Come to my house and I will give you a promise," and that on the way he asked Mr. Dalway, not for employment or for money, but for liberty for his son to have a day's coursing with a young dog over the property of Mr. Dalway's father. The case as to M'Dowell is, that Mr. Dalway met M'Dowell, that the man came over to him, was canvassed by Mr. Dalway and immediately promised him his vote; that the man afterwards asked Mr. Dalway to give him work at the mines, and that Mr. Dalway said that he could not tell him anything about it; that he did not know whether there was work for him or not; but that he should go to Mr. M'Cartney who was employed by Mr. Dalway over the works at the mines which were several miles distant, and that he (M'Cartney) would tell him whether he wanted any hands, or had work to spare. Mr. Dalway further states that, in this conversation with M'Dowell about work, he had not in his mind the slightest reference to the man's vote at the election, and that he thought so little of the matter that he never spoke to M'Cartney about it, and did not, until some time after M'Dowell was employed, know that he had been so employed. Now, can it be seriously contended that either the one or the other of these cases will support a charge of bribery? With regard to the case of Boyd, I pass by the singularity of the inducement alleged to have been held out; and even assuming that it comes within the definition which Baron Alderson is stated, in Rogers on Elections, p. 341 (n), to have given of the words "valuable consideration" in the Bribery Act, namely, that they mean valuable consideration estimated in money, it seems almost a waste of time to dwell further upon this case for the purpose of showing it is not a case of bribery. The liberty of coursing was one which Mr. Dalway states he had given to several; and was in the habit of giving on various occasions. With respect then to the employment of M'Dowell, I am at a loss to know if that be considered a case of bribery, what a person who was a candidate for a city or other place, and happened to be engaged in business could do, if any voter came and asked him for employment, can it be held that he should employ no voter?

I may refer on this matter to the observation of Mr. Justice Willes, in the Windsor case, in which a sovereign was deposited by the sitting Member, with a clergyman who was opposed to him, for the relief of a voter whom the sitting Member had asked for his vote. Mr. Justice Willes said the question was whether the depositing of the sovereign was a corrupt act or an act of humanity, and he held that it was not, under the circumstances, an act of bribery. I may also refer to the Carlisle case already mentioned, in which the agent for the sitting Member, on the day of the election gave a pound to a voter named Macpherson who had asked for his travelling expenses; which only amounted to a few shillings; but the agent said that he gave it more out of charity than anything else, the voter having stated that he was a struggling man. The counsel for the sitting Member insisted that the payment had been made bonâ fide, and did not amount to bribery, and so the committee decided. Upon these grounds I have no doubt that neither of these charges of bribery against Mr. Dalway has been sustained.

There remain still to be considered the other alleged cases of treating. The observations which I have made as to the drinking at Gray's house are applicable to most of them, with the additional fact that in most of them the agency of those connected with the giving of drink has not been proved. With respect to the drinking at Parkhill's, he was certainly a member of the committee, and an active supporter of Mr. Dalway, but he says that he got no orders to supply drink for the purposes of the election; that to his knowledge none was supplied; and that as far as he could say, no drink was supplied on the day of the polling that was not paid for, except that some neighbours of his might have got drink on credit at his house as they had previously done. He said he was out during the day, and that his wife and his daughters were in the shop, but they might have been called by the Petitioner, and there was no case made that rendered it incumbent upon the Respondent to call them.

Parkhill also satisfactorily explained the transaction about his wife having given drink in his house to Lough, his wife and daughter, who complained of cold.

With respect to James Anderson, it appears that he drank himself on the polling day, but paid for what he drank; that he treated a great many (12 or 15 persons) to drink that day; that he paid money himself that day, but he could not say how much. It certainly did not appear that he paid for the drink he gave others, but there was nothing to warrant me in holding that such drink was given for a corrupt purpose, or coming within the 4th section. As regards the quantity of drinking in the town generally on the polling day, it did not appear that it was to any considerable extent until the latter part of the day, when the election was virtually decided. It is a matter to be regretted that such habits of drinking should prevail, but we all know, as matter of every-day experience, that when people are brought together in a town on any occasion at fairs, markets, funerals, processions, or elections, this unfortunate habit of people treating each other, prevails to a very considerable extent. And as to the general state of the town on that day, Mr. Cornwall said, that in the crowd he saw about the polling booths, in the early part of the day, he did not see any one drunk; and Mr. Irwen, the residential magistrate, said he did not see very much drunkenness the whole day. There was nothing, therefore, in the general state of the town; no open public-houses into which people might go, that would warrant the conclusion which has been arrived at in other cases, that there was any general treating going on for a corrupt purpose.

The next case to which I shall refer is that of Miss Kirk's tenants. She was not in any way the agent of Mr. Dalway. She was his cousin and his friend. She did what may or may not be wrong under the 23rd section, but what I think is fully accounted for without imputing any corrupt motive. She got provisions for her own tenants who voted. And it appears that every one of them when canvassed for Mr. Dalway some time previous to the election had said they would support him. It is not surprising that Miss Kirk, being his cousin, and very anxious for his success, should have acted as she did; and Mr. Dalway swore he had nothing to do with it.

Then, with regard to the drinking at Pinkerton's. There was certainly a great deal of it there that day; but where is the evidence to show that this was treating under the Act? Repeated efforts were made on the examination of several witnesses by Petitioner's counsel, to ascertain who slept at Pinkerton's house the night before, who was there in the morning, and how many glasses of whisky were drunk. Wortley's evidence was much commented on. He was a cousin of Pinkerton's, and the owner of a fishing smack, and had, previously, dealings and accounts with Pinkerton from time to time for fish. He was examined at great length, and I never saw a witness in his class of life as to whose veracity less doubt could be entertained. He gave his evidence most frankly; stated that he was much interested in the success of Mr. Dalway, and that he brought his own boat's crew and the crews of other boats into Pinkerton's and gave them drink, for which he states he afterwards paid or settled with Pinkerton. But is there any evidence to connect Mr. Dalway or his agents with the giving of this drink, or to show that it was given corruptly within the meaning of the 4th section.

I have next to consider the charge as to the drinking at Belmont on the evening of the polling day; a proceeding that should have been avoided. A candidate, whether returned or not, should not have had any manifestation of this sort accompanied by drinking. But before I do so, I shall refer to what transpired during the trial about the entries in Hamilton's booth relating to the entertainment of Miss Kirk's tenants, which I omitted to notice before. The tearing out of the leaves containing those entries was a most improper act. Why it was done I am at a loss to understand, because, although Hamilton's son tore the leaves out, he kept them and produced them here, and they bear out what was said, that the whole of the entertainment for which the 5 l. 4 s. was paid by Miss Kirk to Hamilton, was in fact supplied. I am called upon to infer that because some other voters besides Miss Kirk's tenants partook of the entertainment, she was thereby guilty of bribery or treating, but that fact is explained by the statement of her steward Brown, that he got Miss Kirk's permission to bring some of his own friends to partake of the refreshments; that he did so, accordingly, and that, as far as his knowledge went, no one else got the refreshments. Besides, as I have already stated, Mr. Dalway is not in any way connected with this transaction.

With respect to the drink given on the evening of the holiday at Belmont, the evidence is this. The election was virtually over in the early part of the day, but Mr. Dalway did not leave the town until the poll was closed. He left the town about half-past six, and, as may be supposed, the announcement had previously spread that he was virtually the sitting Member. He says that at a place called Eden, he met (without expecting them) a band and a crowd of people awaiting him there, who had come from a different direction, from the county Antrim (which is immediately adjoining his house at Belmont), in order, of course, to congratulate him, and that they accompanied him from Eden to his house; that before his arrival at Eden, Mrs. Dalway had sent down to a publican in Eden to order whisky, and that whisky was brought to Belmont and distributed to a certain extent among the people, and that a considerable quantity of it was consumed. But with respect to voters, Mr. Dalway states that he did not know that a single voter was there. It turned out upon the evidence that two voters, namely, Douglass and Wortley, were there. It is probable that some others were also there, but Mr. Dalway states he did not know of it. Can it then be said upon these facts that this drink was given corruptly within the meaning of the 4th section, though it was an act which should not have been done, and which (though not vitiating the election) may affect the parties seriously in other respects, as I shall presently observe.

I have now to refer to what took place at Bella Hill, the residence of Mr. Dalway's father, who gave an entertainment there, on the following night after the declaration of the poll. It was an indiscreet proceeding on the part of Mr. Dalway's father, to have it so soon after the election, but the evidence does not show that it was done with any motive except that of testifying his natural delight at his son's return, and testifying it in the manner in which, unfortunately, it is too much the habit of people in this country to show their satisfaction, namely, by distributing drink to a considerable extent; and I see nothing in this transaction that could be relied on as vitiating the election.

I think I have now mentioned all the objections relied on by Petitioner's counsel. If I have omitted any of them in my judgment, I have carefully considered them during the trial, and I have also stated the several reasons which have induced me, notwithstanding those objections, to come to the following conclusion, namely, that Mr. Dalway has been duly elected, and that, in accordance with the Act of Parliament, I should report to the Speaker to the following effect :

First. That the sitting Member, Marriott R. Dalway, Esq., whose return has been complained of by the petition in this matter, was duly elected and returned to serve in Parliament for the borough of Carrickfergus.

Secondly. That no corrupt practices have been proved to have been committed by, or with the consent or knowledge of any candidate at such election.

And thirdly. That, on the evidence before me, it does not appear that corrupt practices have been resorted to at that election, and that there is in such evidence no reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the election.

It now remains for me to dispose of the last, and not unimportant, matter, namely, the costs of these proceedings. The 41st section of "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868," provides that "all costs, charges, and expenses of and incidental to the presentation of a petition under this Act, and to the proceedings consequent thereon, with the exception of such costs, charges, and expenses, as are by this Act otherwise provided for, shall be defrayed by the parties to the petition, in such manner and in such proportions as the court or judge may determine, regard being had to the disallowance of any costs, charges, or expenses, which may, in the opinion of the court or judge, have been caused by vexatious conduct, unfounded allegations, or unfounded objections, on the part either of the petitioner or the respondent, and regard being had to the discouragement of any needless expense by throwing the burden of defraying the same on the parties by whom it has been caused, whether such parties are or are not on the whole successful." As a general rule, the object of this Act was to assimilate, to a certain extent, the practice as to costs, with the rule of law that costs should follow the result. But a discretion is left to the judge, and it is perfectly clear that, under the Act, such general rule might be displaced by special circumstances. Mr. Law relied, very properly, on the unfounded allegations of bribery made in the petition; and if it was not for other circumstances in the case, these allegations, unsustained by evidence and inconsiderately made, would be ground for adhering to such a general rule. In my opinion, however, there are circumstances in this case which exempt it from the operation of that general rule. The giving of the drink on the polling day at Gray's house, though, as I have already stated, it was not done corruptly, and was not a ground, under Section 4, for avoiding the election, was still a proceeding much to be reprehended, and was clearly illegal under the 23rd section of the Act. This transaction, and some of the others to which I have referred, with respect to drinking, were of a character calculated to excite suspicion of undue practices, and not unreasonably calculated to invite inquiry. It is true that the giving of drink in the committee room was the act of Mr. Gray himself, and was not done with Mr. Dalway's concurrence, and that the only knowledge brought home to Mr. Dalway of any such thing having been done was a circumstance that might have struck him, and did strike me, as immaterial, namely, that he saw some whiskey in two bottles in the room. But it must be recollected that, under the election law of Parliament, a candidate, however morally innocent of any charge, is legally answerable for the practices of his agents; and though the case, either as to Mr. Gray or Mr. Dalway, does not come within Section 4, yet I cannot but hold that, so far as regards the costs of this petition, Mr. Dalway is responsible for the drink having been given.
by

It is a matter to be deplored that habits of drink should prevail upon the occasion of elections. They prevail, unfortunately, upon many occasions, but the indulgence in them is far more dangerous at an election, when hostile and antagonistic political feelings are excited, and people naturally feel more interest than ordinarily in the result. In the present case it certainly does not appear that the assaults on Mr. Wilson and Mr. Cornwall arose from drink, or that the drinking on the polling day was otherwise productive of any injurious consequences so far as outrages were concerned. But when drink is once given, those who give or sanction it cannot know or form an opinion of the consequences to which it may lead. I think it should be discouraged, and that not only candidates, but their over-zealous friends and partizans should be apprised of the risks they run, and of the consequences to which they expose the candidate by such a practice, and that it might be attended with positive loss to him. Upon these grounds I think I should, in this case, do what I clearly have authority to do under the Act of Parliament, namely, refuse to give the respondents the costs of these proceedings. A similar decision has, I see, been recently made by Mr. Justice Willes in the case of the Guildford petition, in which, because he considered there were reasonable grounds for inquiry, and for presenting the petition, he would not award any costs to the respondent, though he declared his election valid. I shall, therefore, make the order that each party should abide his own costs of these several proceedings.

Mr. Law.] I do not know whether it will be necessary; but Mr. Gray's evidence as regards treating, and Mr. Dalway's evidence, might be made the ground of some vexatious proceedings, and I will ask your lordship for a certificate for those witnesses.

Mr. Justice O'Brien.] I will give you the certificates now if the forms are in court.

Mr. Law.] I believe those are the only two, my Lord. Perhaps your Lordship, if we think of any more, will grant them.

Mr. Justice O'Brien.] If you want any others I will consider the matter, but I will give you those two now.

Mr. Faulkner.] With reference to what Mr. Law said just now, I would say, on Mr. Torrens' behalf, that there is not the slightest idea on our part of putting those matters forward.

Mr. Law.] I am sure on your part there is not.

Mr. Justice O'Brien.] With respect to Gray I will say, in giving his certificate, that he appeared to me to have answered every question fairly, and I think the Counsel for the petitioner will concur in that view.

Mr. Faulkner.] Of course, my Lord.

Mr. Law.] I am not all apprehensive, on the part of Mr. Torrens or his advisers, but we do not know what any evil-conditioned persons might do when the case is not in their hands.

Mr. Justice O'Brien.] Mr. Law, if you take those two forms and give them to your conducting agent, and he brings them to my lodgings, I will sign them for Mr. Dalway and Mr. Gray. Now, gentlemen, the proceedings have terminated, and I hope the people of the town will preserve the same good order which they have, with one or two trifling exceptions, preserved in court during the whole of these proceedings.

CASHEL ELECTION.

Cashel.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Baron Fitzgerald, 20 February 1869.

Mr. Baron Fitzgerald.] Two petitions are before me in this case, in which the same gentleman, Mr. Henry Munster, is petitioner; and the same gentleman, Mr. James Lyster O'Beirne, is respondent. Each of these gentlemen were candidates at the last election for this borough. The respondent, Mr. O'Beirne, was returned as the duly elected Member; the numbers upon the poll appearing to be, for Mr. O'Beirne, 100; and for Mr. Munster, 84. One of the petitions prays that the election may be declared void on the grounds of bribery, treating, and undue influence on the part of the respondent. The other petition claims the seat for the petitioner, alleging a majority on his behalf by reason of a disqualification of votes, through the same corrupt practices. In the case of the latter petition, a scrutiny has been so far proceeded with as to show in my mind sufficiently that the petitioner has failed in proving that he had a majority of legal votes; and I think that that was conceded by the counsel for the petitioner.

With respect to the petition which seeks to avoid the election of the respondent, it must be confessed that Mr. O'Beirne is before the Court under very singular disadvantages; but unfortunately they are of his own choosing; though he so far complied with the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act of 1863, as to declare to the person, who is the proper officer for the borough, upon the nomination day, the name and address of an agent for election expenses on his behalf, namely, Mr. Patrick Connor; that appointment appears to have been a purely nominal one. According to that gentleman's own recollection he never knew of his own appointment until after the election; and such was also, at first, the recollection of Mr. Grace, the conducting agent and solicitor of Mr. O'Beirne, though in the course of the trial an accidental circumstance brought to his memory the fact that on one occasion during the election the subject of Connor's appointment was mentioned between them. Connor, however, has in fact performed no duty, unless the payment of two clerks since the election, by direction of Mr. Grace, can be considered as such. He knows nothing of the expenditure by or for Mr. O'Beirne on account of or in respect of the election; and Mr. Grace, the conducting agent for Mr. O'Beirne, is almost in the same situation.

Though the period for furnishing a detailed statement and vouchers of the election expenses under the statute has long since passed, no detailed statement has been presented to the returning officer.

From the evidence before me, it appears that all such payments as have been made on account of or in respect of the election have been made by cheques drawn by Mr. O'Beirne himself upon the National Bank in Cashel. From the bank books it appears that a sum not much exceeding 800 l. was at various times, in the interval between the 12th of October 1868 and the 9th of December, brought to his credit; on which 37 cheques were drawn up to the 26th of November; overdrawing the account then standing to his credit by 83 l., which was made good by a subsequent lodgment to that amount. The nomination day for the election was Wednesday the 18th day of November last; and the polling took place on Friday the 20th.

Under these circumstances it might, I think, at least have been expected that, considering the grave charges in the petition brought against him, Mr. O'Beirne would have placed himself in the position of being able himself to account for the sums expended and paid upon his own cheques; but although the cheques appear to have been given up to him on the closing of his account with the bank in December 1868, neither he nor any of the witnesses, produced by him, have been able to do so. A large number of the ordinary and known expenses of the election appear to be unpaid. With the exception of some few, he is wholly unable to state the purposes for, or the persons in whose favour the cheques were drawn. The bank books only show the numbers of the cheques and their respective amounts. Mr. O'Beirne was apprised on the first day of this trial, Monday, of the necessity for the production of these cheques; he was then served with a subpœna duces tecum to produce them; and on my attention being directed to the fact, I directed his attention to the necessity that there was for their production; they were then stated to be in the possession or procurement of some confidential person in his employment in London, and no doubt was expressed that they would be easily forthcoming before the trial terminated. One would have thought that the speediest mode of communication with London would have been adopted, and yet it was not until the afternoon of Thursday that an answer was received from the gentleman to whom he wrote, stating that he had received a copy of the subpœna duces tecum, and had looked in vain for the documents mentioned in it, and that he did not know where they were, but suggesting that they might be in a drawer, of which Mr. O'Beirne had the key. There is a difficulty, as I understand Mr. O'Beirne, in getting this key; and he does not, so far as I can see, entertain any confident expectation that the documents would be found in the drawer if it were obtained.

Of the sum of 800 l. to the credit of Mr. O'Beirne in the bank, the substance of the information which we have from Mr. O'Beirne is this: the money expended in any way on on the election did not much exceed 500*l.*, and of this nearly 400*l.* was spent in what is properly called the hiring of mobs, or employing persons during the canvass for the election in what is termed "protecting" the candidates and their friends from, or resisting, adverse mobs. The expenditure of this 400*l.* was principally entrusted to three persons, named Canavan, Meenahan, and Keeffe, who were employed by Mr. O'Beirne for this purpose. He says that accounts, or something in the nature of accounts, were furnished to him by these men, but these are not forthcoming; he calculates that from 60*l.* to 70*l.* in all, was given to Canavan; from 30*l.* to 40*l.* to Meenahan; and from 150*l.* to 180*l.* to Keeffe: making a total, taking a mean, of 265*l.* entrusted for expenditure to these men. Not one of these men has been produced as a witness, though the name of Keeffe frequently occurs in the evidence as ordering a considerable amount of liquor from the publicans through the town. The only two other persons (I except, of course, the conducting agent, and the agent for election expenses) whom Mr. O'Beirne recognises as in any way his agents, are John Hogan and Simon Tray. To each of these a cheque for 60*l.* was given as their hire as canvassing agents; but the cheques, when given, were post-dated, the dates being, if I rightly understand the evidence, the 28th of November. Mr. O'Beirne states that in each case the cheques were given with a direction that they should not be presented at the bank without his authority, with this difference, however, between them, that Hogan was to be at liberty to present his cheque after the 28th November, but Tray was not, under any circumstances, to present his cheque without his authority. The reason stated by Mr. O'Beirne for this direction was an apprehension of overdrawing his account. After the election, however, he wrote to Hogan directing him not to present the cheque, his credit having been then overdrawn, but promising payment of the amount otherwise when he returned. Tray's cheque has never been presented for payment.

Hogan has been called as a witness by the petitioner. He states that he was hired as a canvassing agent by Mr. O'Beirne, and received a cheque for 50*l.* for himself, and for his own services only, when hired. He says nothing of the post-dating of the cheque, but accounts for his not having presented it for payment before he received Mr. O'Beirne's letter, by his wish to spare that gentleman's credit.

He says there was some danger to be apprehended, and he, in fact, performed no services. He describes the letter received from Mr. O'Beirne as giving no reason for the directions not to present the cheque; and he represents himself as returning it in the consciousness that he had performed no services. And the reason that he gives for his not having rendered any services, I shall state in his own words. The way the question was asked him is: "Were you employed as a canvassing agent for Mr. O'Beirne, and did you not canvass?" He says,—“I saw the danger, being a little green upon it; when I saw the danger I did not put myself in danger.” “What was the danger in canvassing?”—“I saw I might get into a scrape.” “By bribery?”—“Yes.” “It was because you would not get into a scrape by bribery that you would not act as canvassing agent for Mr. O'Beirne?”—“Yes.” “Did you think you were employed to bribe?”—“I was not told so.” “Did you understand that you were employed to bribe?”—“No.” “Why were you afraid to canvass; tell me?” Then the witness says: “I will ask your lordship for protection.” I desired him to answer the question. “Why were you afraid to canvass?”—“Because I thought it would be dangerous to bribe, and consequently I did not do so.” “On your oath, did you not know that the 60*l.* was given to you to bribe?” The answer is,—“No.” “What did Mr. O'Beirne say when he gave it to you?”—“Nothing. He said nothing at all.” “He did not tell you it was to pay you?”—“He told me it was for my own private use.” “He said, this is for yourself?”—“Yes.” “And you never used the cheque?”—“I never presented it.” “And never did anything for it?”—“No.” So he repeats, over and over again, that the money was given to him for his own services; that no instructions were given to him to bribe, and nothing said to him; and that for some reason or other he did not canvass; that is the ground on which he puts his omission to canvass.

Now he is the only one of those who were admitted agents in any way, who knew anything whatever of the expenditure, or who had money in their hands, who is before the court at all; because the only other acknowledged agent left Cashel after being served with a subpoena in this case by the petitioner. He is a dealer, it appears, in old clothes; and his wife, who has been called, states that she believes he went to London. He returned to his house however some fortnight or three weeks ago, and after remaining a night or two, again went away. She saw him some days ago in the streets of Cashel, and spoke to him, she says, for a few minutes, but never asked him where he had been nor where he was going to. She says she has not seen him since, and is wholly ignorant where he is gone to, or where he is.

A piece of evidence seriously implicating this man, Tracy, if true, has been given in the case. A woman, named Rochford, the wife of John Rochford, an elector of the borough, states that on a night in the election week, she being a dealer in feathers, went to Tracy's shop for the purpose of buying tick to put them in; and that she was taken inside, into a room by Tracy's wife, who told her that Tracy had been entrusted with money by Mr. O'Beirne, and she showed Mrs. Rochford some cheques, the number of which she cannot tell, but she believes there were 10 or 12. She says she was shown particularly one cheque for 50*l.*, Mrs. Tracy saying that it was for two friends of hers; and that there was a promise made to give her a cheque for 30*l.*, if she would procure her husband to vote for Mr. O'Beirne. Mrs. Rochford said she would prefer money to a cheque; and she says that Mrs. Tracy then produced a bundle of bank notes. Mrs. Rochford professing some doubt as to whether her husband would vote against Mr. Munster, promised to try to persuade him. Upon her going home, Mrs. Tracy promised to send her husband after her, as soon as he should come home. On getting home, however, Mrs. Rochford found at her husband's house Simon Tracy and Mrs. O'Mara, with her husband. Tracy took her aside, and urged her to try to procure her husband's vote for Mr. O'Beirne. Tracy told her that as soon as she did so he would bring him, or have him sent for by Mr. O'Beirne. Tracy does not appear in this statement to have himself made any promise of money. The husband of Mrs. Rochford has been produced; he confirms his wife as to the fact of Simon Tracy and O'Mara being at his house. He also deposes to his wife having been taken aside by Tracy; but he does not appear to have been promised any money by Tracy himself.

Now, supposing the story told by Mrs. Rochford to be true, I have no doubt that, under the circumstances, no jury would hesitate to find the act of the wife to have been by the procurement of her husband; if so, I confess I see no way in which Mr. O'Beirne could escape the consequences of an act of bribery by his agent. It is said by Mr. Hemphill that it would make a difference that the wife was the agent of Tracy; I cannot, I confess, see that. In doing that which is the act of an agent, the agent may use the instrumentality of another; otherwise there would be no use in establishing any law of evidence on that point at all, for the effect on the principal through the agent would be done away with altogether. No doubt, there are to be considered improbabilities in the story itself. It is to be considered that Mrs. Rochford has, to a certain extent, discredited herself by the readiness with which, according to her own account of the conversation, she seemed to avail herself of the promised money. She is positively contradicted in all the material points by Mrs. Tracy. Further, she is contradicted in some other respects, though not immediately relating to this transaction, by Mrs. Hackett. Now, doubtless, the story at first sight seems improbable; but supposing Tracy to be entrusted with money for an improper purpose, in the capacity of a canvassing agent, unless bribery by an agent in a proceeding of this kind is to be considered an improbable matter, how can I deal with that as an improbable thing? Then the ways in which a man in Tracy's position would use the money so displayed are not easy to be explained or interpreted. The display of money in this way seems at least to have been well calculated to produce an effect on such a mind as that of Mrs. Rochford. She is contradicted, it is true, by Mrs. Tracy; but Mrs. Tracy stands, herself, under strong suspicion as a credible witness. She is deeply interested in denying the truth of the story; and while she admits the fact of the interview, the account she gives of what took place is a mere turning of the tables upon Mrs. Rochford, representing her as seeking a bribe, and her husband as having been bribed, or used by Mr. Munster to get a bribe from Mr. O'Beirne. Mrs. Hackett stands discredited similarly with Mrs. Rochford, as a person making a demand for money through a supposed influence on votes. I do not find myself able to say that she is more to be believed than Mrs. Rochford. The story may be exaggerated, it may be in some respects coloured, but that cheques and money were proposed that night, for the purpose of inducing her to obtain her husband's vote, I am not able to disbelieve. The effect of that would be, at least, to affect Mr. O'Beirne with bribery through his agent.

Now there are two cases of old debts, or sums claimed as such, as due of Mr. O'Beirne, or his agents, from the former election of 1865, which have been proved before me. The payment of these sums on the eve of the election is admitted. The sums so paid are sums which Mr. O'Beirne is able to identify with cheques; at all events one of them is; and I think he himself proved the payment of two other demands of the same nature, one of them being paid to a person who was not an elector. Claims in reference to a former election, made at such a period, naturally suggest what is passing in the mind of the person who made them. One of those proved is that of Timothy Hogan for 20*l.*; and the other that of Mr. Hanly who made his claim through the conducting agent and solicitor of Mr. O'Beirne for the election; and who did it, as he himself states, for that very reason. How am I to deal with four demands of this kind, made in that way, with that plain feeling upon the minds of the parties who made them, and satisfied; Mr. O'Beirne professing himself not to have any knowledge of his own of the nature of those demands at all, paid almost without inquiry, as far as appears.

The next class of cases demands still more particular consideration. They are cases of hiring apartments in the houses of voters, as committee or tally rooms. There are, as far as appears in evidence, four cases of this sort. I shall take them in the order in which they were presented to me on the trial. The first in relation to which evidence was given, was the case of Ryan and Murnane. Ryan and Murnane are brothers-in-law who have votes; and both resided in the same house. Murnane, according to Captain Graham's evidence, had given him an early promise to vote for Mr. O'Beirne. Murnane was also canvassed by Mr. O'Beirne himself, who came to Cashel about the 10th of October. He promised him his vote; and, according to Mr. O'Beirne's recollection, he promised also for his brother-in-law Ryan. However, it appears that in the week before the election, Ryan set a room, or rooms, in the same house to Mr. Munster, through a man named Cunningham, for 50*l.* The use, or alleged use, for which the rooms were taken by Mr. Munster was to hold meetings of electors, for which the rooms of Corcoran's Hotel were found insufficient or inconvenient. Ryan was paid the 50*l.*, and Cunningham took his receipt for it. A day or two after, according to Cunningham's evidence, he declined to give give the rooms for some reason or other, and Cunningham acquiesced, and the 50*l.* was returned, and the receipt delivered up to Ryan. Cunningham says that at the time Ryan told him he would not give the rooms unless he was paid 10*l.* for the vote of Murnane. Some two or three days before the election he was brought by Captain Graham, and another person, to Mr. O'Beirne, according to his evidence. Mr. Hanly, an active supporter of Mr. O'Beirne, says that he, three weeks before the election, had, by Captain Graham's advice, gone to look for Ryan's rooms for the purpose of a committee, if any such should be formed; and that he was then told by Ryan that he had been offered 60*l.* on the part of Mr. Munster; but that he would give Mr. O'Beirne the preference. Mr. Hanly says that he exclaimed against that sum as enormous; and the matter then seems to have broken off. However, on the day, two or three days before the election, Ryan, with another person, whose advice in this matter took place antecedently, went to Mr. O'Beirne. There Mr. O'Beirne agreed to give 60*l.* for the apartments, and Ryan was paid on the spot. Mr. O'Beirne says that he came in, about an hour after, making a further demand; but that he told him that if he was not satisfied he was at liberty to give back the money, and take his departure. The house was, in fact, made no use of by Mr. O'Beirne, but Ryan and Murnane both voted for him. The use for which it is said the house was taken was for collecting the voters of the commons of Cashel, which are at some distance from the town, the night before the polling day, according to what is said to be the usual custom. The apartments were not used; and that was accounted for by the statement that they were rendered unnecessary by the accident of a dinner having taken place on that night in Dwyer's Hotel, at which the commoners attended.

The second case is that of Patrick Mackey. He is a voter; and, according to his evidence, he was, in the latter end of September, applied to by some person in the interest of Mr. Munster to let an apartment in his house. His answer, he says, was, that he would not let it for a small sum, and that he finally demanded 50*l.* He says that though, in fact, he offered to take 50*l.*, he would not have taken any sum on that side, having made up his mind to vote for Mr. O'Beirne; though he admits that when he was first canvassed by Mr. O'Beirne, he told him that his mind was not made up; that he would wait till he saw how the majority would go, and that he would go with them. There are two things very remarkable in this, namely, that he says he would not give the apartments, because he had not made up his mind how he would vote; and that he represents himself as saying that to Mr. O'Beirne when asked for his vote. After that, he says that Captain Graham came and applied to him to set his apartments for 40*l.* to him, for his own use, and that he agreed to do so. He says that Captain Graham failed to take possession of them. Captain Graham's account is that Mackey asked 40*l.*, which he thought too large a sum; and that afterwards, finding cheaper lodgings that suited him, he did not deal further with Mackey. The week after this, which would be, according to the evidence, about three weeks before the election, he was sent for by Mr. O'Beirne, and, according to his evidence, agreed to give the apartments without any price being named. According to Mr. O'Beirne's evidence, he asked 40*l.* for the premises, which he, after some hesitation, agreed to give. Mackey, he says, had promised to vote for him about three weeks before; and he did vote for him. No use was made of these rooms whatever.

The next case is that of Thomas Murphy. He is a voter. According to his evidence, he was applied to by persons interested for Mr. Munster to set rooms to them. He says, he came to no understanding with them, but said he would consider of it. He then, he says, went to Mr. O'Beirne, and told him that persons in Mr. Munster's interest were wanting to take the rooms. He forgets, he says, whether or not Mr. O'Beirne said, in reply, to set them to him, Mr. O'Beirne; but he did say that the house was too good for him to have anything to do with the other side. Then he says that he himself offered to set the apartments to Mr. O'Beirne, and that Mr. O'Beirne agreed to give 25*l.* for them, saying that he might or might not want the rooms. He says that at that time he had made up his mind to vote for Mr. O'Beirne. The rooms were not used. He voted for Mr. O'Beirne. He, it appears, has not yet been paid. The taking, he says, was on the nomination day. And in this he substantially agrees with Mr. O'Beirne, who, however, seems to be under the impression that the rooms were let as a substitute for Coffey's, which is the next case.

Michael Coffey, whose case is the fourth, when Mr. Munster first came to Cashel (which, I believe, was the middle of October), was canvassed by him, as he says, and promised him his vote. The promise, he says, however, was only given to get rid of him. After that, he says, he at different times promised his vote to Mr. O'Beirne. Within a week of the election, he says, Mr. O'Beirne came to him to take rooms in his house, and he agreed to give them; no price being agreed on. On the day before the polling, which would be the 19th November, he, by writing, agreed to let rooms in the same house to Mr. Pat Laffan, the brother of Michael Laffan, the conducting agent, for 25*l.* On the same day, he says, he was in treaty with these parties, by a Mr. Con. Hanley, whom he describes as a committee-man of Mr. O'Beirne, and who told him to get as much as he could out of him. On the night of that day he received a letter from Mr. O'Beirne, telling him to call up to be settled with. And on the next morning (which would be, as I understand, the day of the polling) he was paid 20*l.* by a cheque, which was handed to him in an envelope by Mr. O'Beirne. No use was made of these rooms, and he voted for Mr. O'Beirne.

Cashel.

Now, these are the four cases, and each of them has this in common, that no use was made of the rooms upon one account or another——

Mr. Hemphill.] Except one.

Mr. Baron Fitzgerald.] Except one; if you think that is material. When I say "no use," I mean no substantial use. No substantial use was made of any one of them; extravagant prices were paid for them all. In every one of the cases there was, according to the evidence, a cross-dealing between the parties, leading plainly to the inference that it was an understood thing that the letting of the house, and the promise given to vote, were conditions of the agreement; that the one meant nothing, unless the other condition was fulfilled by the taking of the house and the giving of some other benefit. In all the cases the plain understanding in the mind of the voter was, that the letting of the house, and the giving of the vote meant one and the same thing. So that I find it impossible, as a man of common sense, dealing with persons under these circumstances, paying extravagant prices, and making, in point of fact, no substantial use of the apartments in any one of the four instances—I find it impossible to deal with them in any other way than by coming to the conclusion that the apartments were taken for the purpose of influencing the votes. I find it impossible to come to any other conclusion, when I take each and every one of the cases together, the absence of evidence as to the expenditure, the absence of the only witness who could prove the expenditure, except Hogan, who gave the strong evidence to which I have called attention. Putting all of these cases together, and reading the one by the light of the other (and to these I might add the case of the hiring of voters, which might be a comparatively slight thing in itself, though a very dangerous practice), taking each and all of them together, I am unable to come to any other conclusion than that there were promises given for the purpose of influencing votes. In this case, I find myself bound to come to that conclusion, for I am bound to do my duty, sitting here, to the best of my ability.

There is another case, which I should hardly dwell upon but that the character of another person is also involved in it, and that is the case of bribery of two persons; of Mr. Close, through employment given to his son by Captain Graham, as the agent of the sitting Member. The account which Mr. Close gives of the matter is in substance this: he says, that having been met by Mr. O'Beirne in the street, about the time of the election, and in a friendly manner saluted by him; and Mr. O'Beirne having complained of his having not called on him, he did call on him at Dunn's hotel, where Mr. O'Beirne was staying. He says that Captain Graham, with one or two others, were in the room with Mr. O'Beirne. He says that after some short conversation he left the room, and that Captain Graham followed him out; that he told him he would be anxious to recommend his son for employment by Mr. O'Beirne; but he added that he would of course only deal with his son, and not with himself. Then he says that Captain Graham wrote on a piece of paper the words, "Twenty pounds," and asked him was that enough. He says that he laughed. That is confirmed, so far, by his son, who states that he saw the paper, and that he heard words tantamount to those to which Mr. Close, the father, has deposed. The son further says that he was met on a subsequent occasion, and that Captain Graham then asked him whether he had made up his mind to take employment, and that it was a matter that must be between him and his father; that though it was for service, that service would not be required, and that he knew very well what was meant; and the answer he gave was, that he had not made up his mind. That is the substance of the account given by these two men. Captain Graham's account is, that it is true that the elder Close, accompanied by his son, did come to Dunn's hotel, where these parties were; that it is true that after some conversation, in which votes were not mentioned, Close, the father, left the room; that he followed him out, and that he did suggest, and the account which he gives of that suggestion is that he had been on friendly terms with him; that he was interested in him; that he knew he was not in very flourishing circumstances, and that that being so, and being himself a friend of Mr. O'Beirne, and knowing his services would be required at the election, he did promise him, as a friend, to use his influence with Mr. O'Beirne to give his son employment. He says he did not do that in reference to his vote, because he entertained no doubt that Mr. Close would have voted for Mr. O'Beirne. He says that he did in the course of that conversation, upon Mr. Close mentioning to him the probability of his son not being in the way in order to be employed, suggest to him that it would be a good thing for him to have 20*l.* or 25*l.* That, he says, was the whole of it; and though it is true that he did subsequently meet the son, all, he says, that passed between them on the occasion was that he asked him whether he would take employment, and that the son refused. Positively, he denies the writing on the paper; positively, he denies asking whether that would be enough; and, positively, he denies having ever said to the son that the business should be between him and his father.

I have to judge which of these two stories I am to believe. I cannot pay regard to the mere fact that Captain Graham is a person in a higher rank of life; that he is a person in much more affluent circumstances than others of those who have been examined. To this extent I may pay attention to it, that no doubt, from a person in such circumstances, from a person in such a position, I may expect a higher and a greater regard to the principles of honour and veracity than might be looked for from persons not accustomed to depend so much upon honour and character in society. I must weigh, however, as I would in the case of other men, the manner and demeanour of the persons upon the table and the whole circumstances of the case. Now, it is perfectly true, as Mr. Butt says, that the interest of Captain Graham in denying this charge of plain and obvious bribery is very great; that, no doubt, is a temptation. Upon the other hand, I am bound to say, as to the manner and demeanour of Captain Graham upon the table, that nothing could have more impressed me, standing by itself, with a feeling that he was speaking the truth than that manner and that demeanour. Well, then I am to consider the case with reference to the Closes. Now, there is no doubt that in the story, as Captain Graham himself tells it, in the suggestion of the 25*l.*, in the following him out of the room, leaving Mr. O'Beirne apparently speaking to them by themselves, there were circumstances to suggest the notion of a secret offer of 25*l.* for the purchase of the vote; and I have then (which is of importance to be considered in every way) the materials of a story which, being in itself suspicious, is liable to be made still more so by the facts being coloured, turned, or exaggerated. Though that be so, there are in this, as in every other case, matters most difficult to be explained; while, as regards the colouring and exaggeration of the case, there certainly is ground, upon the evidence, to believe that Mr. Close is strongly interested, and naturally so, on behalf of Mr. Munster. Mr. Munster, it appears, at a very early period of the election, took, for a concert given by the Closes, a large number of tickets; while Captain Graham, on the other hand, refused to do so. It appears, also, that Mr. Munster acted very liberally indeed to this son of Mr. Close's, and supported him for several months; and therefore he has a strong interest in Mr. Munster's favour. While I acknowledge that the case is not without difficulty as to the question between the two, I hold myself bound to believe the story of Captain Graham. There might be a question as to whether in itself the story, as told by Captain Graham, would not be evidence of corrupt practices. I am not satisfied, however, that, adopting Captain Graham's account of it, I could so regard it.

Then, as to the next case, all I would say is, that the only part of it that ever impressed me was that dinner, on the 19th of November, at Miss Kate O'Dwyer's; but, notwithstanding the injudicious mode in which Mr. Butt, in his most able argument of last night, pressed that case, I am unable to resist the conclusion, from the evidence of Miss Kate O'Dwyer, who appears to me to be without any temptation to misrepresent the facts, that this was really a bonâ fide dinner for Mr. O'Beirne, and set on foot for Mr. O'Beirne by his supporters and electors; and the circumstance of its taking place upon the day before the day of polling was a purely accidental circumstance, as she herself proved, another day having been suggested by the parties who intended to give the entertainment, and she herself being the person who named this particular day for it. And, though it be true, I cannot regard it as an unnatural thing. If there be anything in what is said as to the usual practice of trying to keep voters together on the night before the nomination, Mr. O'Beirne not unnaturally availed himself of the opportunity of advising those parties to be kept together. I cannot say that the evidence proves that there was anything whatsoever in the allegation of confinement, or that any man who wished might not, if he pleased, have left upon that night; and, therefore, I find it totally impossible to deal with this as a case of corrupt treating.

The other treating proved in the case, I believe, to be of a class which is much and deeply to be regretted; but I find no ground for dealing with it as corrupt treating within the 4th section of the Act of Parliament. I have already alluded to the cases of employing the sons of voters, which appears to have been done in a very considerable number of cases. Standing by itself, however, I should find it difficult to deal with this, without accompanying circumstances, as a case of bribery. I rather look upon it as, coupled with the whole of the transactions, throwing a light upon them which leads to the conclusion that I am sorry I am obliged to arrive at on the whole case. That conclusion is, that the election of Mr. O'Beirne must be declared void; and owing to the unfortunate position in which Mr. O'Beirne has placed himself, of taking the entire expenditure upon himself, and the entire management of it upon himself, and so leaving himself without the means of proving the nature and extent of that expenditure, I am not relieved from the painful necessity of reporting to the House of Commons that the expenditure, for purposes of bribery, was with the knowledge and consent of Mr. O'Beirne.

I shall not take much time with the recriminatory case set forth in the second petition; the charges contained in it are the same, namely, bribery, treating, and undue influence. The case principally affecting Mr. Munster, in this petition, is that of Mrs. Hackett. It is a case very extraordinary indeed in itself; it appears that Mrs. Hackett is the daughter, the wife, and the sister of voters; she appears to have made an application to Mr. Munster, by letter, for relief, desiring that it might be concealed from her husband, but apprising Mr. Munster, at the same time, that those relatives of hers were all voters, and suggesting that she had influence over them, and would use it to induce them to vote for him; she wrote that letter to Mr. Munster, and she appears to have got access to him at his house, near Cashel, where he was living. Both she and Mr. Munster agree in this, that Mr. Munster upon receiving the letter expressed the greatest indignation at it, and declared that it was a most improper letter to write. In the room, however, was that young lady, Miss Ade, who, upon going out of the room was addressed by this Mrs. Hackett; she pressed her case upon the young lady, and according to the young lady's evidence she was impressed by it to that extent, that she felt a desire to relieve it herself; she did not, however, wish to do so without applying to Mr. Munster. Accordingly, she says that she did apply to him, but that he positively refused, and this Mrs. Hackett's evidence would bear out also) to allow any person in his household to be mixed up in the matter. Then it was suggested, according to Mrs. Hackett's evidence, by Mr. Richardson, who appears to have come over from England to this country as expense agent and solicitor for Mr. Munster, he being an old friend of Mr. Munster, residing in London, that Mademoiselle de Mont Cour might be induced, in a case of a charity like this, to advance the money. Mr. Munster, according to their evidence, was persuaded to allow that lady to be written to by the woman; he did, as he says, in a moment of weakness, assent to that. Accordingly, and I confess that this seems to me one of the parts of the case that requires explanation, if the story be true, the woman appears to have gone, as she says, by their direction, to Mr. Lafton, the election agent to Mr. Munster, who said that he would have the matter right for her. What he had to do with the transaction, supposing it to have been a case of mere charity, there is of course some difficulty in conceiving. It may have been, however, with a view to consult him as to whether in law they would be safe in acting at all in the matter, or something of that kind. However, she wrote a letter, omitting all reference to the votes, and sent it to Miss Ade, whom she supposed to be Mademoiselle De Mont Cour. However, she was given an envelope with a proper direction; and a letter in the same terms, omitting all reference to the votes, was sent to Mademoiselle De Mont Cour, and the result was that the cheque for 10*l.* was sent to her, and that cheque Miss Ade subsequently cashed herself, and she appears to have kept the cheque itself. That is the substance of the case. No doubt the facts are very suspicious, occurring at such a time and in such a manner. I have listened, however, with the greatest attention to the evidence. There is something no doubt extraordinary in every part of the evidence, as far as regards the ideas and mode of conduct of Mr. Munster; but, dealing with this case upon its own merits, I have been unable to bring myself to the conclusion that anything corrupt was intended.

With the other parts of this case, excepting the case of John Ryan, I feel little or no difficulty in dealing. As regards Ryan's case, in limine, even if it were true, there would be great difficulty in taking it as establishing a case against Mr. Munster, with reference to him. Ryan's account of the matter is that he called at the hotel also, upon a friend of Mr. Munster's, Mrs. Boyton, who appears to be now residing in the house of Mr. Munster in this town, and who had herself let to him the house in which he resides near Cashel. He says, that upon the occasion he was speaking to him about the price of some horse that he wished to sell to Pat Laffan for 70*l.*, and that when he was going away she took him aside (and he says he came over by their invitation at that time). She took him aside into a bedroom, and she told him that she had in a box which she produced the sum of 1,225*l.*, which would go upon the calculation of about 30*l.* for each of the votes of the commoners; and that it would be given to him, and that he would have his share of it, if, by dividing it amongst them, he could influence their votes. He says that he desired to have some further advice upon the matter, and he says that some person whom he said he would consult on the subject had said that it would be dangerous for a person in his position to have anything to do with such a matter. Accordingly, he says, that though subsequently pressed by Mrs. Boyton, he declined to have anything to do with the matter. Now, as to that story, the other part of it is denied by Mrs. Boyton; it is denied also by Mr. Boyton, who is represented as having been present at the greater part of the conversation; and having regard to the demeanour and manner of this man on the table, and his own readiness, even according to his own account of the matter, to have undertaken the task in the first instance, his only objection being the danger that might have thereby resulted to his tenure of office, and also to the fact of the offers which he made of a sale of a horse for 70*l.* I am unable to act on his evidence as against the evidence of the other two parties.

Now, with respect to the hiring of the house, this case appears to me to stand in identically the same position, if it be not even a stronger case in itself, than the cases against Mr. O'Beirne. It is identically of the same nature. There is this fortunate difference between them, that in this case it seems to have been wholly done by the agent, and that there was no present intervention of Mr. Munster. And on that ground I am obliged to hold that Mr. Munster has committed bribery by his agents, and especially by Mr. Patrick Laffan.

The costs will follow the event with respect to each of these petitions. That is, in the case in which the petitioner succeeds, the petitioner is to get the costs; where the petition fails, the opposite party gets the costs.

Mr. Hemphill, Q. C., stated that it would be necessary to have an indemnity from his Lordship for witnesses in certain cases.

Mr. Baron Fitzgerald.] I must report in each particular case the name of the briber. I must report Pat Laffan and Simon Tracey. I think Conyngham gave a substantially fair account of the transaction.

Mr. Carton.] I was about to apply for a certificate for him.

Mr. Baron Fitzgerald.] Give the names of the parties on behalf of whom you apply for certificates to the registrar.

Mr. Hemphill.] Your Lordship did not refer to the retainers.

Mr. Baron Fitzgerald.] I am very much obliged to you for reminding me of them; that was a part of the case which presented the greatest difficulty to my mind. Whatever Mr. Munster may have intended, even on his own view of it, the best that can be said of it it is, that it was an attempt to do wrong by way of getting at the right; but as it was carried out there could not have been a more mean and despicable attempt to entrap voters. My first impression, I acknowledge, was, that it was bribery, which would of course have been attended with some serious effects to Mr. Munster, whatever he may have intended; but, on consideration, I am inclined to think that the object before the mind of the party in order to his being bribed must be either the abstaining from voting or the giving of the vote; and though that was the thing in the mind of the person giving these considerations or retainers, that will not make it an inducement to the other party, unless the same thing was before the mind of that party also. I am not able, therefore, to say that the giving of those retainers was bribery.

Cashel.

HASTINGS ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Blackburn, 17 April 1869.

Hastings.

Mr. Justice Blackburn.] I THINK I need not take further time to consider in this case, but will proceed at once to express what is my opinion upon the facts and the law bearing upon it. There are two petitions here, one against Mr. North, and one against Mr. Brassey, the two Members; in fact the two petitions might have been one, for really all the evidence has borne upon both. Each of the Members against whom these petitions are presented has been returned by a majority of the electors, and in this particular case a large majority having voted for him. But, nevertheless, if that return was shown to have been obtained by corrupt practices of any kind, either by the Members themselves or by their agents, that return would be void, and there would require to be a fresh election.

The petition, in each case, charges that there have been corrupt practices by the sitting Members and their agents. I may first of all say, with respect to what may be called personal corruption by the sitting Members, that as far as regards Mr. North there never was any charge at all. There was one instance mentioned by Mr. Giffard in his opening speech, but, as far as I understood, before he had quite finished his speech he was corrected, and said that he had made a mistake. Certainly, as far as Mr. North is concerned, there never was any attempt to prove any case of personal corruption against him.

With regard to Mr. Brassey it was not quite the same, because, although there was no charge against him of doing anything individually, and with his own hand, there were charges made which were very proper indeed to be inquired into, of Mrs. Brassey having been guilty of corrupting under circumstances in which, if it had been proved that she was guilty of corruption, it would certainly have been very probable indeed that Mr. Brassey would have been personally knowing of and consenting to it. The consequence was that, as far as he was concerned, there was a charge against him personally to this extent, that what Mrs. Brassey did he must have known about; and as far as Mrs. Brassey was concerned, there could be no doubt that she was an agent of Mr. Brassey; and probably from the mode in which the election was conducted, and the manner in which that lady canvassed, she would have been an agent for Mr. North also (although it is not necessary to decide that) if it had been made out that she had been guilty of any corrupt practice herself in the course of the election. Now, as to that there was undoubtedly evidence on the part of the petitioners which required an answer, though part of it was scarcely more than requiring an answer. There is no doubt that Mrs. Brassey did canvass actively in this election. As the law stands at present women are not permitted to sit as Members of Parliament, or to vote, but there is no law whatever rendering it illegal for a lady to canvass or to take any part in an election, if she so pleases. I think myself, as a matter of my own taste, and my own private desire, I should say that ladies had better keep altogether out of what is at best rather indelicate and dirty work, especially, as whatever they are doing is liable to misconstruction, as apparently in this case there has been, in some instances, misconstruction. Mrs. Brassey, however, did engage in the election actively; she did canvass, and three individual and specific instances were brought forward, in which it was alleged that she had carried it so far as to commit bribery. In one instance, when one compares the evidence on both sides, there was no dispute whatever as to the facts; Mrs. Brassey did go, latish in the day, on the election day, when canvassing was no longer of any use, as there was already a very large majority for the sitting Members, to the fish market, and there did canvass one or two fishermen. A witness, who was called for the petitioners, hearing that she was there, ran with a very natural curiosity to see her, and he saw her go up to one of the fishermen and ask for his vote; that she agrees she did do; he says he saw her when she came up touch the fisherman's hand. Mrs. Brassey says she is under the impression that she did not touch anybody's hand, but that she might have done so; she may, for ought that she can say to the contrary, but she thinks not, have shaken hands with the voter. The probability is that she did shake hands, and from that the witness drew the rather hasty conclusion that when she touched the voter's hand it must necessarily have been to put some money into it; a conclusion which certainly I do not think it would have been legitimate for me to act upon, even if Mrs. Brassey had not been called and totally denied it. It was one of the instances, which I was pointing out, in which there is such liability to misconstruction in what is done as to make me think that ladies had better keep out of election matters altogether.

Then, in the same way there was another case where Mrs. Brassey had twice called upon a particular voter, who was out. The second time, according to the account of herself, and a gentleman who was with her, she left a card, which I dare say the voter would hardly understand when he saw it, and for the purpose of leaving the card a reticule was handed up to her, as she was standing at the top of the stairs, that she might get the card out of it. That is the account given by Mrs. Brassey. A witness, who was called by the petitioners, says that he saw her go up, and he drew the conclusion that she was leaving a parcel there; that was rather a hasty conclusion to draw. But if she left a parcel there, it necessarily must have contained certainly a bribe. Had there been a parcel left, I think I should probably have been driven to that conclusion. There, again, I do not see any reason to doubt that both parties are speaking the truth. The witness, who says he saw it, drawing the conclusion, which I dare say a man in his position would draw, that something more than a card was left.

Then there comes another case, where, undoubtedly, if the facts stated on behalf of the petitioners are true, there must have been an instance of bribery. I mean the case where Mrs. Brassey is asserted to have gone into Mrs. Standen's public-house, and there to have given Mrs. Standen three or four sovereigns, a couple of orders for coals and blankets, and things of that sort, and then come out. No doubt if that had been so, the conclusion must have been come to at once that it was done for a bribe. Upon that there were two men called, who swore positively to seeing Mrs. Brassey go into that place; and one of them to witnessing, through the window in the door, her giving the money, and being able to hear what took place at the time. On the other hand, Mrs. Standen swears that nothing of the sort ever took place; that nobody gave her money, or anything of the sort, and that it was all untrue; and Mrs. Brassey, who, of course, could not say what took place when she was not there, says she was never there at all. It is no business of mine, where there is a conflict of evidence of this kind, which may, for anything I know, come judicially before some other judge at some other time, to go further than my duty requires me. It is quite sufficient for this case to say, without meaning thereby to express more than just what I do say, that upon such testimony no person whatever, no jury, no judge, could find that bribery had actually taken place, or could act upon that evidence. It is not necessary to go any further, but it is sufficient to say that; nor did Mr. Giffard in any way desire or say that anyone should go any further than that.

The consequence is that, as far as regards these charges that were made of direct bribery by the hands of Mrs. Brassey, the case completely fails, and I must treat them as not existing at all.

One thing further was glanced at, which Mr. Giffard did not rely upon in his reply, namely, that it was shown that Mrs. and Mr. Brassey had bills with the tradesmen, and spent a very considerable sum of money in the town; and it was said, as part of the petitioners' case, that that expenditure had been increased, and was the more lavish, because the election was coming on; in short, that there was lavish household expenditure, with a view of influencing the election, with the same intention and in the same way as would, if it had been an expenditure of meat and drink to influence the election, have come within the definition of treating. But there is no law yet which says that any lavish expenditure in a neighbourhood, with a view of gaining influence in the neighbourhood and influencing an election, is illegal at all. In order to constitute anything which would be a corrupt practice in respect of expenditure of that sort, it must be made with a view of influencing a particular vote. If such an expenditure is made at a place with a tacit understanding of this kind, I will incur bills, and spend my money with you if you will vote for me, that being not the side on which you intended to vote, if it is intended to produce that effect upon the vote, it amounts to bribery. In the present case there is nothing to show that in either of the cases there was such an understanding, or such an arrangement made. In fact, the first tradesman who was called, whose bill was one of the largest, refused to vote at all, on what was very probably a very judicious opinion of his that he had better keep friends with both sides. The expenditure there, certainly had no influence upon him. I think in none of the other cases was there any attempt made to show that there was such an arrangement, or such a holding forth, that the custom was given for the purpose of procuring the vote of the man as would make it a case of bribery. Whether or not the expenditure was more lavish than it would otherwise have been is no matter for me to inquire into, because that would not affect the election if it was made out.

I now must pass from these, which I have mentioned first, and which really do not in any way, as the evidence has turned out, occasion any difficulty in deciding the case, and come to what are much more difficult questions to determine, to which Mr. Giffard has almost entirely confined his very able reply. Mr. Giffard himself has gone, and therefore I may speak more freely in saying that he urged upon me the points which had previously occurred to my own mind, and occasioned me most doubt. I must say that he produced some effect upon my mind by what he was saying, and made me hesitate a little with regard to the views which I took upon some of the points as to whether he had not shown that there was more force in the view that he took on his side than I had otherwise thought. But still I must state the conclusion I have come to, and the best opinion I can form upon what I find the facts to be. I think, as far as regards the law, every one would agree with all that Mr. Giffard stated as being the law. The inference of fact is that which occasions the difficulty.

Now, first of all I must take the cases of treating. What are the cases of treating? I will consider, first, the cases of treating and the registration taken together. There is no doubt, as the law now stands, the Corrupt Practices Act has made it perfectly clear that wherever any money or valuable consideration is given to influence a vote, that is bribery; and that if it be done by the candidate, or the candidate's agent, it would, when shown, avoid the election. It appears here (I do not think the facts are now in dispute at all in this matter) that there was a registration association or committee who had subscriptions given to them for attending to the registration. There is no doubt whatever that the intention was to get upon the register such persons as should vote for their party. The very object of what the registration association was to do, was to get upon the register people who would vote for the Liberals afterwards; and, no doubt, what they did was with the motive of increasing the strength of the Liberal party, and of course with the expectation that those Liberal voters whom they got upon the register would vote at the forthcoming election upon the Liberal side. That was, no doubt, their view. Immediately after this the candidate came into the field, and their first resolution was that the Liberal Registration Association committee should be their committee. It would not have mattered even without that when it appeared that the same individuals who formed the registration committee were acting as their agents. Even without that resolution it would follow that they were their agents, and inasmuch as the Parliamentary law has long established that where an agent is guilty of corruption it is not necessary to show that it was with the knowledge and consent of the candidate, nor to show that the money was produced by the candidate, but that corruption by an agent, though done with his own money, or with anybody else's money, would avoid the election, it follows at once, as it seems to me, and I wish to state that clearly, that their calling themselves the registration committee, and applying the money that was subscribed by people for the registration to a corrupt act, would not prevent that corrupt act unseating the Member, if it were proved. The question, therefore, I take it, as regards what the registration committee did, is this: is what they did a corrupt practice within the Act? If so, it would unseat the Members, for they were agents for the Members.

Now, there is not much dispute as to the fact of what was done at the time of the registration by the registration committee. The persons who attended at the revising barrister's court, not necessarily as witnesses, but either to support their votes or to support their claims, would probably lose their day's work by attending at the court. Those who had work very close to where the revising barrister held his court might perhaps be able to attend there without leaving their work, but a great number of persons who made claims would lose a day's work by attending at the court, and if they had to attend more than one day they would lose more than one day's work. What the registration committee say they did was this: part of the expense of the registration committee was caused by their paying those who so lost their work upon an estimate of what they would otherwise have made; so that they should be no losers by coming to put themselves upon the register. They assert that they did only that, and that they did not give anything which would enable a man to make a gain. Now, I wish to point out distinctly how in my mind that question comes to be a question of fact. I take it that the law has never yet said that to pay a person any money, or to assist him in any way in being put on the register, should be an offence at all. To give any money or any valuable consideration for the purpose of inducing a person to vote is a corrupt practice, and is made an offence; consequently, wherever it appears that under colour of paying people to get put upon the register, or assisting them to get put upon the register, a payment is made which is really intended to influence the vote at the ensuing election, that would be a corrupt practice, and the question in each case for those who have to determine the question must be, whether or not those payments that were made, were made with the intention to influence the vote at the election or not, because, if they were, they were bribes. It is clear that as the law is framed and as the Statute is worded to pay a person for coming to vote, giving him his day's wages or making up to him his loss of time, for the purpose of voting at the time of the election, would be a bribe. The words of the Act are clear, beyond all question, upon that point. But no such enactment says that paying a man for coming to the registration for the purpose of supporting his claim to vote is to be in itself considered as a bribe. Consequently one must see whether it is in effect a payment for the sake of the vote. That must be always, more or less, a question of evidence, upon which the person who has to decide it must draw his inference, and what, it seemed to me, are the important elements for consideration in drawing the inference, are, first, whether the payments were really and truly made contemporaneously with the registration; that is one great thing. Another great thing is, whether they were really intended to be merely a remuneration for what the man who was paid was out of pocket, so that he should be no loser; or, whether the intention was to give him a profit. I had occasion, in the election inquiry at Taunton, to consider a matter of this kind, the evidence being that some time after the registration, when the election was coming very near, a general notice was given that everybody who had been at the registration court might have a payment of 5s. for the day's loss of time, and that was carried out by giving 5s. to all who came to ask for it without any further inquiry than whether he was upon that side. I came to the conclusion that that payment was intended to influence the election, and was therefore bribery, and accordingly unseated the Member. But where the case turns out to be, as it is at present, upon the evidence that the money was paid contemporaneously with the registration; that no more was paid than the voters were out of pocket; and that precautions were taken to see that no more than that was paid, I do not think that that inference would be proper to be drawn.

Now, in the present case, Mr. Giffard urged in his reply that it was not proved that precautions were taken to see that the payment was confined to what the voters were out of pocket. No doubt it was not proved in this sense; there was not a minute inquiry upon it, and there was no attempt made to show in each individual case where men were paid that they were persons who had attended the registration court. But each of the persons connected with the registration who were called who knew anything about it, Mr. Langridge and Mr. Poole; and I think there was another called whose name I forget; all swore positively, in general terms, that they did intend it to be confined to them, and that the desire of the people who supplied the money was that it should be confined to them, and they believed that it was confined to them. Certainly no evidence has been given to show the contrary. The consequence is that, as far as regards these payments for attending at the registration court, I cannot see that I am to draw the conclusion that they were bribes, and consequently I cannot see that this would upset the election.

I wish to guard myself in case of other times from being misunderstood in any way to say that payments made in that way for a registration, especially when the registration is coming so closely before the election, are not in themselves very suspicious things, and that such payments, with very little added, a very little more than there is now, might not justify the conclusion that they were intended to influence the election. All I say is, that in the present case I do not think they were so intended; consequently, as regards those payments, I do not think the petitioners have made out a case of bribery.

The next thing we have to consider is, that at the same time that these payments were made there were refreshments given. Meat and drink were given at Gallop's house. We have distinct evidence that at the same time that the men were paid refreshments were given to the voters. I think that the probability is, that there might be similar things in other places, though we have not distinct evidence of it.

Now comes the question, Is that treating? The definition of treating given by the Corrupt Practices Act is this, that where a candidate (and where a candidate acts by agents, his agents are the same thing for this purpose as the candidate himself) gives meat or drink with the intention to influence the election or to influence a vote at the election, that is to be considered as corrupt treating. Here meat and drink undoubtedly were given at the time of the registration. As I have already said, I consider the registration committee, who were the same individuals as formed the committee of the sitting Members, as being the sitting Members' committee. The question comes to be, was that meat and drink given with the intention to influence the election. There, again, in considering the question whether there was the intention which makes treating corrupt treating, which makes the giving of meat, drink, and refreshments gratis corrupt, if it be done with that intent, which would make it a corrupt practice, it always comes to be a matter of very great importance, though not conclusive, to see the time when it was done, the extent to which it was done, and the manner in which it was done. I think, as far as the evidence goes here, the giving of those refreshments, which were shown to have been paid for by the registration committee, is distinguished from any other case, as far as I can perceive, in that it was confined to the time when the revising barrister was actually sitting. In Gallop's case, where we had the most distinct evidence about it, it appears that they were entirely given at that time. I think it amounts to this: that on each occasion when the men who were to be paid (they were paid in two batches at Gallop's house, Langridge paying for some) came to be paid, there was some refreshment and beer given also at the same time, Mr. Langridge paying for his portion at the time, but Mr. Poole afterwards dividing Gallop's bill, as to which several remarks were made, and to which I will allude presently. It appears that those refreshments were given exclusively at that time. Taking that view of the matter, although I think it was a very foolish and unwise thing to do, it seems to me to come nearly in the same category as the payment of the men for coming to support their claims. If there was any reason to believe that it was done not merely for that purpose, but to procure popularity, or to influence a vote at the election, it would be treating. But if it was merely meant and intended to be part of their coming to support their claims, and not at all to influence the election itself, it would not be corrupt treating. I think being of no very great extent, for extent and quantity are very material elements in the consideration, and being confined, as far as I can perceive in the evidence, to the time of the registration, I should draw the inference that it was not intended to influence the votes.

There was this circumstance, undoubtedly, which Mr. Giffard argued upon with great force, namely, that Gallop made out his whole bill and sent it in to Mr. Poole, the election agent. He made out the bill for everything, including these disbursements of refreshments to Mr. North and to Mr. Brassey. He evidently, when he took the order that he was to give those refreshments, thought that the two candidates were to pay for them. When the bill was sent in Mr. Poole changed it. He and his son, for that is I believe the the effect of the evidence, said, "No; this portion of the bill which relates to the refreshments cannot be paid by Mr. North and Mr. Brassey; it must be charged to the registration committee." It was accordingly charged to the registration committee, and it was paid. I do not think that the merely making an alteration in the mode in which the bill was made out and paid, would at all have saved them from the consequences, if it had been intended to influence the votes at the election. If it was meant as a means of procuring popularity, and influencing the election, or influencing a vote, it would have been treating, and no after mode of changing the way in which it was to be paid would have affected that at all. Mr. Giffard's argument, however, is that the fact of its being so made out at the time, and all put down at the time to Mr. North and Mr. Brassey, and an attempt made to obtain the payment of the whole from them, shows that at the time it was intended as an election expense. And, no doubt, if the money had been intended to be advanced by the two sitting Members at the time, it would be a strong ground, though it is not conclusive, for saying that that must have been intended to be for their benefit at the election, and to produce the effect, the intention to produce which would constitute treating. But I think that that, although a plausible argument, is by no means conclusive, and coupling it with the fact that, so far as this evidence goes, this giving of refreshments was confined exclusively to the time of the registration (for I find no evidence that any portion of these payments extended to any time after the registration), I do not think I should be justified in drawing the conclusion that it was done with a corrupt intention of influencing the election.

Now we come to one more head upon which the facts are scarcely in dispute at all. During the time when the contest was raging, it happened this year that the municipal elections fell but a very little while before the Parliamentary elections came on, and as might naturally be expected, there being a contest for the Parliamentary representation of the borough, those who stood in the municipal elections on the Liberal side, were active partisans of Mr. North and Mr. Brassey, and at least one of them, Mr. Poole, and probably others also, were agents for the sitting Members in conducting the election. It is not disputed or denied at all, in point of fact, that when they stood as candidates for the municipal election, they had given refreshments to the municipal electors, who would be the same class, and indeed the same individuals, as the Parliamentary electors; but they say they did it with the intention of influencing the municipal election, and that only. Now, on the same reasoning as I used before with regard to the registration, if the object and intention in their minds, when they gave those refreshments was to influence the Parliamentary election also, that would be treating, although it might be done with the object at the same time of influencing the municipal election. Here again it comes to be a question of fact. In trying to draw a conclusion as to what the intention was, it becomes very important to see what was the quantity, and the scale upon which this was done, and what was the time when it was done, in order to see whether it really was intended for more than the wrong and improper practice which generally prevails at municipal elections; and whether or not it was intended to go further, and influence the Parliamentary election, which was just about to come on.

There are cases undoubtedly. Beverley was mentioned as one, and I believe the facts proved it, in which large payments are made to voters at the municipal elections that they may become members of the Yellow or the Blue party, as it may be called, the intention being that the Yellow or the Blue party shall stick together at the Parliamentary election; they will be paid nothing there; but they are generally paid largely at the municipal elections, that they may be in the party and vote at the Parliamentary election. In such cases the real motive and intention of the persons who supply the money is to win the Parliamentary election. Wherever that is proved, of course there can be no doubt that it would be bribery, and perhaps it could scarcely ever be carried out in such a case without its being bribery, to such an extent as to make it a very proper question for Parliament to inquire whether the borough should be disfranchised or not. But without coming to that, it may very well happen that the municipal electors, being of the same class as the Parliamentary electors, advantage is taken of the opportunity of the municipal election, and under the colour of that, under the pretence of treating for the municipal election, there is money advanced for refreshments, in order to produce an effect upon the minds of the parties when they come to vote at the Parliamentary election.

Now, in looking at that, and seeing whether or not there is that intention, it becomes a most important element to see when it was done. In the present case, the municipal elections having come so very nearly at the same time as the Parliamentary elections, of course anything that was done at the municipal elections must have been near enough to the Parliamentary elections to produce an effect upon it. But there is a great importance in the time and place at which it was done, as evidence tending to make one think that it was done with the intention to influence the Parliamentary election. I had a similar thing in a case which was before me, where an active agent having been elected an alderman at a contested municipal election, afterwards gave refreshments in gratitude, as he said, to his supporters, but unluckily chose, as the place to give them, a public-house where the candidates had held a meeting, and chose as the time to give them just the time when the candidates came out. It was not necessary to decide that point there, because there were other things which upset the election, and vacated the seat, and I had not to make up my mind upon this question; but I mention the case as an instance of what I mean when I say that the time and place are very important. The time and place there made me very much think that I should be obliged to come to the the conclusion, if it should be really necessary to decide it, that there was an intention in that case to produce an effect upon the Parliamentary election.

Here I have to see what were the time, the place, and the extent to which the treating, which has been proved at the municipal election, took place, in order to see whether it would really be intended to affect the Parliamentary election or not. As far as I make out, I think the principal evidence obtained of that was from Mr. Poole, who did not seem to me upon that point at all to wish to keep back anything. When he was asked about it he mentioned several things which had not been proved, and named several public-houses at which during the municipal election refreshments had been given (punch, I think he said), as it was customary to do upon the occasion of their being elected. Now all this took place exactly on the day of the municipal election. As far as the evidence went, none seems to have been given afterwards; and although there is no doubt of this refreshment being given to some persons who would ultimately be Parliamentary electors, and it would be likely enough that the popularity acquired might continue for a fortnight, so that a portion of it would influence the Parliamentary election afterwards, yet, looking to the question, not whether or no it may have produced that effect, but whether or no it was the intention to do so, it seems to me that there was no intention at the time which would make it corrupt; and I cannot come to that conclusion in the present case. If I found that it was continued after the municipal elections were over, if I found that the quantity of refreshment given was in excess of what it seems to have been at other times, or if I found that the place where it was done was such as to show that it was intended to produce an influence upon the election of Members of Parliament, all those things would be material to show me the intention. But in this present case I cannot find that there was anything done beyond what had been done in ordinary municipal elections, when no Parliamentary election was coming. It was done on the day of the municipal election, and only on that day; and therefore although it was certainly a matter to be inquired into and considered, I do not think that a corrupt intention has been made out.

These are the cases which require most explanation, in order to make the grounds on which I proceed intelligible. We come now to other matters, on which the question is more one of fact than of law, and does not require so much explanation. First of all, there is the evidence of the treating which is alleged to have taken place on the polling-day. The evidence for the petitioners showed this, that on the polling-day several public-houses, particularly the "Pelham Arms" and the "York Hotel," were all filled, and that there was a great deal of drinking going on, and several witnesses who were called proved that when they went into those public-houses they paid but little. I think the evidence showed that they paid for a pint or so for themselves, but after that they got a great deal of drink which they did not pay for at all; I think that that much was clearly enough made out. Most of them were asked the question whether they saw anybody pay for it; and I think that most of them said that they did not see it paid for. No doubt, therefore, the effect of what they saw would have been to lead to the conclusion that there had been established by somebody a score at the public-houses, upon which the landlords of those houses were to let people have drink gratis when they came in. If that had been so, there could have been small doubt that the person who did so establish a score was intending to influence the election; and if it were shown that that person was an agent for the sitting Members, no doubt there would have been a case of treating clearly enough made out to avoid the election.

But other witnesses were called besides Mr. Poole, who denied positively that there was anything of the sort, and who certainly must have stretched their evidence considerably beyond what could possibly be called the truth in any way, if there really are outstanding bills which have to be paid. If there are any such, and Mr. Brassey should hereafter be called upon to pay them, I think he will be well aware that there must have been tolerably distinct perjury here; and he himself has sworn that he knows of none such, and that he does not intend to pay them. Under those circumstances, one can hardly suppose that there could be any bills of this sort which are intended to be paid. Then we had the innkeepers of both the "Pelham Arms" and the "York Hotel" called, and they most distinctly swore that to the best of their knowledge and belief there was no supply gratis; that there was nothing supplied by them; that all they furnished was paid for at the time, and Chandler's waiter comes and tells the same story. Chandler and his waiter did not quite agree in their story. This rather impressed me with the belief that it was by no means a got-up story that they were telling, because Chandler's account of how the waiter was to pay him was, I suppose, what in theory he thought the waiter ought to do; and the waiter's account of how he did it, of his putting the money in the till, was, I take it, what really in practice he did. Therefore it rather led me to the conclusion that they had not been getting up the case together. The discrepancy between Chandler and the waiter rather impressed me with the belief I am now having honest witnesses who are telling the truth. Their evidence was perfectly inconsistent with anything like a score being established; but their evidence, and also what the other witnesses said, is certainly quite consistent with this, that people came in and treated the company round. I think, to some extent, that would be done at a time of election excitement; people, without being agents of the candidates at all, are very likely, to some extent, to do that which it would be very foolish and unwise in them to do; and I think that all the evidence which has been produced as to what took place upon that day would be consistent with that being done.

Then comes a matter in connection with this on which Mr. Giffard made a very strong point point in his reply; and I may fairly say that Mr. Giffard did make me feel that there was a great deal to be said there; he did make me pause and hesitate on this part of the case. There was a man of the name of Thomas Tutt, a member of the committee; there is no question about that. This Thomas Tutt is sworn by a man called Foster, when he was bringing him to the poll, to have said to him, in substance, this: Foster asked for allowances for drink, and Tutt made answer to him, "I could not do that; it would be bribery." But, at the same time, said to him, "You may drink, and afterwards, when it is all over, you shall be paid." Now, that Thomas Tutt might have denied if it had not been true; and Thomas Tutt, although undoubtedly on the respondent's side, is not called. I think the reasonable conclusion is, that the substance of that did take place, and that something to that effect was said by Thomas Tutt to the man Foster, and that Foster accordingly did spend 10s. (he said that was the amount) in getting drink for himself and for others; and that afterwards, when he brought in his account for this 10s., and demanded payment for it, he was very properly refused payment by Mr. Poole. It is quite obvious that if there had been any payment made by the sitting Members or by their agent of 10s. spent in that way, it would have proved treating to the extent of 10s., and have led to the natural inference that there had been a great deal more of it.

Then comes the question whether, that being so, upon that alone there is not made out a case of treating by Tutt, who was an agent of the sitting Members, to such an extent, that although it was only 10s. that was paid, and although it was only in one instance, that is or is not a corrupt practice which ought to upset the election. There I have felt a great deal of force in what Mr. Giffard said, and I have paused and hesitated upon it a good deal. It is established by Parliamentary law that a Member is responsible for his agents in these cases; and, although what constitutes an agent is very ill defined, yet still it is a question which it is important to consider, and one must see what an agent is. I have frequently had it in my mind that there is a great difficulty, in strict logic, in making the agency of a person dependant upon the extent of the corrupt practices committed by him. It does seem that, in strict logic, if a man would be an agent if he was shown to have corrupted 100 people by paying them 5*l.* a piece, then, if he corrupts only a single man by giving him a single glass of beer, he ought to be regarded as an agent equally. There is no doubt that in strict logical language you will find a difficulty in making the distinction, yet I cannot but feel that, in administering justice and in administering the law in such a way that it would be tolerable, one must make some distinction of that sort. There is the same thing that constitutes the man an agent in the one case present also in the other case; but I cannot but feel that where the case is a small, isolated, solitary case, it requires much more evidence to satisfy one of agency than would otherwise be necessary. If a small thing is done by a person who is the head agent; for instance, in this case, if a very trifling thing had been done by Mr. Poole, who is the agent for the election expenses, I think that would have upset the election; and if small things to a considerable extent were done by a subordinate person, comparatively slight evidence of agency would probably have induced one to find that he was an agent; but when you come to a case of this sort, where there is the single case of Thomas Tutt having told a man, when he was inducing him to go to the poll, that he would be paid afterwards for what he might spend in drink, to make that single case upset the election would require considerable evidence of agency; and I do not find that there would be strong enough evidence of agency here to make one act upon that one single case.

Mr. Giffard argued, with great force, that if treating were proved in this particular case, it is a fair and reasonable inference that that would account for a great many others of a similar kind, and that, consequently, I ought to act upon it. I accede to that; and if I felt at all that there was any ground for believing, upon the whole of the evidence taken together, that there was a mode of procuring treating at the "Pelham Arms" and elsewhere by sending in a variety of people, each of whom was to treat upon a small scale, I should probably say that I thought that was an instance of it, and that this would be evidence to prove it; but if such a thing existed, I cannot but feel that there would be some more evidence of it. What Mr. Giffard said is very true, that there is this great difficulty in these cases, that the parties who are guilty of being bribed and those who are guilty of bribing are together, and therefore there is great difficulty in getting evidence in cases of bribery; but that does not apply so much to cases of treating. Treating from its very nature must be done openly, and in such a way that a great number of people may see it. It is almost impossible to have treating so carried on that the opposite side may not see it, and there are generally a considerable number of neutral persons who attend where treating is going on from the mere love of drink and beer, without regard very much to what politics they are of, and who are willing to tell about it afterwards. Consequently if there had been any regular system, of which this case with regard to what Tutt said was a single instance that cropped out, I cannot but think that we should have had more evidence of it. Taking that view of it, I think I cannot act upon the evidence of the agency of Tutt, though it is evidence of agency which might have induced me to act if there had been anything tending to show a general system, rather than, as it is, an individual case.

Now I pass on to one or two other cases which have not been much dwelt upon, and with respect to which I need not say so much. There is the case of Mr. Langridge and the Beans. What Mr. Langridge is accused of having done is this; it is said that he went down to Bean who he knew was pledged to the other side, and that he left a message with his wife to say that he could give Bean a job the next day. Mr. Langridge does not deny that he did that at all; Mrs. Bean goes on to say that he further stated to her, that if

Hastings.

Bean went down to the "Dorset Arms," he would get 4 s. for his vote. If Bean had gone to the "Dorset Arms" and got 4 s. at that time, I should have thought at once that it showed that that 4 s. was intended to be a bribe. It would have thrown very great light upon the other transactions, and have been strong evidence to show that the other sums that were paid as far back as the time of the registration were intended to be bribes also. But Mr. Langridge totally denied that he said this, and certainly the Beans did not go to try the experiment, and to get the 4 s. I think I cannot act upon the view that Mr. Langridge spoke falsely, and that Mrs. Bean spoke truly. There were also some slight discrepancies as to whether or not Mr. Langridge came again in the evening alone, and saw Bean in the road. Mr. Langridge's account is that he met Bean as he was coming along. I think he said that he saw Bean standing talking in the road. Bean's account is that a man called Elliott had come into his house and summoned him out, saying that Mr. Langridge wished to speak to him. Elliott has not been called. Both stories may be true. It is enough to suppose that Elliott seeing Mr. Langridge coming along, went into Bean's house and told him to step out, without supposing that there was any real discrepancy there. There is no doubt of this, for both sides agree that Mr. Langridge told Bean that he could now give him a job, that he wanted him to assist in filling a drain, and that he might begin it to-morrow if he liked. There is some slight difference here again between the two accounts. Bean says that at that time there was language used by Mr. Langridge which would come in effect to his asking whether he would go down in the waggon with him, and coupling that with the rest of what passed, it would certainly amount in effect to his saying, "You can have this job, though I do not say that I employ you for the sake of your vote, yet you will understand well enough that you are to vote on my side"; clearly Bean so understood it, for Bean said that he did not know, he would see about it; and apparently coming to the conclusion that it was meant that he was not to have the job unless he gave a vote on Mr. Langridge's side, and having resolved not to change his colours, and not to vote on that side, he did not go for the job, and accordingly voted for the two Tories, as he had originally pledged himself to do, and did not ask for the job at all. Now comes the question: Was this really intended as an offer to him to induce him to desert his colours and vote upon the other side? Mr. Langridge says "No," he says that he really did want the drain filled up, that he had really wanted labour; that this man had previously asked him if he could give him some employment, and knowing that he was out of work, he told him that there was this work which he could give him, and it was not done with the view of influencing his vote at all. Now, if after he had voted, Bean had come and asked for the job and had been refused, I should have had no doubt at all, that this offer of work had been made to him with the view of influencing his vote. If, on the other hand, Bean had come for the job, and had got the work given him, I should have come to the conclusion that it was not so intended. I have no doubt myself that Bean thought it was so intended, but Mr. Langridge says it was not. I cannot act upon that and say that there was an intention to bribe unless I were to lay down the rule that there must at an election always be exclusive dealing. I have always considered it a very wrong thing on the part of any one, on the ground of politics, to dismiss his men whom he had already in his employment because they were going to vote against him; that is made undue influence. It would also be very wrong to employ men in order to influence them to vote for you; and to lay down the rule that whenever a person really having a job in hand offers it to a man who is going to vote on the other side, although he says it was not intended to influence the man's vote, we are to draw the inference that it was, would be laying down the rule that during an election there must be exclusive dealing. I do not see how one possibly can act upon such a principle as that. I can only say here that it is not made out that in the case of Mr. Langridge it was intended to produce this effect, and consequently I think this case fails.

There was evidence given of a Mr. Upton having spoken to a man named Sargent about his giving him money. Upton and Sargent both denied that that took place. I cannot tell how the facts came to be sworn to.

I scarcely recollect any other cases that require mention. As to the cases of payments to voters at the Sluice by Wood, if it had been arranged beforehand that those men were to be paid for their loss of time, with a view to the election, it would have been bribery, whoever did it, and if that person was an agent of the sitting Members, it would have upset the election; but here the evidence comes to this, that they were paid half-crowns by a man named Wood, and the petitioners have failed totally to produce any evidence to show that it was anything more than a speculation of Wood's, he advancing the half-crowns, thinking that he might be repaid. There was no evidence to show anything more than that. That, therefore, must be passed by.

I do not think there is anything else that requires notice. There were one or two other cases, but they failed so obviously on the evidence, that I think there is no occasion to go through them. The consequence is, that I come to the conclusion that the case brought forward on the part of the petitioners has failed as against both the sitting Members. And that being so, I must certify to the Speaker that I have determined them both to have been duly elected, and I need not say, of course, that I shall certify that there was no corrupt practice brought home to the personal knowledge of either. I shall say also that there is no reason to believe that any general corrupt practices prevailed in the borough; of that there is no evidence. As in this case the petitioners have failed, and I see no reason to deviate from the ordinary rule, I must order that the costs be borne by the petitioners.

LIMERICK CITY ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Baron Fitzgerald, 25 January 1869.

Limerick City.

Mr. Baron Fitzgerald.] I HAVE considered the evidence in this case with all the attention that I could. I have attended to the very eloquent arguments that have been addressed to me; and I trust I have attended to both with a deep sense of that responsibility which the Legislature have thought fit to impose upon me. I am prepared now to express my determination upon the case, so far as is necessary for my certificate and report to the Speaker.

The petition seeks to void the last election for this city upon the grounds of bribery, of treating, and of undue influence upon the part of the sitting Members; and those corrupt practices are charged in the proper statutable words in the petition in the case of each of the three corrupt practices.

With reference to the cases of direct bribery, I think the counsel upon both sides have, in their able arguments, properly confined themselves to the three cases of Keane, Ahern, and Skeehan, and I shall confine myself, in the few observations which I shall make, to those three.

In Keane's case I have first considered what must be taken to be the admitted facts of the case. It is clear that two days before the election he had himself joined the canvassing party of Tait, who was contesting the election with the sitting Members, and he had actually called upon Macdonogh, a person in the employment of Tait, to join with him and them in that canvass; that was two days before the election, and that could not, according to the facts proved before me, have been earlier than the Monday. The day before the polling he had an interview with the Rev. Mr. Mahone, who was one of the clergymen of the parish in which he lived; and, in the course of that conversation, a promise was made to him with reference to an old claim, which it is also conceded that he had, or alleged that he had, against Mr. Russell and his agents for several years antecedently. In the course of that conversation a promise was made that if the debt were a proper one it should be paid, or it should be "right," or at all events a conversation took place from which the legitimate inference would be, that a promise was made that it should be paid. He, who had two days before canvassed, and who had admittedly this antecedent existing claim, upon the polling day votes for Messrs. Gavin and Russell, and against the party for whom on the two previous days he had been canvassing.

Now those are facts proved wholly independently of his testimony, and by proper legal evidence, excluding the question of agency, which the Statutes desire me to exclude.

Well then, it is proved also by the evidence of three men (if they can be credited), that upon two occasions, one almost contemporaneous with the giving of the vote, he had told Macdonogh, Fife, and Barry, that he would not have voted as he did vote unless the promise had been made; that is, unless his claim should be satisfied; or, at least, according to the evidence of Barry, that it would not be safe for him to vote against Russell, having regard to the old claim which existed. And, upon the second occasion, he said, in the presence both of Gardiner and Macdonogh, that he had the promise, and that he had actually been shown the money by which the old claim was to be paid.

Those are conceded facts in the case. Now I agree with Mr. O'Hagan in his argument, that the mere statement of an elector or a voter that he had been bribed at an election which is past ought not, and could not, under the late Statute, be relied upon as evidence against the sitting Members that a bribe had been given to the man who so alleged it. But I cannot agree that that argument applies to a case like this, in which what the man says is produced, not for the purpose of proving the fact of the promise made to him at all (which is proved, independently of his evidence, by the evidence of Mr. Malone himself), but for a purpose for which it is properly receivable as evidence against all the world, although it rests more or less upon what was passing in the man's own mind, which can only be known by inference.

Those were the facts; and I cannot but think that that was a case calling upon and requiring an explanation upon the part of the sitting Members, supposing the question of agency were established against the Rev. Mr. Malone. It is evidence of a corrupt act, but it is evidence of a corrupt act which may admit of explanation. And, before I enter at all into the question of agency, it is necessary for me to see whether, upon the evidence given before me, it is made out to my satisfaction as an act of bribery. The reasonable inference from those facts, and it appears to me the only reasonable inference, would be, that there was bribery within the meaning of the Statute.

But what are the facts established besides that, which I am bound to consider before I can come to the conclusion that the promise was made to this man in order to induce him to give his vote? I need not enter into the case of abstaining from voting.

The first evidence I must consider is this, that antecedently to the election, antecedent as far as I see, and as far as the recollection of Mr. Cronin goes, to the Monday, an application had been made to him by this man. Mr. Cronin says, that at the time when this application was made to him his own mind was wholly undecided as to the part which he would take in the election. That is Cronin's own evidence; but it does not stop there, because the fact of his mind not being made up, he says, was actually communicated by him to the party who was applying to him. He says that, more than that, it was he who asked Cronin for whom he intended to vote, and that Cronin told him, in answer to that, that his own mind was decided. Now, what does Cronin say (if I can believe it), when he was informed that the man was so undecided as to his vote? It is (if Mr. Cronin is to be believed) that his own mind was made up to vote for the sitting Members, Gavin and Russell, though he had a cause of complaint against them. That is the evidence that Cronin gave of the transaction; he says, that his mind being still undecided up to that moment as to how he would vote, he was satisfied that Mr. Tait would not show his colours; he communicated with Father Malone, and stated the case to him, and that Father Malone seemed to think that it was a fair thing for the man to be paid, but that he expressed some doubt as to whether the demand was a genuine demand or not, and that he, upon that, communicated again with the man Keane, and a person of the name of Manahan who had been clerk of the solicitor for Mr. Russell at the previous election. He was communicated with, and Cronin and Manahan attended together upon Father Malone; and upon that conversation, after satisfying himself as far as he could of the justice of the demand, Father Malone said, that if it was so, it would be fair for him to be paid, or he might rest assured that he would be paid. Well, that being the state of the facts, if I believe Cronin, or pay any attention to the evidence of Father Malone, he thought that the election might be a more favourable time for making a claim than another. I disregard the fact which Father Malone positively deposes to, that in this he had no reference to the vote. He tells me that never throughout the whole course of the proceedings had he entertained a doubt as to the mode in which Keane would himself vote, Keane having actually told Cronin twice antecedently, that though he felt an injury had been done to him in respect to this demand, still his determination was to vote for Gavin and Russell.

Now this is the question which I have to consider upon the whole of the evidence taken with the facts which I have stated shortly; am I, or ought I to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt in a case like this, that that promise was made by Father Malone in order to induce him to give his vote; for, unless I am satisfied of that, the inquiry into the question of agency becomes immaterial.

With reference to what after all is material as showing that the man's own mind might have been influenced to some extent or acted upon by the promise—that does appear to me important in all these questions, but it never can be conclusive—what I have to consider is, the purpose and intention with which the promise is given, and what was the actual effect produced upon the man's mind. All I can say is that, regarding this as a suspicious transaction, particularly with reference to the time at which it occurred, and to each and all of the circumstances of the case, satisfaction has not been produced on my mind that this was an act of bribery.

Well now, the next case is the case of Skeeahan. That, too, in many respects is a most remarkable case. This man is a publican residing in this town: it appears that he had been antecedently asked for his vote by a person of the name of O'Brien, and that he informed O'Brien that he had not made up his mind. It appears that one of the clergymen of this parish (I think Mr. Leahy) had, upon one occasion at least, actually communicated with him upon the subject of his vote, and that either he, or some other clergyman of the parish, had called upon him. His answer to Father Leahy was certainly a most remarkable one, and has been properly and ably commented upon by Mr. Murphy, and I indeed never listened to a more able argument than Mr. Murphy's in any case. The question was "are you tightened?" and that, coupled with the fact that he had intimated to O'Brien, when he canvassed him before, that his mind was not made up, is no doubt a very material matter in considering this case. Father Leahy subsequently goes into the polling room, and in the polling room, at the time, is the same O'Brien who had antecedently canvassed him for his vote, and Scanlan, the personation agent on the side of Tait and Pigott. He gives his vote, and either at the time of giving his vote, or some very short time after, the Rev. Mr. Scott is also in the booth. I am now speaking again, as in the other case, about facts as to which there is no controversy or dispute. The next thing is, that O'Brien, accompanied by the Rev. Mr. Scott, the clergyman of his parish, and the personation agent, Scanlan, go together to the house of this man, almost direct from the polling-booth. In the house and while they are still in the shop, the man asks whether he ought not to get an order as well as other people. Mr. Scott's answer is a singular one with reference to the knowledge which several of the other clergymen seemed to have had of its being the usual practice in elections and matters of this kind to give those orders. He said that he had no authority to give an order. The next thing that happened was, that he is asked by the man Skeeahan to go into the office which was off the shop, an office with a door to it; but as I understood the Rev. Mr. Scott's evidence, it was not wholly shut off from the shop, because it communicated from the counter behind. All that the Rev. Mr. Scott could remember of the conversation which then took place was, that he said he had some old brandy. What answer he gave to that or anything further that occurred, Mr. Scott does not remember. It is hard, one would say, to resist the species of inference that this intimation had some connection with a request for an order before. However, nothing, so far as it appears, passed between them in the office; and with that mysterious intimation they came out, and then some other conversation, the nature of which does not appear, took place with reference to the order, and it ends, according to Mr. Scott's evidence, by O'Brien and the person who had accompanied him and Skeeahan and Scanlan Scanlan from the booth, asking him if he would be safe in giving an order. The answer which Mr. Scott gave was that he thought he would be safe. He says that in giving his answer what he had reference to was, the usual practice at elections of giving those orders, and, I presume, taking the chance of their being honoured. It is singular that this answer should come from Mr. Scott, who himself had refused to give the order because he had no authority; yet he so far encouraged O'Brien, at all events, to give an order, though he told me at the same time, when I asked the question, that he had not the slightest reason to believe that O'Brien had any authority, and he therefore, in his view, must have had precisely and identically the same reasons for refusing to give it. However, what follows after that is that they again retire from the room in which Mr. Scott is, who had declined to give the order because he had not authority, but who had told O'Brien, whom he did not know to have any authority, that he would be safe. They leave Father Scott, and go into the office, and the order is drawn up in the office. Now, unquestionably, this differs from the former case; and I must say, that though it is a case which, upon the face of it, does appear to me to require explanation, it differs from the other case in one important respect, that is, upon the law as to bribery. Here there is no evidence of an antecedent promise; in the other case there was evidence of an antecedent promise; that is, a promise given before the vote was given. Here the order is given afterwards, there being no evidence of any antecedent promise, or at least none that I can find in the case; besides which it is positively denied.

Now, that is one of the first cases in which the word "corrupt" enters into consideration. I shall have to say more about the word "corrupt" when I come to the cases of treating. As to this I am satisfied, that while in the former part of the second section of the Act reference is made to offers and promises so called, antecedently to the vote, the Legislature clearly intended the court to draw a prima facie reasonable inference from the act done as to the purpose for which it was done, leaving it to the other side to rebut that inference if they could. I think they intended something further than this, and that though a favour or promise bestowed after the vote was given might raise suspicion, if there were even a reasonable inference, of some such corrupt purpose as has been indicated by the enactment of the second section, yet if the inference was not so strong as to authorise the court to act upon that inference alone, without further evidence, whether direct or circumstantial, from which the purpose for which the thing was done could be drawn it was not to be acted upon. In my view of the matter, every forbidden act done for the purpose mentioned in the Act is to be regarded as done for a corrupt purpose; and once show that a forbidden act is done for the purpose mentioned in the Act, which, without reference to the act being forbidden is a purely innocent act, then it becomes a corrupt act the moment that it is shown to be done for the purpose indicated. But in some cases the act itself affords ground for reasonable inference of the intention with which the act is done, and there the Legislature has not introduced the word "corrupt." If the act be proved to be done, the court is allowed to draw from it the ordinary reasonable inference, prima facie, that it was done for the purpose which it indicates; and then corruption is made out.

But there are other cases in which, for some reason or another, as it appears to me, the Legislature thought the inference of intention or purpose was not so strong, and in those cases it introduces the word "corruptly," for the purpose of showing that it did not intend the ordinary inference of intention to be relied upon. This can easily and perfectly be illustrated. At law the malicious purpose is what constitutes murder, but homicide of itself raises the law of inference. Was there any such purpose? The moment homicide alone is proved the jury may infer from the homicide alone the malicious purpose. But if the Legislature had said that there must be express malice to constitute murder, the fact of homicide would be left still, as raising the presumption of malice at law, and would therefore be evidence materially bearing upon the question; but, unless the facts and circumstances made something out in addition, the crime of murder would not be committed. So here, where the Legislature has not introduced the word "corruptly," and the natural and reasonable inference from the act is that it was an act done for the purpose contemplated, the Legislature has treated it as corrupt, without mentioning anything more about it. In those cases in which it seems to have been intended that the court should not infer the purpose simply and solely from the act, it has introduced the word "corruptly." But the whole proof of corruption, as it appears to me, consists in showing that the forbidden act is done for a purpose not innocent according to the Act of Parliament. The Legislature shows there may be the giving of entertainment to voters on account of their voting; and, though that be in itself a forbidden act, it is not forbidden by the section as to corrupt practices; therefore, I think, it was in that case that they introduced the word "corruptly" for the purpose of showing that, beyond proving the fact of entertainment being given to voters, you must give evidence of the purpose. Therefore I am not at liberty to treat it as being sufficient evidence of itself to put the other party upon explanation.

Now, that being so, I am bound to construe this Act, in reference to the last line of the second section of the Act of Parliament, where the Legislature has introduced the word "corruptly." It appears to me that I must be satisfied, having reference to the antecedent sections, that this gift given after the election can, from the circumstances of the case, be shown to be the price of the vote. Here, again, the circumstances are strong evidence, and are very suspicious; but I cannot reject the evidence of the parties to it. O'Brien and Scanlan most positively denied it. One of the most suspicious circumstances is going immediately from the man's house to the polling booth. They say it was not for the purpose of accompanying him, but they went (and they are borne out in this by the testimony of Mr. Scott himself) for a wholly different purpose, in that direction; that is, they went to look for the two other voters who lived there. Am I to reject that? Can I treat that as evidence which I can entirely disregard? Now I concur entirely in the observations made by Mr. Murphy, that if a gentleman having influence with the Roman Catholic clergy gave those orders, or authorised or told persons that it was safe to give them, and the orders were given, not one half hour, not one quarter of an hour elapses before it is known through the whole town in which it is recognised; and whether for the purpose of profit, or for the purpose of gain or for any other purpose, the system of orders will most assuredly follow. Therefore, what I have to deal with is this: is it for the corrupt purpose? The Rev. Mr. Scott swears positively that he never did give it for that purpose, that he never thought of such a thing; and Skehan says that he had voted; that he had not interested himself particularly about his vote at all; and that his asking for the order had merely reference to this acknowledged practice at elections. I confess I am unable to resist positive evidence upon oath of that kind coming from a quarter more particularly bound than any other (if one can be more bound than another) to speak what is the solemn truth. I cannot upon mere inference decide this to be bribery.

With reference to Ahern's case, the story I think is improbable in itself, and it is not satisfactorily contradicted; although to a certain extent, it is contradicted. The mere fact that a man going up to poll at that time should in the interval of a few minutes be met, almost in the same place, by three persons, one of whom offered 5*l.*, the other 10*l.*, and the third 15*l.*, would immediately suggest the inference that each of these three persons must have communicated with the others. But I think that is most improbable; and when I add to that the fact that one of these men had been an agent upon the opposite side and was present in the booth on that occasion, and when I couple that with the man's mode of giving his evidence upon the table, I could not satisfactorily to my own mind conclude that there was bribery in this case.

Now, coming to the conclusion to which I have come, that these acts of bribery have not been established, of course it renders unnecessary the consideration of the question of agency; but, considering the manner in which it has been discussed in this case, I think it right to guard myself as well as I can (not however attempting to decide anything upon the matter) against its being supposed that circumstances were not proved in this case deserving of the most serious consideration upon this question of agency, as it is called, under the Statute. And if, as Mr. Coffey said, this be essentially a Roman Catholic city, and if the influence of the Roman Catholic clergy be enormous; if, more than that, from the position of the great majority of the electors in the city, they naturally look to better educated men than themselves for the management of their temporal as well as spiritual affairs—if that be so, bearing in mind the organised condition of the Roman Catholic clergy, and the fact that in every parish in the town there are, at least, two or three clergymen so connected with the poorer class of voters, a question arises in which, as a body, this clergy are interested. If they make the cause of the candidate their own, and give him the benefit of having what may be equivalent in its effect upon the election to a committee-room conducted by themselves in every parish, they being the canvassers; and if it then turns out at the time of the election that the candidate represents his cause as identical with that of the clergy, and publicly gives out that the question between him and his adversaries is whether the clergy shall be put down or raised up, and is accompanied by them through the streets canvassing; if that be so, though the particular clergyman of the parish be not the party who accompanied the candidate in canvassing, I, for my part, will doubt long before I say that the candidate is not, so far as his sitting in Parliament is concerned, responsible for the acts of those parties in their several districts and parishes. I can determine nothing, but I say that is a matter upon which my mind is by no means satisfied; and if I were called upon to decide it at this moment, my impression would be decidedly different from that which is alleged by Mr. Coffey.

I now come to the cases of treating, and, for the purpose for which I view them they seem to me to be divisible into three distinct classes, each requiring a somewhat different consideration. No doubt Mr. Murphy (of whose argument I really can hardly say more than I have already said) has, for the interest of his client, argued that they could be mixed together, but it appears to me that, considering the case, I am bound to separate them.

I come first to what I should consider as the class which is relied upon, namely, cases of mixed bribery and treating; and those are, I believe the greater number of orders given by Lynch, and the two orders given by Punch. I leave out of consideration the order for Skehan; that belongs more properly to the order of bribery; for it was an order by which the man might be satisfied by taking the goods to himself and giving money.

The second class is what I should call the class of pure treating; those are the cases of Moloney and Manahan. It is impossible for me to regard either of those as cases of mixed bribery and treating in the way in which it has been propounded to me here; because, unless I entirely reject the evidence of Father Moloney and Mr. Manahan, it is utterly impossible to consider the orders as given for the benefit of the public, and it is in that way, as far as I understand it, that these cases were urged as cases of bribery; I mean bribery as distinct from treating. I therefore treat them by themselves. Then comes the last, and in my mind, the most serious class of cases, that is the cases of mixed bribery and intimidation (as they are called, and properly called I think) the hiring of mobs upon the part of persons in the interest of Mr. Russell, for the alleged purpose of putting down mobs upon the other side.

Well,

Well, now, with regard to the orders, the argument used is this: that except the two orders of Punch, all the orders which have been given are the orders of Lynch. I think there were 21 orders altogether spoken to in the course of the evidence. Taking out of those the three which again, if any reliance at all is to be placed on the evidence of Mr. Leahy, must be taken out of this class and put into those of mixed treating and intimidation, there would remain about 18, including those of Punch's, involving a sum of about 30*l.* in the whole. If these 17 or 18 orders were really given for the corrupt practices mentioned in the Act, namely, that of influencing votes and inducing men to vote, and for compensation for votes given, I find the greatest difficulty in understanding how they could be treated as satisfactory evidence of the purpose of bribing the public. I dwell more upon the number of them, because the sums, with the exception of those two of Punch's, were positively small, and were not given till after the poll had closed altogether, and all of them are given by Lynch. They were distributed, two of them to persons who had no wives and families; and one of them, at all events, to an unmarried female. There were seven publicans to whom they were given altogether; and one, at least, was given to a man who had no vote at all. I find the greatest difficulty in coming to the conclusion that these orders were given to bribe the public. I cannot act upon mere suspicion or tricks of the election. I must consider these cases with reference to the evidence. It did strike me unquestionably, from the first, from matters which Mr. Murphy has urged, that the beginning of the giving of these orders was the act of Mr. Leahy, who gave them, for the purpose of drinking, to this mob, hired by him, and under his directions. But he did give them. He could not, as it appears to me, have given them to such a man as Lynch or to such a man as Crow, knowing that orders of this kind are ordinarily given at an election without the certain anticipation of that fact being known to the clergymen. The publicans have given credit for every order afterwards given; but if I am to believe Father Leahy's evidence, that this is an account still due, he would unquestionably be responsible for the purposes as to which the orders had been applied by the men in whose hands he put them. They were acting in a matter in which he had given them an authority to do something, though a limited authority. Yet, if I come to the conclusion that Father Leahy, in giving these orders, was not actuated by any corrupt practice, either with reference to bribing or treating, unless they can go further, and make out that the parties who acted under him gave them for that purpose, there is no evidence before me that they were given for that purpose. It occurs to me that if these men were set upon encouraging this practice of bribing for the benefit of the wide world, the last thing they would attend to would be the interest of the parties for whom Mr. Leahy or any other party was interested. I am therefore without a rational ground for coming to the conclusion that the purpose for which these orders was given was the benefit to the publicans or any of the purposes indicated by the counsel for Mr. Russell.

Now, with respect to Moloney, I shall speak shortly upon those cases. How am I to come to the conclusion that the orders given by Mr. Moloney, improper as I conceive them to be; leading, as I think, to improper and wholly mischievous results; leading to enormous expense and enormous drinking, at least, upon this occasion—were given for the purpose of affecting the return of the Member, supposing Mr. Moloney to be the agent of the sitting Member; or that they were given to people for the purpose of corruptly influencing their votes? If the evidence is to be believed, the persons for whose benefit they were given were the persons whose votes (there could not be the slightest doubt) needed no stimulus whatever of this kind. Lamentable as the results of such practices are, I must act by the law; I must go by the strict construction of the Act, and I am unable to come to the conclusion that corrupt purposes of treating have been proved.

Consequently, the conclusion which I draw from the evidence is, that with respect to those particular cases, there was no doubt with regard to their votes or how they would have voted. Nothing has been proved in these cases, and I must act upon the evidence before me. If it can be shown to me that some man who had promised his vote had changed, it would be different; but nothing of that kind is proved. The evidence stands uncontradicted, that this was intended for the purpose of persons who had voted.

I now come to the last part of the case, and it is one that I approach with the greatest pain; and the whole case is a very painful one, considering the persons implicated in it. There was a sum of between 300*l.* and 400*l.* expended in a couple of nights, or nearly so, in giving drink to various persons, to the number of several hundreds, throughout the city of Limerick, for the purpose of securing their services to repel, if necessary, the force used by the opposite side. I will put it no further. I am told that reasonable ground existed for terror on behalf of the party who was about to canvass for Messrs. Russell and Gavin upon the Monday, the day before the day of "nomination"; that these terrors were entertained by a grave assembly of magistrates and clergymen; for that is the way it has been put to me by the counsel for the sitting Members; that they were terrified by the demonstration, some of which they saw, more of which they heard; by articles in the newspapers, written against some of them personally, which caused them to be seriously apprehensive of going out upon their canvass. It does appear that some of them actually refused to go out canvassing, and left, and as far as I can gather, the whole thing seems to have been in confusion upon that day. After those persons had left (and Mr. Leahy was among those who left) the canvassing party did go out. Mr. Murphy has truly put it that there was some actual demonstration, and even a threat of violence used by a person of the name of Larry Kelly to one clergyman; and it does appear that the whole feeling of the crowd collected was changed by that circumstance, stance, and by the address of the clergymen. What is the conclusion to which the assembly of magistrates and clergymen really came, attending, as they had a right to do, by the side of the sitting Members, Major Gavin and Mr. Russell? The first thing they did was to send for the book-keeper of the candidate in whose cause they were interested, and to instruct him to provide persons who were to resist, if necessary, the violence threatened upon the other side, and to put it down. The assembly of magistrates interested upon that particular side, determine to call upon the book-keeper of the party in whose return they are interested to set about providing a mob for the purpose of protecting them and counteracting the mob upon the other side. That is the conclusion come to by the magistrates and clergymen. And, accordingly, this man, the book-keeper, does proceed upon this duty; and, so far as I can gather, the whole of the next two nights he spent in going through the public-houses of the city, treating the various men in the employment of Messrs. Russell and otherwise, for the purpose of getting them to act for them upon the nomination day; but that is not all; one of those magistrates communicates with two at least of those clergymen; to one of them he gives 100 l. for the purpose of raising men, without even the responsibility that might attach to the agent of the other side if put into such a position as that. It is to that man Crow, who was upon the table, that the instructions were given. He is to provide himself with persons like himself for this peaceable mode of putting an end to what had stricken such terror into the hearts of the clergymen and magistrates. In another case the sum of 150 l. was used similarly, being supplied by a magistrate to a clergyman. For what purpose? It was, as Mr. Conway, another clergyman, said, to get the boys of the town, a specimen of whom we had upon the table in the three witnesses, Skehan, Hayes, and Crow, and accordingly that is done.

Whatever view I may personally take of this transaction, it is another question whether it comes either within treating or intimidation. As to intimidation, I cannot see how the evidence applies in the absence of proof that it was directed against electors, or was organised for that purpose. I have not the evidence of a single elector who was prevented in any way whatever from voting; not a particle of evidence. Then how can I bring it within intimidation under the Act of Parliament? To bring it within the definition of treating is still more difficult, because, whatever I may think of this misguided league, if the purpose really were simply and solely the putting down a mob, how can I treat it as one of the corrupt purposes mentioned in the Act? Supposing I were satisfied that a hot and intemperate partisanship had induced men to be so unscrupulous with regard to the lives and persons of their fellow citizens as to trust the safety of the city to a contact between the mob raised by themselves and the mob which they say was raised by the other parties, even then the case would not be brought within the statute. I wish I could say that this wicked folly would not be properly described as acts of hot intemperate partisanship leading to an unscrupulous disregard of the lives and persons of their fellow citizens.

It is true that no direct or distinct evidence has been given before me of evil results as regards injury to property or injury to life resulting from this which, I repeat again, was a wicked folly. I have heard of one house being wrecked; but there was not a single instance in which direct evidence was given either as to hearsay or as to anything else, that injury was done to person or property by what is called the mob of Tait. But while I admit that there is no direct evidence upon the other side of injury done after this wicked folly was perpetrated, it is impossible that I can shut my eyes to the mode in which gentlemen in the position of magistrates answered questions, hinting at excesses of that kind by drawing a distinction which they have drawn in this case between knowledge and rumour. However, it has failed in satisfying me that this last head has been sustained on behalf of the petitioners.

It will therefore be my duty to certify to the Speaker that the sitting Members are duly elected.

Mr. Coffey applied for costs.

Mr. Baron Fitzgerald stated that, according to Parliamentary practice, he could not give costs unless he were prepared to pronounce the petition frivolous and vexatious, which he was not prepared to do.

LONDONDERRY CITY ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice O'Brien, 9 February 1869.

Londonderry City.

Mr. Justice O'Brien.] At the close of this protracted inquiry, and after having fully and carefully considered the evidence, it is now my duty to state the conclusion at which I have arrived. The petition contains several charges, some of actual bribery and undue influence by Mr. Dowse himself, or with his knowledge and consent, others of bribery by his agents, and others of intimidation. No evidence has been offered in support of the charge of intimidation, and the charges of bribery and undue influence by Mr. Dowse himself, or with his knowledge or consent, were, in the fullest manner, abandoned by petitioner's counsel, both in their opening statement and in their reply. It is, indeed, difficult to imagine conduct more to his honour or credit than that which Mr. Dowse pursued from the beginning of his canvass for the purpose of preventing any bribery or other corrupt practice. The law, however, for obvious reasons of public policy, provides that a candidate shall, so far as the validity of his election is concerned, be answerable for the corrupt practices of his agent, though committed without his knowledge or consent. And I do not concur in the doctrine so strongly urged by Mr. Palles, that, in considering the responsibility of a candidate under the 36th section of the Act of 1854, for the acts of his agent, we are to consider the question of agency as we would in an action for penalties brought against the candidate for the corrupt practices of his agent. That Statute and the Elections Act of last Session, recognise the distinction between the case of acts of bribery committed by the candidate himself, or with his knowledge and consent (which may be called a case of personal bribery), and the case of bribery committed only by the agents of the candidate, but not with his knowledge and consent. In the former case, the acts of bribery not only vitiate the election, but also disqualify the candidate from sitting in Parliament for seven years, and from voting and holding various offices. Whereas, in the latter case, the acts of bribery, besides vitiating the election, only disqualify the candidate from being again returned for the same constituency during the then Parliament. If, then, this question of agency was to be considered upon the principle contended for by Mr. Palles, the obvious intentions of the Legislature would, in my opinion, be defeated. I need not refer to the authorities on the subject, or to the decisions in various trials already held under the recent Act, which have been all uniform in that respect.

In the present case most of the acts of bribery relied upon by the petitioners are alleged to have been committed by Peacock, and the first question which arises respecting them is, whether he was an agent for whose acts Mr. Dowse is to be considered responsible under the Statute; and, in my opinion, he was. It appears to me that this is fully established by the evidence in the case. Mr. Dowse was the adopted candidate of the Liberal Registration Society; he subscribed largely to their funds; and Peacock was appointed by them to conduct the business of the last registration, with a view to the election that was immediately to follow. Mr. Dowse, though not actually a party to Peacock's appointment, subsequently approved of it, and we find that when the revision was completed, the funds and staff of that society, with Peacock as the principal of the staff, were, with Mr. Dowse's assent, used for the purpose of promoting the election, in the same manner as they had been employed for the purposes of the registration, and that various payments, first for the purposes of the revision, and, next, for the purposes of the election, were made by and through the hands of Peacock himself, out of moneys which had been given to him by this registration society. There is also the further fact that the committee of this society directed in a great degree the meetings of the electors, which were convened for the purpose of securing their support for Mr. Dowse; and again, we have the letter of Mr. Dowse to Peacock, which of itself would go far to imply that the relation of principal and agent existed between them. From these circumstances, therefore, I think it follows that Mr. Peacock should be considered as having been the agent of Mr. Dowse for the purposes of the election, so far as to render Mr. Dowse responsible under those two Statutes for any bribery on the part of Mr. Peacock at the election.

I have, however, next to consider a very different question, namely, whether any, and which, of the acts of bribery that are alleged to have been committed were, in fact, committed either by Mr. Peacock or by any other person who should be considered under the Statutes as the agent of Mr. Dowse. And in entering upon this consideration, we should bear in mind that the charge of bribery, whether by a candidate or by his agent, is one which should be established by clear and satisfactory evidence. The consequences resulting from such a charge being established are very serious. In the first place, it avoids the election; and in the recent trial of the Warrington election petition, where the petitioner sought to avoid the election, not certainly on the ground of bribery, but on the ground of some illegality or irregularity in the proceedings, Baron Martin is reported to have stated that he agreed with what had been said by Mr. Justice Willes at

Londonderry.

Lichfield, that before a judge upset an election he ought to be satisfied beyond all doubt that the election was altogether void. In the next place, the 43rd and 45th sections of "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868," imposes further and severe penalties for the offence, whether committed by the candidate or by his agent. Mere suspicion, therefore, will not be sufficient to establish a charge of bribery, and a judge, in discharging the onerous and unpleasant duty imposed upon him by this Statute, acting in the double capacity of judge and juror, should not hold that charge established upon evidence which, in his opinion, would not be sufficient to warrant a jury in finding the charge proved.

In the present case the original bill of particulars contains 51 cases of alleged bribery and undue influence, and with respect to these, no evidence whatever was offered to sustain more than 25 of them. Three more were added by notice served shortly before the trial, and another by an order made by me during the trial, making in all about 55 cases. Mr. Palles opposed the making of that order, but I thought it my duty, under the Act, to afford every facility for investigating the validity of this election. With that view I made orders, whenever they were required by the petitioners' counsel, to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents. Upwards of 60 witnesses have been examined for the petitioners, and the trial has extended to a greater length than I believe that of any other trial which has been had under the recent Statute. I may here observe that no evidence was offered to support any of those four further cases which were added by the notice or under the order for amending the bill of particulars.

With respect to the charges of bribery which were sought to be sustained at the trial, Mr. Hamilton, in his reply for petitioner, abandoned, and, in my opinion, properly abandoned, those as to the alleged bribery of the following six persons, viz.: Richard Ewing, George M'Hugh, Mr. John Reeves, John Temple, Patrick McLinsky, and John O'Niell, as to which, in fact, no evidence of any weight was given. He also abandoned the charge of the alleged bribery of Richard Doherty and George Wallace, on the ground that, though there was evidence to sustain the charge of Thomas Hall having attempted to bribe them, there was no evidence whatever to show that Hall should be considered as an agent of Mr. Dowse. He was not a voter or even a resident of this town, and Mr. Dowse denied all knowledge of him, and also, I need not add, all knowledge of and concurrence in his alleged attempt to bribe. The charges of the alleged bribery of Michael Doherty by Philip M'Intyre, junior, and Richard M'Carter, and of the alleged bribery of Charles Gallaher by Mr. William Young, were also abandoned by Mr. Hamilton. They were sworn to by Mrs. M'Connomy, to whom (according to her statement) it singularly happened that she witnessed in the same house, not only those two acts of bribery by Mr. Dowse's supporters, but also another act of bribery by one of Lord Claud Hamilton's supporters, with respect to a voter of the name of M'Loughlin. They were all sworn to by her; but, in my opinion, the able cross-examination of this witness by Mr. Palles showed that her evidence was utterly unworthy of credit, independent of her being positively contradicted both by Philip M'Intyre, the younger, and Mr. Young. As those charges were abandoned, it is not necessary for me to refer in detail to her evidence, or to say more than that I do not credit her statements as to any one of the acts of bribery to which she swore, either as to those imputed to Mr. Dowse's supporters or as to that imputed to Lord Claud Hamilton's supporter. And I should presume, from those two former charges having been abandoned by the petitioner's counsel, that they entertain the same opinion as I do of this witness's veracity.

The first charge of bribery which is now sought to be sustained upon the evidence, is that of the alleged bribery of Michael Deery by the late Mr. Peacock. Deery voted for Mr. Dowse. He had been employed by Peacock for a month previous to the election at 25 s. a week, to distribute pamphlets connected with the election, for which work a payment of 5*l.* appears to have been made to him in various sums at different times, as sworn to by himself, and as entered in Peacock's account-book, of which the petitioners got possession after Peacock's death. I shall afterwards refer to this payment as coming within another class of charges; but the charge I am now about to consider is of a different character. Deery swore that, within a week before the election, he saw Mr. Peacock; that they were alone, no one else being present; that he then told Mr. Peacock that he (Deery) was getting low; that he heard money was going at the other side, and that he wished to know whether he could get anything to set him up, or to start him in his trade. Deery also swore that Peacock then asked him how much would he require; that Deery replied that less than 15*l.* would be of no use; and that Peacock then said there would be no possibility of doing that before the election, for fear of the bribery oath or test; but that if he (Deery) would vote for Mr. Dowse, and if Mr. Dowse was returned, that he (Peacock) would give him 20*l.*, and would not be tied to 15*l.* Deery further swore that, on the Monday after the election, he had another interview with Peacock (no one else being present), and that he then got from Peacock 1*l.*, which appears to have been the balance due to him out of the 5*l.* which he was to be paid for his work; that he then asked Peacock was that all that he was going to give him, and that Peacock said he was not then prepared "for the other thing." Deery further swore that he met Peacock again in about three days afterwards (no other person being present), and that Peacock then said that "on his word and soul he would pay Deery what he promised." If this evidence be true, it would establish a clear act of bribery by Peacock. But is its truth to be inferred from the evidence? Peacock is dead. No third person was present at those alleged interviews, and Deery cannot therefore be directly contradicted. There is no corroborative evidence of Deery's statements, and the charge rests on his credibility alone. The question then is, whether, having regard to his demeanour on the table, to the character and purport of his evidence, particularly on his cross-examination, and to the conduct he himself has pursued since this alleged promise, he is a witness worthy of credit, and one upon whose evidence alone this serious charge of bribery can be held to have been proved. He swore more than once (as I questioned him again on the matter) that until this trial he made no mention whatever of this circumstance, either to Mr. Hayden (petitioner's solicitor) or to any other person. I do not refer to this for the purpose of considering what communication there may have been between him and Mr. Hayden on the subject. I assume his statement to be true that he made no such communication either to Mr. Hayden or to any other person; but I ask, is it likely, or can it reasonably be supposed, that if such a promise was made by Peacock to a man in Deery's circumstances, a man upon his own evidence wholly devoid of principle, he would not have mentioned that promise, and claimed the performance of it during the interval that elapsed from the election until the present time? He also swore that on the evening before the election he met a person whom he thought was Mr. Baldrick, but whose name he could not tell, though he had known and seen him constantly in this town during the last two years, and had dealt with the establishment in which that person was a clerk. And he stated that this person told him on that evening that there was money going, and that if he (Deery) would come up in the morning, he (this unknown person) would try and get him 25*l.* to vote for Lord Claud (being 5*l.* more than Peacock's conditional offer), and that he (Deery) would be a fool if he did not take something. Deery also swears that he voted for Mr. Dowse on account of Peacock's promise; but he also states that he would have taken the 25*l.* to vote for Lord Claud, if he had got it, and that he told this unknown person he would do so. But he says that he did not rely upon that promise, though he would have us to believe that he relied upon Peacock's promise, and though he did not go back in the morning to ascertain whether that unknown person would get him the money. Deery also, after repeated evasions on his cross-examination, had to admit the purport of a conversation which he had with Mr. McLoughlin (Mr. Dowse's counsel), at the railway station. Deery asked Mr. McLoughlin on that occasion for money to drink, and boasted that he could have got 25*l.* for voting for Lord Claud Hamilton. His application for drink was refused. He then said nothing, however, of Peacock's promise, though he made a merit of having refused the offer of Lord Claud's agent, and boasted that he voted for principle, and got nothing for it. Can it reasonably be supposed that if Peacock's promise had been made he would not have then put it forward, or that he was prevented from doing so by principle or delicacy of feeling, or by any other reason than that the promise never was made, and that the idea of fabricating it did not occur to him, while Peacock was alive to disprove it. Deery further states that he afterwards applied to Mr. Reid (Mr. Dowse's conducting agent) for money to pay some street men who were teasing him for it, and also to compensate himself for his own loss of time, and that though Mr. Reid positively refused to give him any money, he did not then make any claim in respect of Peacock's promise, or even mention it to Mr. Reid. He admitted, upon his cross-examination, that his statement of having voted on principle was untrue, though he confirmed that statement by the asseveration, "So help his God"; and he seeks to explain his having done so by stating that he was not upon his oath, though he called God's name to witness the truth of his assertion; and that indeed "when he had liquor in him he told lies as fast as truth." I need not refer to his statement about that unknown person having previously, on other occasions, offered him money to vote for Lord Claud. I do not enter into the consideration whether any such offer was made, and I shall only refer on this matter to the evidence of Mrs. Monagle, who stated (what Deery did not deny) that he had expressed his regret to her that he had not taken Lord Claud's money. I think what I have already stated is sufficient to show that his evidence as to Peacock's alleged promise is unworthy of credit, and that no jury should find a charge proved upon such testimony. Mr. Hamilton, indeed, relied on the entries in Peacock's books as corroborating Deery's evidence; but those entries relate only to the payment of the 5*l.*, and in no respect sustain Deery's evidence as to Peacock's alleged promise of 20*l.* In my opinion, therefore, this charge has not been sustained.

We now come to a case of a different character, namely, that of Henry Hamill, who is alleged to have been bribed by the payment of 6*l.*, made to him by Mr. Peacock. Hamill was a ship carpenter, engaged to go a voyage in a ship called the "Stadancona," which sailed some weeks previous to the election. Mr. Hamilton was right in saying that the dates in this transaction were not very accurately proved. It appears, however, that Hamill got what is called an advance note from the captain of the ship some days before the ship was to sail; that the amount of that note was 5*l.* 15*s.*; and that he raised, through his wife, some money on it (he thought about 4*l.*) from McNulty, a pawnbroker. Hamill swore that in a few days afterwards he changed his intention of sailing in that ship, in consequence of Mr. McClellan (the agent of Messrs. Cook, who were the landlords of the house in which he lived) using some threats about putting his wife and children out of the house; and that he redeemed the advance note by paying himself to Mr. McNulty the amount advanced on it. The alleged act of bribery is that Hamill got from Peacock the 6*l.* for the purpose of redeeming that note in order to enable him to stay and vote for Mr. Dowse, and that he repaid McNulty out of it. This is, however, positively denied by Hamill. He swears that when he changed his intention about sailing he went to the captain of the ship and told him, in the presence of a clerk of Mr. McCorkell, the owner of the vessel, why he was going to leave the ship, and gave him back the advance note. Hamill described the clerk, and pointed out a gentleman in court who knew the clerk, and he said he believed the clerk was still in this town. Hamill was interrogated minutely as to the dates; the amount received from McNulty; and other matters. He said he could not tell the exact dates; but it is clear that the money must have been repaid to McNulty within a few days after Hamill had got it from McNulty, and within a short time before the ship sailed; and it is to be observed that Hamill's evidence as to the real cause of his not sailing in the ship, and as to his having told the captain what that cause was, might, if it was untrue, have been contradicted by the production either of Mr. McClellan, the agent, or of the clerk, who was present when Hamill told the captain the cause of his not sailing in the ship. Hamill further swore positively that he had never spoken to Peacock, or received any money from him, and when he was shown the entry in Peacock's book, on which petitioner's counsel so much relied, namely, "H. Hammill 6 £," he positively denied that he ever got that sum, or any part of it, and from Hamill's demeanour, and the manner in which he gave his evidence, I see no reason for supposing that he swore falsely in making that denial.

The case of petitioner's counsel is, as I have already stated, that the 6 £. was given by Peacock to Hamill before the vessel sailed; and that Hamill, out of that money, redeemed the note and paid McNulty the amount which he had advanced upon it. Hamill underwent a very long and minute examination, and he stated in one part of his evidence that when McNulty paid the 4 £. he (Hamill) gave it to his wife for the purpose of getting an outfit; and in another part of his evidence he stated that he gave it to her for support during his absence; and when he was asked afterwards what outfit was procured for him out of the 4 £., he stated that the only articles were "a shirt and pair of pants." I do not think that this inconsistency in his evidence as to the application of the 4 £. he got from McNulty is material, because the balance which his wife had, after procuring that trifling outfit, would naturally have gone towards the support of her and her children during his absence. This balance (as he did not sail in the ship) would have been nearly sufficient to enable him to repay McNulty, and any wages that he earned would have been also available for that purpose. And this would account for his being able to repay McNulty without getting the money from Peacock or any other person, and would explain his statement that he paid McNulty by means of his labour.

What, then, is the evidence of the payment of this 6 £. by Peacock to Hamill? It rests solely upon that entry in Peacock's book which is contained in a separate page at the end of the book, wholly distinct from the entries of cash payments in other pages, and is not marked as "paid."

According to the evidence, this money, if paid by Peacock to Hamill, must have been paid some weeks before the election, and it is not likely that a man in Peacock's circumstances would have paid the money, without getting it repaid in that interval, or afterwards, by some of those for whom he acted? This book contains, in other pages, entries of cash payments down to the 21st of November 1868, which are initialled by Mr. O'Neill, the treasurer of the Liberal Registration Society, as having been paid; but, as I have already stated, this particular entry is not marked "paid," and no receipt, voucher, or document, showing that payment, is produced from Peacock's papers, to which petitioner had access.

If Peacock paid this sum, it must have been out of his own money, as there is no ground on the evidence for supposing that he had any other money out of which he could pay it. The account book of the Registration Society has been produced and examined, and shows that their funds were otherwise applied; and both Mr. Dowse and his agent, Mr. Reid, are expressly exonerated from any participation in this transaction. Peacock, then, would of course have expected to be repaid this sum by some of those for whom he acted, and would naturally have got from Hamill some acknowledgment or voucher to sustain his claim for such repayment; but although the petitioner's solicitors have had access to the papers left by Peacock; and, although from the evidence of Mr. Neilson, it appears that Mrs. Peacock showed them all the documents and papers of Peacock's which she had that were connected with this election, yet no document or entry is found showing that this sum was in fact paid.

With respect to petitioner's solicitors having got those documents or papers from Mrs. Peacock for 50 £., I do not think it necessary to make any observation upon the circumstances under which they were got. In point of law, she had a right to give them.

So far, the result of the evidence is that on the one hand we have the positive denial of Hamill, that he ever was paid this money, or ever had any dealing or communication with Peacock; and, on the other hand, we have this entry in Peacock's book referring to that sum, but not stating it to be paid; an entry which, if Peacock was alive, might be explained. It may be that Peacock subsequently heard of Hamill having given back the advance note, and thought it was a hard case upon Hamill not to be indemnified for such loss; and that he made that entry with a view to further consideration. But however difficult it may be to give any satisfactory explanation of that entry, I am clearly of opinion that, considering this question upon the ordinary and settled rules of evidence, I cannot come to the conclusion that the fact of this payment, so positively denied by Hamill, is proved by an entry which, though it refers to the money, does not even purport to state that it was paid.

•• I have

I have now, however, to refer to a matter connected with Hammill's case, which transpired on the examination of Mr. Dunne, who had acted for Mr. Dowse at the election. Mr. Dunne, in his evidence, positively stated that he had not known Hammill, and had never seen him until this trial. He was then asked by the petitioner's counsel whether he had ever told anyone that he saw Hammill receive the money from Peacock. He at first positively denied having said any such thing, but when he was further pressed, and when counsel mentioned the names of the gentlemen to whom it was alleged that Dunne made such statement, he withdrew from his former denial, and said, that if they swore he had made such statement, he would not deny it, though he had no recollection of having said it; Mr. Christie (one of the petitioners) and Mr. Morris were examined as to Mr. Dunne's conversation with them at an hotel on the night of last Saturday week, the day after Hammill was examined on this trial, and though there was this difference in the evidence of these two gentlemen, namely, that Mr. Christie said he heard Mr. Dunne state that he saw the money paid, whereas Mr. Morris said he heard Dunne state that the money was paid by Peacock to Hammill, but that he did not understand Dunne as saying that he saw it paid; still there is a manifest and material contradiction between the verbal statement of Mr. Dunne to those gentlemen and his sworn evidence upon the table. I do not profess, nor is it necessary for me to attempt to account for Mr. Dunne's inexplicable conduct and for the glaring discrepancy between his sworn evidence and his previous statement, or to consider the suggestion of Mr. Pales, that it may be accounted for by Mr. Dunne's having been at a late hour of night drinking at an hotel. But I have to consider how far this matter affects the charge in this case of Hammill's, and I shall make some observations (applicable also to another of the cases before me), as to the effect of previous statements made by a witness, which are inconsistent with his sworn evidence. If a witness swear upon a trial that he saw a previous transaction, and if it appear that previously to the trial he had stated that he never saw it, I need not say that such previous statement, if unexplained, would materially derogate from the weight of his sworn evidence or from the credit which would otherwise be attached to it. But if the witness deny upon his oath that such a transaction ever did take place, can it be held that the proof of a previous contrary statement, not made upon oath, should be considered as proving that transaction, or even as any evidence of it? Such a doctrine would, in my opinion, be at variance with the legal and settled principles of evidence. The previous statement of a witness when not under the sanction of an oath, may, under certain circumstances, induce the court to consider him unworthy of credit when sworn, but cannot be relied upon as a proof against another party of a fact which that witness has denied upon his oath. Suppose the sworn evidence of that witness struck out, what then would remain but his verbal statement, which is no evidence against another party. It would be clearly inconsistent to adopt as against another party the previous unsworn statement of a witness who is deemed unworthy of credit, when he denies upon his oath what he had admitted by such previous statements; I cannot therefore consider that Mr. Dunne's previous statement to Messrs. Christie and Morris is evidence of the fact of his having seen the payment made by Peacock to Hammill or of the fact of such payment having been made, when Mr. Dunne swore so positively, on his examination here, that he had never seen that money paid, and had ever known or seen Hammill until this trial.

The next charge to which I will refer is that of the alleged bribery of George Paris, which is stated in the Bill of Particulars to have been committed by Mr. Hempton, Philip McIntyre, and James Harper. It does not appear on the evidence that Philip McIntyre or Harper had any connexion whatever with the matter. The case made by petitioner's counsel is, that the bribery was committed by Mr. Hempton and by Peacock, whose name is not mentioned in the Bill of Particulars in connexion with this charge, but I shall consider the case as if Peacock's name had been so mentioned. It appears that about three weeks before the election, Paris got 10 s. for his loss of time at the revision of the registry in September. I shall defer considering that ground of objection until I come to deal with other similar cases. But the charge of bribery I am now considering is, that he was induced to vote for Mr. Dowse by Peacock's promise to protect him from any proceedings for Mr. Todd's rent. Mr. Todd was the landlord of Paris, and a supporter of Mr. Dowse. Mr. McGee was the agent of Mr. Todd, and a supporter of Lord Claud; Paris had been pressed for his rent by Mr. McGee, and Paris states that accordingly about three weeks before the election, he went to Peacock, and told him he had been so pressed, and that Peacock told him to this effect, that he was sure Mr. Todd would not press him, and that he, Paris, should go to Mr. Todd. Paris further states that he then went to Mr. Todd, that Mr. Todd referred him to the agent, Mr. McGee; that Mr. McGee said he would take security; that he then went back to Mr. Todd, who sent a message to McGee, the result of which was, that McGee expressed his willingness to take the rent by weekly instalments. Now, if those facts were all that occurred, there would clearly have been no bribery on the part of Peacock. It was natural and right that when Paris told him he was pressed for his rent, that Peacock should tell him to go to his landlord, who was a Liberal, and that he would not press him for it. But what is alleged by petitioner is, that Peacock, in order to induce Paris to vote for Mr. Dowse, had given him a promise or undertaking to protect him from Mr. Todd's claim for rent, and of course if any such promise or offer attended with pecuniary advantages, or the relief of pecuniary pressure, was made to Paris, for the purpose of inducing him to vote, it would be an act of bribery. But how is it proved that Mr. Peacock gave such a promise or undertaking? Paris, on his oath, denies that such a promise or undertaking was made or given to him by Peacock, or that Peacock said more on the matter than what I have stated. Paris was then, however, examined as to an interview he had with Mr. Hempton after the election, when he went to inquire where Peacock was; and certainly his evidence as to it was by no means satisfactory. It was a long time before it could be extorted from him that he mentioned anything to Mr. Hempton about his being processed for rent. He accounts for his going to inquire for Mr. Peacock by saying, that he wanted a prescription which Peacock promised him; but after being much pressed by petitioner's counsel, he admitted at length that when he was going away from Hempton he showed Hempton the process with which he had been sued for his rent due to Todd. Mr. Hempton also was examined, and stated at first that Paris did not in that interview tell him that Peacock had promised to protect him from the rent; but a letter was then put into Mr. Hempton's hands, written by him to Peacock on the day of that interview, in which is the following passage: "George Paris is here, claiming protection from his former landlord Tod, that you undertook, as I presume I shall be told more about it." That letter certainly shows that Mr. Hempton's recollection as to Paris's conversation with him was not accurate, and that Paris did make the statement mentioned in that letter. But even so, how does the case stand, and does it not fall within the principle I have already laid down as to those cases in which witnesses called to prove a fact which they deny upon their oath, are proved to have previously made contradictory statements in which they admitted that fact? Paris swears, on the trial, that no such promise or undertaking was given to him by Peacock. It appears, however, that he had told Hempton, in that interview, that Peacock had undertaken to protect him. He of course made that statement to gain a benefit to himself, and to be protected or indemnified against the process, and though his making it untruly was highly unscrupulous and dishonest on his part, it cannot be relied on as establishing the fact which is positively denied by him on his oath.

Before I pass from this case of Paris, it is right to express my full concurrence with Mr. Hamilton that no credit is to be attached to Paris's evidence of what passed in his interview with Lord Claud Hamilton. Paris's statement, on the face of it, is highly improbable; and even if it was not contradicted, as it has been by Lord Claud, no reflecting person would believe that a nobleman in Lord Claud's position would make such a proposal or suggestion as sworn to by Paris. But this contradiction of Paris's evidence as to his interview with Lord Claud, does not certainly afford any reason for believing in the truth of the statement which he made to Mr. Hempton—a statement which, as I have already observed, it was so much his interest to make. For these reasons, therefore, I am of opinion that this charge of the bribery of Paris is not sustained.

The next charge to which I shall refer is that of the alleged bribery of Felix McCloskey, the circumstances of which are certainly very singular in their character. It appears that McCloskey had been arrested the evening before the polling-day under a civil bill decree for about 12¹/₂, at the suit of Mr. Ramsay, a supporter of Lord Claud Hamilton, and that about half-past two or three o'clock on the polling-day Philip McIntyre, senior, and Mr. Hanna went to the gaol, and, after some conversation with McCloskey, paid the amount of the decree, got McCloskey discharged, brought him to the court-house, where he voted for Mr. Dowse. This, therefore, was done openly, and at a period when, according to the evidence, the election was virtually decided in Mr. Dowse's favour, as he had then a majority which could not be got over. It was not only done openly, but it was done in the presence and through the instrumentality of Mr. Wilson and Mr. Mooney, the authorities of the gaol, by whom McCloskey was discharged, and one of whom, at all events, was avowedly opposed to Mr. Dowse. I do not, of course, use the word instrumentality to impute to those two persons any participation in the alleged bribery, but of course they must have known for what purpose all this was done; and, indeed, Mr. Mooney states that soon after McIntyre, Hanna, and McCloskey had left the gaol, he followed them to the court-house, where the polling was going on, and which was not far from the gaol, and saw them returning from it, and that Hanna said, "they had made it all right." I need not go further into the facts of this cause, because I have no doubt that upon the evidence before me, unexplained, this should be deemed an act of bribery on the part of McIntyre and Hanna. The facts of this case are essentially different from those of the Ashburton case (reported in Wolf, and B. 2, p. 1), and which is referred to in Rogers "On Elections," p. 348. And I would not regard that case as establishing the rule, that money paid to get a voter out of prison, in order to "enable" him to vote, should not, under the circumstances of this case, be considered as money paid to "induce" him to vote, and as therefore being an act of bribery. Every case must, of course, be governed by its own peculiar circumstances; but if any such general principle was laid down, it would go far to afford a cloak for bribery, and the means of evading its penalties. The next question, however, is whether either Philip McIntyre, senior, or Hanna, was the agent of Mr. Dowse, so as to render him responsible for this act of theirs. With respect to Hanna, there is no evidence at all to show who he was, or to show any connection between him and Mr. Dowse. With respect to Philip McIntyre, senior, however, evidence has been given that he attended some meetings and spoke at them (I shall presently refer to one meeting in particular); and with respect to his having canvassed for Mr. Dowse, the only evidence to establish his agency on that ground was that of James Lowrie, who voted for Lord Claud Hamilton. He states in his evidence, that on the second occasion of Mr. Dowse canvassing him, which appears to have been about the 5th of September, he (Mr. Dowse) was accompanied by Mr. Dunne and Philip McIntyre, senior, that they were going to pass Lowrie's house, when McIntyre said to Mr. Dowse, "You will have to see Lowrie"; that they then went in at Lowrie's gate, and that after some conversation between Lowrie and Mr. Dowse (which implied that Lowrie did not intend to vote for him), Philip McIntyre said he thought it would be all right. There is not any other evidence in the case of any canvass by this Philip McIntyre in the presence of Mr. Dowse; and with respect to this transaction, Mr. Dowse stated on his examination that on the occasion of his second visit to the waterside (viz. about the 5th of September), he had gone there with Mr. Dunne and Mr. Thomas White for the purpose of canvassing, that about 100 people joined him there, that Philip McIntyre, senior, whom Mr. Dowse had not previously known even by name, came up and asked him how he was; that Mr. White said, "Mr. Dowse, this is one of your supporters"; that Mr. Dowse replied, "Very well, I am glad to see you"; that Mr. Dowse then proceeded through the street, followed by about 100 men, women and children, and went into a house, which it appears was Lowrie's, that he asked Lowrie for his vote, and that while they were speaking on the subject, Mr. Dowse heard a voice say behind him, "Oh, he is sure to support you" (which is much the same as what Lowrie stated). Mr. Dowse further swore that on turning round he found the voice which he heard was that of Philip McIntyre, senior, and that until then he did not even know that McIntyre was with him, or accompanied him to the house. He further states that he never authorised McIntyre to go with him or to canvass, and that after leaving Lowrie's house he saw a crowd still following him, with McIntyre among them; that he then had some conversation with Messrs. White and Dunne, and immediately afterwards asked McIntyre to leave some document for him in Foyle-street rooms, and that accordingly McIntyre went away to do so. It is true that Mr. Dowse made him his messenger on that occasion, but it is clear (as held by Mr. Justices Willes in the Windsor case) that the employment of a man as messenger is not sufficient to constitute him an agent. Mr. Dowse further states that, in about an hour afterwards, he returned to the same place, and found Philip McIntyre there, who told him he had left that document in Foyle-street; that Mr. Dowse again spoke with Messrs. White and Dunne, and that in consequence of what he was told by those two gentlemen he immediately went down to another house, and drove away on a car with Messrs. White and Dunne, leaving McIntyre behind him. Mr. Dowse was asked by his counsel, on examination, to state the purport of his conversation with Messrs. White and Dunne, but the petitioner's counsel objected to the question, and I ruled that the evidence of this conversation was not admissible. But whatever was the conversation between them, it is manifest that in consequence of it Mr. Dowse was desirous to get rid of McIntyre; and he states that he did everything in his power to get him away, as he did not (to use Mr. Dowse's own expression) "want any one to be foisted on him." He further states, that the occasion of this visit to Lowrie was the only one on which McIntyre was even with him on his canvass; that he never authorised McIntyre to canvass for him, and that he did not believe that he did canvass. Mr. Dowse also explained what passed at the public meeting on the 25th of October at Mr. White's stores, at which McIntyre spoke, and seconded one of a set of resolutions that were passed. He states that when the resolution was moved some one in the crowd addressed McIntyre by the name of "Phil," and called out to him to speak; that McIntyre then got up to speak, and second the resolution, but that there was no previous arrangement as to his doing so. It was proved by other witnesses that McIntyre spoke at other meetings in support of Mr. Dowse; but it appears to me that on the entire evidence there is no ground for holding that McIntyre was the agent of Mr. Dowse, so as to render Mr. Dowse responsible for his conduct in this transaction as to McCloskey.

With respect to this question of agency, petitioner's counsel referred to the Norwich Petition case (19th Law Times, 618), in which Baron Martin made use of the expression, that "Hardiment's agency is proved to the hilt." But the circumstances of that case are essentially different from those of the present. Hardiment had been seen distributing money on the polling day to a considerable amount, and it appeared that previous to that day, he and Mr. Stracey and the sitting Member's son had been, with others, appointed as canvassers; and that he and Mr. Stracey canvassed together on one day, having gone out together from the committee-room, and that Hardiment, with others, canvassed on another day, and there was upon the evidence no doubt but that Hardiment had been appointed one of the regular canvassers with the knowledge and consent of Sir H. Stracey, the sitting Member. The decision in that case does not therefore apply to the present. The Windsor case, (19th Law Times, 613) has also been referred to. Mr. Justice Willes does in that case lay down the general proposition that every person who canvassed for a candidate is to be considered as an agent; but he expresses his opinion on the subject in those accurate terms for which he is remarkable, and says, I have already stated that authority to canvass, (and I purposely used the "word authority, and not employment," because I meant the observation to apply to persons authorised to canvass, whether paid or not for their services) would, in my opinion, constitute an agent, and that authority for the general management of an election, would involve an authority to canvass." There is no evidence of any such authority here from Mr. Dowse. He swears he never did give such authority, and what took place on the day of his canvassing, Lowrie would so far negative the existence of any such authority, express or implied. With regard to implied authority, it is to be observed, that McIntyre was not even a member of the Liberal Registration Society, by whom Mr. Dowse had been adopted as candidate; I cannot concur in the opinion, that any supporter of a candidate who chooses to ask others for their votes, and to make speeches in his favour, can force himself upon the candidate as an agent, or that a candidate should be held responsible for the acts of one from whom, as in this case, he actually endeavoured to disassociate himself. No candidate would be safe, if agency was to be established by the facts of the present case. On these grounds, therefore, I am clearly of opinion, that the agency of McIntyre for Mr. Dowse has not been established, and that accordingly the charge as to M'Closkey's case also fails.

The next class of objections to which I shall refer is that relating to the employment of cars. It is not contended that Mr. Dowse, or his agents, violated the provisions of the 12th section of the Irish Representation Act of last Session, (31 & 32 Vict., c. 49), by paying money on account of cars for the conveyance of voters to the poll, which payment though illegal, would not, of itself, vitiate the election, and it does not indeed appear in the evidence that any such money was paid by Mr. Dowse or his agents for the conveyance of voters. But the allegation is, that various sums were paid by Peacock, or some other person on behalf of Mr. Dowse, to several voters, who were car-owners, that such sums were paid nominally on account of the hire of their cars, but really with the intention of inducing such voters to vote for Mr. Dowse; that such sums exceeded the reasonable charge for the cars, and that such payments were accordingly acts of bribery. The three cases relied on under this head are those of John M'Ivor, Henry Perry, and William Carlin, all of whom voted for Mr. Dowse. With regard to John M'Ivor, he swore that his car at the election was used by him voluntarily, without pay or promise, and in this he was not in any way contradicted; he further stated, however, that he had been employed at the revision for Lord Claud Hamilton, and did not get 3 l. 15 s., or any sum from Perry, who had been employed to hire cars at the revision for the Liberal Registration Society. In this latter statement, however, he is contradicted by Perry, who said that M'Ivor made some mistake about it, and that he, Perry, paid M'Ivor for the Liberal Registration Society, 3 l. 15 s. for his car, at the revision, and Perry produced M'Ivor's receipt to that effect. If that payment of 3 l. 15 s. was excessive, and was made to influence M'Ivor's vote, then, of course, that would be some foundation for the charge of bribery; but it appears that M'Ivor's car was, in fact, used for six days at the revision, and that the rate charged was 10 s. a-day for the car, and 2 s. 6 d. for the driver (which, for six days made up the sum that he got), and that such rate did not exceed the usual rate of charge, and had, in fact, been refused by some car-owners as not sufficient. I do not, therefore, think that is any foundation for this charge of bribery, notwithstanding the manifestly erroneous statement of M'Ivor, that he had not been employed at the revision for the Registration Society, or paid by Perry.

With respect to the charge of the bribery of Perry, he states that he had five cars of his own, which were employed by the Liberal Registration Society at the revision, and that they also employed him to hire a number of other cars, for the revision, and that he did so, and that his charge for all those cars amounted to 75 l., being at the same rate of 10 s. a-day, for the car, and 2 s. 6 d. for the driver, which, as already stated, was a reasonable charge, and that the cars charged for were actually employed, and that part of the 75 l. was still due to him. He also states, that at the election, his own five cars, and several others which he hired, were employed by several gentlemen, whose names he mentioned, for their own use, and for which they were to pay at the rate of one pound for the car, and five shillings for the driver, which had been at several previous elections, at the usual rate of charges for the day of election. It further appears, that Perry had promised Mr. Dowse before the revision to vote for him, and Perry swears that the employment of his cars at the election or revision had nothing to do with his promise or vote.

With respect to the case of Carlin, he swears that his car was engaged at the election by William McMonagle, (whom I shall presently refer to), that he got 1 l. 5 s. for it, and also that the car had previously been employed at the revision by Perry for six days, and that he got 3 l. 15 s. for it. It also appears that he had promised Mr. Dowse in July, long before the revision or election, and he swears that his promise had nothing to do with the employment for his cars, and that he had never expected to get anything for his vote. On these facts I am of opinion, that there is not, either in this case or in that of Perry's, any foundation for the charge of bribery. Both these had promised Mr. Dowse long before their cars were employed; their cars were actually employed and used, and were paid for at the usual rate, and they both swear that the employment of their cars had nothing to do with their votes or promise. I may here refer to the evidence of William McMonagle (though he is not a voter). Carlin was hired by him; he states that he had two cars which were his own, and did not belong to his father, who was a voter, that those two cars of his were employed by Mr. Young on his own account on the day of the election, and that Mr. Young paid him for them, and told him not to drive any voters. McMonagle further states that Mr. Young also told him to engage several other cars for that day, but not to engage the cars of any voters, and that he (McMonagle) accordingly ordered sixteen or eighteen cars, and at the desire of petitioner's counsels, he produced a list of the men whose cars he hired, on which list nothing is to be observed, except that two or three of the carmen were voters. But no question was raised by petitioner's counsel as to them.

The remaining cases of alleged bribery are those in which various sums of money were paid to voters for loss of time at the revision in September, and also to voters who were employed either for purposes connected with the election, or with the revision, for which they were employed for the Registration Society, and all which sums, it is alleged, exceeds in amount what was a fair, reasonable remuneration for their services, and were in fact paid for the purpose of inducing those voters to support Mr. Dowse. All those payments appear to have been made by Peacock, or by other persons by his directions, and it was admitted by counsel on both sides that the revision commenced on the 25th of September, and lasted for five or six days, till early in October. The payments for loss of time at the revision were 10s. to George Paris, which I have already mentioned, 1*l.* to Patrick Connen, and 10s. to John Devine, making altogether 2*l.*; and the payments for employments which were made to the voters as to whom bribery is charged were 4*l.* 15s. to Mr. Bernadotte Little, 4*l.* to John Quirk, 12*l.* 5s. to John Devlin, 2s. 7s. to Richard Griffiths, of which 7s. were for loss of time, 1*l.* 13s. 6*d.* to John Brown, 3*l.* 12s. 6*d.* to Andrew McLoughlen, and 5*l.*, already mentioned, to Deery; all said sums, together with the 2*l.* for loss of time, make together 35*l.* 13s. Mr. Hamilton has charged these payments to be the result of an organized and extensive system of corruption upon the part of Peacock; well, and I refer to the amount of these sums not merely as showing that so far as the amount is concerned it affords no foundation for the charge of any extensive corruption, but also for the purpose of observing that although in Peacock's book, which has been so much relied on, and which I have carefully examined, there are about 250 entries of payments by Peacock, and although petitioners had access to all Peacock's books and papers which would show any further payments, yet the payments I have mentioned are the only payments relied on as the foundation of the charge of bribery or of any corrupt practice.

I have to observe, with respect to the payments made to voters employed for Mr. Dowse for election purposes, as clerks, messengers, etc., and who voted for Mr. Dowse, that under the 8th section of the Representation Act of last Session, (31st and 32 Victoria cap. 49) such voters were guilty of a misdemeanor, and that upon a scrutiny their votes would have been struck off. That section, however, is not and could not be relied on in this case as of itself rendering the election void, but it is contended that those payments, and also the payments for loss of time at the revision court, were corruptly made; that they were excessive in amount, having regard to the services performed; and that they were made with the corrupt intention of inducing these men to vote for Mr. Dowse. With respect to payments for loss of time at the revision, the first I shall refer to is that of 10s. to George Paris. He swore that he lost four days at the revision, for which he only got that sum, which he complained of as too little, and it appears, both by his evidence and that of Mr. Dowse, that he had before the revision promised Mr. Dowse to vote for him.

The next case is that of Patrick Cannen who got 1*l.* for loss of time for four days at the revision; he swore that he voted for Mr. Dowse on principle, that he would have given him fifty votes if he had them, and that he would have voted for him without any compensation; that he was a carter and often got more than 5s. a day with his horse and car; Mr. Dowse stated also that Patrick Cannen had promised him his vote long before the revision.

The next case is that of John Devine, who got 10s. for loss of time at the revision; he swore that his principles were those of Mr. Dowse; that he promised to vote for him on that account alone; that his promise had nothing to do with the payment of that money, and that he would have voted for Mr. Dowse if he had got nothing for his loss of time; and Mr. Dowse states that Devine had promised him upon the occasion of his second visit to the Waterside, which was on the 5th of September, some weeks before the revision.

As regards the payments of 5*l.* to Mr. Deery, I do not think that sum exceeded a fair remuneration for his services, or that he was employed in order to influence his vote. Mr. Dowse states that after July last, and some months before the employment, Deery had positively promised to vote for him.

The next case is that of Bernadotte Little, who acted as a clerk at a salary of 30s. a week at the Liberal registration rooms from the first of November till after the election. For that he got a sum of 4*l.* 15s., which, considering his position and the nature of his employment, cannot be regarded as excessive. Mr. Dowse states that Little promised him his vote in July, and Little swore that he never changed his intention of voting for him, and that his employment had nothing to do with his vote.

The next case is that of John Quirk, who was paid 4*l.* for being in charge of the Registration Society's rooms in Foyle-street for one week, and at their rooms at the Waterside for three weeks. He was employed in the end of October and in November, and it appeared from Mr. Dowse's evidence that Quirk had promised to vote for him so far back as the 5th of September. Quirk stated on his examination that he was formerly on the staff of the Derry Militia, and was discharged from it last August, and that in November, when he was in charge of the registration rooms, he was asked by Captain Butler, the Adjutant of the militia, whom he would vote for, and that he replied that he did not know yet, and that he was not then decided whom he would vote for. He also stated that he did not tell Captain Butler he would vote for whoever gave him employment. He further stated that long previously to that interview and to his employment, he had made up his mind to vote for Mr. Dowse, and that his voting was altogether irrespective of his employment. Captain Butler was then examined, and he stated that about a week before the election he asked Quirk whom he would vote for, and that Quirk replied he would vote for whoever gave him employment. There is therefore a contradiction between Captain Butler and Quirk as to what passed at that conversation; but it is clear that whatever Quirk may have then told Captain Butler, who had been his adjutant, he had previously promised to vote for Mr. Dowse.

The next case is that of John Devlin, who was employed by Peacock as a clerk, as Mr. Little was, and at the same salary of 30 s. a week, at the Liberal Association rooms, from before the revision till after the election. He was paid altogether the sum of 12 l. 5 s.; but it appears that for some weeks he was paid for each week only broken sums, viz., 25 s. in one, 10 s. in another, and 20 s. for another week, showing he was only paid as he worked. These payments were certainly not excessive, and Devlin swore that he voted according to his principles; and that his employment had nothing to do with his vote; that he had promised Mr. Dowse long before he thought of being employed. Mr. Dowse also states that Devlin first promised him his vote in July, and afterwards again in September. Devlin also stated that, shortly before he was so employed as clerk, he had been in the employment of Messrs. Chrystal, who paid him 1 l. per week, and a per-centage on his collections, which together exceeded what he got from Peacock.

The next case is that of Richard Griffith, who promised Mr. Dowse about the 6th of September to vote for him; he got 7 s. from Peacock soon after the revision for his loss of time there for some days, and he afterwards got two payments of 1 l. each for having been employed for two weeks before the election in watching and looking after voters. He swore that his employment or payment had nothing to do with his vote; that he voted according to his principles, and was determined to vote for Mr. Dowse long previous to his employment; and Mr. Dowse states that in July Griffith told him he would not be against him; and that afterwards, about the 6th of September, Griffith told him he would vote for him.

The next case is that of John Brown, who was employed by Peacock as a messenger for several days immediately preceding the election, at the rate of 3 s. 6 d. a day (which I do not think excessive), and got 1 l. 13 s. 6 d.

He states that he was determined, long previously thereto, to vote for Mr. Dowse; that money had nothing to do with his vote, and that he would not on any account have voted for Lord Claud Hamilton. Mr. Dowse states that Brown promised his vote first in July, and afterwards early in September, on the occasion of his second visit to Water-side.

The last case I have to consider is that of Andrew McLaughlin, who was paid altogether 3 l. 12 s. 6 d., being at the rate of 1 l. per week. He had been employed to watch voters for about three weeks before the election, and had lost some time at the revision court. It appears that in July, when he was first canvassed by Mr. Dowse, he only promised not to vote against him, but that about six weeks before the election, when Mr. Dowse canvassed him again, he positively promised to vote for him; and McLaughlin also swore that he had intended from the very first to vote for Mr. Dowse, and that his principles agreed with those of Mr. Dowse. This is the last case of these payments which are alleged to have been made corruptly, as being only nominally for work, but as exceeding in amount the value of the work, and as made with a corrupt purpose. In considering these several cases, I cannot lose sight of the fact, that all of these men had originally in positive terms, and long previous to their respective employments, expressed their intention to vote for Mr. Dowse; that their political opinions agreed with his, and that there can be no doubt but that their natural feelings and inclinations, without any influence whatever, would have induced them to give him their support. In the course of the last week, upon the trial, before Baron Martin, of the second Bradford petition (as reported in the "Times" newspaper of the 3rd inst.), some cases of giving refreshments to voters were proved and relied on as acts of treating under the 4th section of the Corrupt Practices Act of 1854. It appeared that some of the refreshments given were partaken of by electors who voted for Mr. Forster, the sitting Member, and for Mr. Miall, and who had previously promised them their votes; and Baron Martin, in stating why he did not think that the giving of refreshments to those voters came within the 4th section is reported to have said: "They were not given in this case in order to be elected, because it was already known which way the men who had votes would vote; they were voters who had declared their intention to support Messrs. Forster and Miall."

I think that these observations of Baron Martin bear upon the cases I am now considering. In order that a gift or promise of any money or employment to a voter should be held to be bribery within the meaning of the 2nd section of the Corrupt Practices Act of 1854, the Statute requires that such gift or promise should be given in order to induce such voter "to vote," or "refrain from voting," or "on account of any voter having voted, or refrained from voting." The men alleged to be bribed by the foregoing employments and payments had long previously promised to vote for Mr. Dowse; their political opinions and feelings agreed with his; and (as I have already stated) I see no reason to doubt that they would have voted for him whether or not they had been so employed or paid; considering, then, that the charge of bribery is one which requires to be satisfactorily proved, I cannot, sitting here as a juror, come to the conclusion that any of those promises, or employments, or payments to which I have referred, were made or given for any of the objects or purposes which are prohibited by that 2nd section, or which would render them acts of bribery. There is, however, a matter to which I have to refer, not connected with the Report that I shall make to the Speaker as to the election being valid, but with what I shall have to decide on the question of costs. As a general rule, except there are special circumstances in the case, the costs of these petition proceedings would follow the result of the petition; but in this case, though the election was not

not avoided or vitiated by the fact that several electors, who were employed for Mr. Dowse's election, and were paid for such employment, voted for him, it is clear that their doing so was a violation of the provision of the statute to which I have already referred. And it may be that the fact of those payments appearing in Peacock's book might so far have called for inquiry, and induced to some extent the presenting of this petition. That consideration, however, would not, according to my present opinion, affect the entire of the costs of these proceedings. I have for these several reasons (which I have given at some length) come to the conclusion that none of these charges of bribery has been sustained, and I shall accordingly certify and report to the Speaker, that the sitting Member, Richard Dowse, Esq., whose return is complained of by the petition in this matter, was duly elected and returned to serve in Parliament for the Borough of Londonderry; that no corrupt practice has been proved to be committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any candidate at said election; that upon the evidence before me it does not appear that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at said election, and that there is in such evidence no reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at said election.

With regard to the question of costs, it will require some consideration on my part, and when I have decided the question, my registrar will communicate in Dublin with the agents for both parties. The question I have to consider is whether the entire, or any, and what portion, of the costs of the proceedings should be paid by the petitioners to the respondent.

FURTHER JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice O'Brien, 16 February 1869.

Mr. Justice O'Brien.] WHEN giving judgment in this case at the close at the trial, I reserved the question of costs.

According to the general rule, the costs of these election petition proceedings should follow the result, but the 41st section of the statute shows that, under certain circumstances, such rule may properly be departed from, and it appeared to me that the fact of some of the persons who voted for Mr. Dowse having been employed on his behalf in various services for the election, and having been paid for such services, was a circumstance which might be considered as affecting, to some extent, the question of his right to costs.

Under the 8th section of the Irish Representation Act of last Session, c. 49, such persons were not entitled to vote, and were guilty of a misdemeanor for having done so, and it is clear that, on a scrutiny, their votes would have been struck off. In this case, however, it was not, and could not be, contended that the elections should be declared void on the mere ground that the votes of those persons were illegal under said 8th section; but petitioners contended at the trial, that having regard to the amount of such payments, the circumstances under which they were made, and to the nature and value of the services rendered by those voters, the payments to them should be considered as having been colourably and corruptly made for the purpose of securing their support, and as being acts of bribery. I was unable to concur in that conclusion, and (for the reasons I mentioned in my judgment at the trial) I did not think that the payments in any of those cases constituted an act of bribery; but I thought it requisite to consider how far the fact of such illegal votes having been given by persons paid for their services should affect my decision as to the costs or any portion of them.

I have, since the close of the trial, carefully considered this question. The entries showing the payments to those voters are contained in Peacock's books; Peacock died on the 10th of December; the petition was presented on the 15th, and it appears from Mr. Neilson's evidence as to his letter to Mr. Dowse of the 12th of December, and his interview with him on that day, that the petition had previously to that day been in actual course of preparation; and it further appears from Neilson's evidence, that those acting for petitioners had not any access to Peacock's books till some time after the petition was presented.

Under these circumstances, and considering the various other charges of bribery relied on by the bill of particulars, several of which were sought at the trial to be sustained by evidence that lasted a considerable time, it does not appear to me that, with respect to the general costs of the petition and proceedings, there is ground for holding that the respondent's right to them should be affected by any supposition that the petitioners, in presenting their petition, were influenced by the fact of these payments having been made, or for holding that the employment and payment of the voters in question should affect more than a portion of the costs of the trial, but, in my opinion, it does affect a portion of such costs.

The voting of such persons was, as I have already said, an illegal act, which is expressly and for obvious purposes of public policy forbidden by the Legislature. At the trial some time was consumed, and the length of the trial was to some extent protracted by the evidence given as to the employment and payment of the voters in question; and I think that the petitioners should not pay to the respondent the additional costs which were caused by the time necessarily occupied in such evidence, and which would not have been incurred but for the fact of those persons having illegally voted.

I have referred to the evidence for the purpose of ascertaining the portion of the costs of the trial which, in my opinion, should not (on the ground I have stated) be allowed to the respondent. The evidence relating to the employment and payment of the voters in question was given on different days, but occupied only a portion of each day; and the far greater part of each of those days was occupied in evidence as to other charges which were not sustained. I may observe that Deery was one of those persons, but the great portion of the time occupied by his examination related to the charge of Peacock having promised him 20*l.* for his vote, a charge which I considered to be altogether unfounded.

The conclusion, then, at which I have arrived upon a review of the evidence is, that the time occupied by the evidence as to the employment and payment of those voters may properly be estimated at two days, but certainly did not exceed that period.

Length thus, from what took place at the trial, the means of determining myself the length of time by which the trial was protracted by such evidence, I think it better that I should regulate the abatement of the respondent's costs by reference to that time than by a reference to the Master on the subject. Such reference would necessarily, from the nature of the case, involve questions difficult for the Master to determine, and would probably be attended with considerable delay and expense to the parties.

I shall therefore declare that the respondent is not entitled to the costs of the day for either of two days of the trial, viz., the fifth and sixth days, on which the principal part of such evidence as to the employment and payment of those voters was given; and I shall declare that, with that exception, the petitioner shall pay to the respondent the costs of the petition, the trial, and the other proceedings therein.

MANCHESTER ELECTION--(SPECIAL CASE).

Manchester.

JUDGMENTS delivered by Mr. Justice Willes, Mr. Justice Montague Smith, and Mr. Justice Brett, 6 May 1869.

Special case.

Mr. Justice Willes.] THIS was a Petition presented to the Court pursuant to the "Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868," praying that the election and return of Mr. Hugh Birley at the last Parliamentary election for the city of Manchester should be determined to be null and void, upon the ground that he was disqualified by the Act of 22 Geo. 3, c. 45; and the question arises in this way: Mr. Birley is a member of the firm of Messrs. Macintosh & Co., who are india-rubber manufacturers, and they had several orders from the Secretary of State for India, for goods to be supplied for the service of that office; and goods were supplied under contracts, and the contracts were fulfilled to the extent of all the goods being delivered, but the claim was not liquidated or settled as to amount in the first instance, until the 23rd of October 1868, when the goods which were delivered were finally accepted as being a complete fulfilment of the contracts, and nothing remained to be done under them except to pay the price which had become ascertained by the operation of the contract, and by the final acceptance of the goods supplied under it, and the satisfactory fulfilment thereof on the part of Messrs. Macintosh & Co. On the 23rd of October 1868, nothing remained to be done by Messrs. Macintosh & Co. to complete their part of the contract; and they then became creditors of the public (in so far as that expression may be properly used, without looking to the exact fund out of which payment would come) in respect of the price of the goods, and the only contract relation existing between them and the Government from the date of the 23rd of October, was the relation of debtor and creditor.

There was another contract which arose in this way; it arose upon an order given by an officer of the Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum. It appears that the Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum is an asylum for the reception of criminal lunatics, not so established under an Act of Parliament (which might perhaps be considered as notice to all the world that the Asylum was a Government establishment), but under a warrant bearing the sign manual, by which it was declared to be a public institution for the reception of criminal lunatics. Her Majesty having power under an Act of Parliament to issue such a warrant, it had become a public establishment, but by a process which was not patent, or which persons were bound generally to take notice of, and requiring evidence or proof of some sort in a court of justice, and not, under the circumstances, coming within the popular expression of a document that was notice to all the world. The Broadmoor Asylum Asylum was not known to Mr. Birley or his partners, or to their agent, through whom the order was given to the firm for the goods, to be a Government institution, until after the election. When this first became known to them, the goods had not only been delivered but paid for. But before the election the asylum was in want of some india-rubber articles, described as "chambers," and the officer sent an order to Messrs. Macintosh for three dozen of them. That order was inquired after by a person who came on the part of the asylum to Messrs. Macintosh and Co.'s place of business, and he was informed that the goods would be sent. This is the construction which ought to be put upon the statement in the case that "the order was accepted." The value of the goods being under 10 £., that must be treated as a contract for the delivery of goods that had been ordered. Those goods were sent after the election, and after some correspondence the price appears to have been agreed upon and paid, which price was 7 £. 10 s.

These being the facts, the question is, whether Mr. Birley, at the time of the election, fell within the disqualifying statute of the 22 Geo. 3, c. 45. It was insisted on the part of the Petitioners that the Secretary of State for India, contracting for the Indian service under his control, was contracting for "a public purpose." It was also insisted that a person who had completely performed his contract with the Government, so that he had nothing to do but to receive the price, and nothing to hope for in respect of that payment, except receiving that which was his ascertained due, was still a contractor disqualified by the statute.

Each of those propositions was denied on the part of the Respondent. With respect to the order for goods, amounting to 7 £. 10 s., supplied to the Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum, there can be no doubt, I think, and it was hardly argued, but that that was literally a contract for public purposes. But the question raised with respect to that was, whether a mere casual order, across the counter, so to speak, given by a person not known to be a contractor for Government purposes, neither professing to be a Government agent nor supplying the means to the so-called contractor of knowing that he was so, whether a casual order of that kind given to and accepted by a trader who or whose agent is not aware either then or at the time of the election that he is dealing with the Government, comes within the prohibition of the statute. Those two cases must be disposed of separately.

With regard to the contract with the Secretary of State for India, the first question is one requiring, no doubt, a great deal of attention, and it might not be useful to express a judicial opinion upon it, except in a case in which it was necessary to dispose of it. Certainly the impression upon my mind at first was, and I cannot say that that impression has been entirely removed by Mr. Mellish's argument, that the Secretary of State for India being one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, a contract with him would be a contract for "public purposes." But I do not think it necessary to express an opinion upon that, because upon the second ground it appears to me that the contractor in this case is not within the statute of the 22 Geo. 3, c. 45, for before the election he had ceased to be a person holding or enjoying a contract under which anything was to be done by him, and he had been converted into a mere creditor of the Government, whose claim had been ascertained, and whose right was to receive his money. And as it appears to me it would be an injustice which we ought not to give effect to unless we found clear language in the Act to enforce us to say that a mere delay of payment on the part of the Government, the mere existence of the relation of debtor and creditor between the Government and the candidate, should have the effect of disqualifying the candidate. It appears to me very clear, when you come to compare the various terms of the Act with one another, in the different sections bearing upon this question, that it was not the intention of the Legislature—it certainly is not within the spirit of the Act, and it appears to me is not expressed by the Act—that the mere subsistence of the relation of debtor and creditor, which almost necessarily must have arisen out of some former contract, should itself effect a disqualification. If that were so, it would be impossible to avoid the absurdity suggested by Mr. Mellish, that the mere omission by the Government to pay a small sum of money, a small balance, to a contractor who had completely fulfilled his contract, either by reason of a dispute not adjusted until shortly before the election, or even by reason of the accidental leaving out of a few pence or pounds, should constitute the status of disability. If that absurdity is created by the Act, of course we have no other duty as judges but to adopt it, but we have the preliminary duty of being quite sure that the Legislature did intend such a state of things, before we pronounce it to be law.

Now this Act of the 22 of Geo. 3, c. 45, dealt with two classes of persons. It dealt with persons to be elected in future Parliaments; and it also dealt with persons who were in the House at the time, and who might have contracts with the Government; and the first piece of information as to what the Legislature intended I think may be derived from comparing the first section, which deals with candidates for Parliament, with the second section, which deals with the Members in existence. The Legislature also, in section 6, deals with the case of persons to whom contracts may come, either by the acts of others over which they had no control, or by acts such as marriage, happening in the ordinary course of life, and as to which special provision is made by that section. That section also appears to throw light upon the matter. Then comes the 7th section, which further deals with the case of Members having contracts unexecuted, giving power to put an end to them. Lastly, there is the 10th section, reference to which also should be made.

The 1st section, "for further securing the independence of Parliament," says that "from and after this present Session any person who shall directly, or indirectly, himself, or by any person whatsoever, in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or on his account, undertake, execute, hold, or enjoy, in the whole or in part, any contract, agreement, or commission, made or entered into with, under, or from the Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, or the Navy, or Victualling Office, or with the Master General, or Board of Ordnance, or with any one or more of such Commissioners, or with any other person or persons whatsoever for or on account of the public service, or shall knowingly and willingly furnish or provide, in pursuance of any such agreement, contract, or commission, which he or they shall have made or entered into as aforesaid, any money to be remitted abroad, or any wares or merchandise to be used or employed in the service of the public, shall be incapable of being elected, or of sitting, or voting, as a Member of the House of Commons during the time that he shall execute, hold, or enjoy, any such contract, agreement, or commission, or any part or share thereof, or any benefit or emolument arising from the same."

Reading that section by itself, with the light of the preamble, that this was an Act "for further securing the freedom and independence of Parliament," and finding that the specific provisions in the section seem to point to the execution of a contract with Government, having a contract open, as it were, with Government, which, it was supposed, might interfere with the independence of the contractor; and looking at the words "execute, hold, and enjoy, any such contract, agreement, or commission," they seem to point to the case of a man having a contract under which he was to derive some future benefit from dealing with the Government, in respect of which they might control him, as, for instance, by directing their officers not to look closely to the sort of goods he sent in, or the like. I should, however, be strongly disposed to come to the conclusion that a person cannot be said to "execute, hold, or enjoy" a contract, when the only thing he could be said to enjoy is the state of not being paid money in respect of something which he has completely done at some former time, and for which he ought to have been paid, if that were the course of business, on the spot, and at the instant. The state of not being paid a debt, arising out of a contract completely executed by the contractor, as to which nothing remains for him to do but to take the money when it is offered to him, could not be properly said to be an "enjoyment of a contract, agreement, or commission." As there is not in the Act any general provision that a public creditor shall not be a Member of the House of Commons, I should have thought, even if that first section had stood alone, that it would be wrong to come to the conclusion that the mere fact of the Government owing a person a debt should disqualify that person, though it were proved there had been previously a contract under which the debt accrued.

The second section seems to point in the same direction: "That if any person being a Member of the House of Commons shall directly or indirectly himself, or by any other person whatever in trust for him or for his use and benefit, or on his account, enter into, accept of, agree for, undertake, or execute in the whole, or in part, any such contract, agreement, or commission as aforesaid; or if any person, being a Member of the House of Commons, and having already entered into any such contract, agreement, or commission, or part or share of any such contract, agreement, or commission by himself or by any other person whatsoever in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or upon his account, shall after the commencement of the next Session of Parliament continue to hold, execute, or enjoy the same, or any part thereof, the seat of every such person in the House of Commons shall be and is hereby declared to be void." It would certainly be a violent conclusion, as it appears to me, to arrive at, that if a person at the time of the passing of this Act happened to be a contractor who had fulfilled his contract, and to whom it only remained that the Government should pay what was due to him for what he had supplied, and such a person, through there being some dispute as to the amount due to him from the Government, should be kept out of his money till the commencement of the next Session of Parliament, that thereupon, for no fault whatsoever, and in respect only of the delay of payment, his seat should become void. That seems a confirmation of the conclusion that the mere fact of indebtedness of the Government to a candidate is no disqualification, because the same class of things is dealt with in these two sections. It would be a strong conclusion to come to, that every person who was a creditor of the Government, and was not paid before the beginning of the next Session, should cease to be a Member. That would tend rather in an opposite direction to the declared purpose of the Act, namely, to destroy, not "secure the freedom and independence of Parliament"; because (if such a thing were conceivable) if there happened to be two contractors in the House, the one a supporter of the Government, and the other not, a delay of the Treasury might make the difference of one of them being unseated under the second section, and the other retaining his seat; that would be a strange conclusion.

I pass over the third section with respect to incorporated trade companies; and the fourth, as to contracts to expire within a year. Then comes the clause as to contracts which are not to expire until a year's notice be given; that is worth referring to. The fifth section provides that "Where any contract, agreement, or commission has been made, entered into, or accepted, with a provision that the same shall continue until a year's notice be given of the intended dissolution thereof, the same shall not disable any

any person from sitting and voting in Parliament until one year after the said notice shall be actually given for the determination of the said contract, agreement, or commission, or till after 12 calendar months, to be computed from the time of passing this Act." That is quite inapplicable to the case of a mere creditor, unless it were to be supposed that he was to give up his debt as a condition of remaining in the House.

Then the sixth section rather alters the language as to time or duration of the first section, although it means to express the same idea; because it says, "That nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to any person on whom, after the passing of this Act, the completion of any contract, agreement, or commission shall devolve by descent or limitation, or by marriage or as devisee, legatee, executor or administrator, until 12 calendar months after he shall have been in possession of the same," that is, of the contract. That looks very much like a contract to be completed; a contract under which something was to be done beyond the mere payment of money, being the sort of contract which was intended by the Legislature to be a disqualification.

The seventh section of the Act was applicable to the then Members: "That any person who is now a Member of the House of Commons and holds and enjoys any such contract, agreement, or commission as aforesaid, may be discharged from the execution thereof on giving 12 months' notice to the person or persons with or from whom such contract, agreement, or commission is made, entered into, accepted, of his desire that the same shall cease and determine; and such contract, agreement, or commission, after the expiration of the term aforesaid, shall be null and void."

Those are the sections which, as far as I can understand this Act, apply to this branch of the case. I say as far as I can understand, because we can find no contemporaneous exposition of it, as bearing upon this particular question, either in our own courts, or, as far as they have been brought under our notice, by the Parliamentary Committees. My brother Brett reminds me that I have used perhaps too large an expression; I did not mean to do so. There have been several cases, I am aware, upon the construction of the Act of Parliament; but what I meant to say was that there was no case cited at the bar, and I have taken some pains to inform myself as to whether there were any decisions of the Parliamentary Committees with respect to cases in which the existence of the relation of debtor and creditor alone had been held to keep the contract open, so that the fact of the candidate being a simple creditor at the time of the election was held to be a disqualification. I certainly have been unable to discover any such decision. All I meant to say was that there is no decision bearing upon that point. In our own courts the only decision that I know of, which, however, does not at all apply to the circumstances of this case, is the case as to the colonel of a regiment, reported in "Brodrick & Bingham." And among the decisions of the Parliamentary Committees there is no decision that I know of that comes up to this—that the mere relation of debtor and creditor, arising out of a contract, disqualifies the candidate who continues to be a creditor of the Government at the time of the election, although nothing remains to be done except payment. That completes all I have to say upon the question arising out of the contract with the Secretary of State for India.

But then there is to be disposed of the second question, whether the accepted order for the utensils for the Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum, is to be considered as a disqualification in this case. I must take it that the goods were ordered for the service of the Government, because they were ordered to be used at the asylum for criminal lunatics; but they were ordered in this way, not under a formal tender and acceptance by the Government, which would ordinarily take place in the case of a contract, popularly so called, and which did exist in the first class of contracts referred to; but simply by the officer of the Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum writing an order to the place of business, "Send down three dozen chambers," and by somebody calling at Messrs. Macintosh's about those things, and being told "They will be sent as you ordered them." In this case there was an entire absence of any notice to Messrs. Macintosh that the goods were ordered for, or on account of the public service. They were ordered by a person who professed to be an agent for the Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum. It is found in the case that it was at a very late period, I think after these proceedings were commenced, that Messrs. Macintosh became aware that the Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum really was a Government establishment. The contract in the first instance was made with the person who sent the order. The question, therefore, whether a casual isolated order for goods, which was unknown to them to be an order from Government, such an order (as the Lord Chief Justice said yesterday) as was only equivalent to a person going into a shop and asking for a macintosh, which he was entitled to receive as an officer of the Government, and which he was allowed to buy where he pleased, and which would be charged to the Treasury, whether that falls within the meaning of the Act. It certainly does fall within the letter of the Act, assuming that no importance is to be given to the circumstances of the casual nature of the order, together with the entire absence of knowledge, or of means of knowing, that it was given on account of the public service.

That raises a question upon the construction of the Act as to whether knowledge, or means of knowledge, be an essential condition to disqualification. In dealing with that, it is right to look to the Act. The Act contains not only a highly penal provision in respect of forfeiture of the seat, and a penalty upon any Member who sits in violation of the Act but also an enactment, "That in every such contract, agreement, or commission, to be made, entered into, or accepted as aforesaid, there shall be inserted an express condition that no Member of the House of Commons be admitted to any share or part of such contract, agreement, or commission, or to any benefit to arise therefrom;" a provision which surely would not be seriously employed in an order for three dozen chambers for the Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum, by some officer of the asylum entrusted to give that order, to the extent of 7*l.* 10*s.*, which is the price of those articles. Unquestionably, if this provision was intended to be imperative upon the person dealing with the Government, there were in such a case no means of carrying it into effect. If it was intended to be imperative upon the officer of the Government, it seems hardly applicable to dealings for so small an amount that the ordering of the things is left to the discretion of inferior officers, who would, in ordering them, give no notice that they were dealing for the Government, any more than if they went in and bought and paid for the goods across the counter. The 10th section proceeds, "And that in case any person or persons who hath or have entered into, or accepted, or who shall enter into or accept, any such contract, agreement, or commission, shall admit any Member or Members of the House of Commons to any part or share thereof, or to receive any benefit thereby, all and every such person or persons shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay the sum of 500*l.*" Now would Messrs. Macintosh, if Mr. Birley had at the time been a Member of the House of Commons, upon taking this order of the Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum, without knowing the public creditor who was behind the Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum, be liable to pay this penalty of 500*l.*? I answer, unhesitatingly, that that would be one of those cases in which it would be necessary to read into the 10th section the words, "knowingly and willingly," which are inserted in the 1st section, and which indicate the intention of the Legislature that knowledge should be a condition of the penal consequences which are to follow.

Manchester.

The same sort of provision is made in the 9th section, which refers to the Members themselves, and I need not go through the same course of reasoning as to the language of the 9th section. It is open to the same sort of remarks as the 10th. The only word necessary to be noticed is the word "presume." It seems to me to imply not a mere ignorant act, but an act in which a person knowingly takes upon him to do that which the law says shall not be done under the circumstances.

I do not know that it is necessary that I should make any further observations upon the Act, in order to explain the reason why I have come, in my own mind, clearly to the conclusion that, in respect of the first class of contracts now in question, Mr. Birley was not disqualified by the Act of Parliament because the contract had been completed and fulfilled by his firm, the amount of money due had been ascertained, and the debtor was the Government. And without resorting to the presumption of law that the Government will fulfil to the letter the obligation imposed upon them by the law (I need not cite authorities for that, though there are authorities in the books for it), without resorting to that presumption, it is enough to say that there is no sensible reason for disqualifying a man simply because he happens to have money due to him by the Government which is not paid him; and there is nothing in the Act of Parliament which compels us to arrive at such a conclusion. I will only add, in conclusion, with regard to the second question, that I am the more satisfied it must have been the intention of the Legislature that such a casual acceptance of an order as this, without knowledge that it was for the public service, should not work a disqualification, and that the Act should apply only to cases where contracts in the ordinary acceptance are entered into with knowledge, or at least means of knowledge, because one can hardly conceive a case of a Government contract to which this Act would in substance at all apply, unless under circumstances in which the person dealing with the Government officer knew, or had the means of knowing, that he was dealing with the Government. There is no ground whatever for extending the construction of the Act to embrace any other case.

I am desired by the Lord Chief Justice, who I regret to say is unable to attend to-day, to add, that he concurs in the view which I have stated. Our judgment is for the Respondent.

Mr. Justice Montague Smith.]—I am of the same opinion. It is contended that Mr. Birley is disqualified from being elected as Member for the City of Manchester because he was a partner in the house of Messrs. Macintosh & Co., which, at the time of the election, held two contracts with the Government; first, with the Secretary of State for India in Council; and secondly, a contract to supply the Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum with certain articles.

Now, first, as to the contract with the Secretary of State for India in Council, I think it is unnecessary, in the view we take, to decide whether such a contract with the Indian department of the public service is within the meaning of the 22nd of George the Third. It is a question which will require serious consideration when it becomes necessary to decide it, and I desire to express no opinion upon it. But I decide the case, so far as regards the contract with the Secretary of State for India in Council, upon the ground that that contract, at the time of the election, was no longer executory. Nothing remained to be done upon it by Messrs. Macintosh & Co.; the goods ordered had been delivered, and no more remained than for the Government to pay the price which, so far as I understand it, was then overdue.

Looking at this Act of Parliament, and the general tenor of it, it certainly is very strongly strongly in my mind that the Legislature intended its legislation to apply only to contracts of a continuing nature—to contracts which had some duration, such as contracts for building works, or contracts for a recurring supply of goods. I do not say that a contract for a single supply of goods does not come within the terms of the Act of Parliament. But I think, looking not only at the first clause, but also at the other clauses of the Act, it very plainly appears that the statute did not mean to disqualify a contractor unless the contract was in an executory state on his part, that is to say, that something remained to be done by him, and that in no other way can the Act of Parliament be properly construed.

Manchester.
 Special case.

The first section is this, "That from and after the end of this present Session of Parliament, any person who shall directly or indirectly, himself, or by any person whatsoever in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or on his account, undertake, execute, hold, or enjoy, in the whole or in part, any contract, agreement, or commission made or entered into with, under, or from the Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, or of the Navy or Victualling Office, or with the Master General or Board of Ordnance, or with any one or more of such Commissioners, or with any other person or persons whatsoever, for or on account of the public service."

Now the words "undertake and execute" clearly apply to undertaking a contract, and executing a contract, in which something is to be done by the undertaker; the other words "hold and enjoy" may have been added to meet cases where the contractor does not himself execute the contract. It seems to me they refer to holding a contract or enjoying a contract under which something has to be done by the contractor, either one act or recurring acts, and that he is only disqualified "during the time" he shall execute, hold, or enjoy any such contract. The words "during the time" clearly show that Parliament was contemplating a contract which would endure for some period of time, and that during that period of time something was to be done on the part of the contractor.

The 4th and 6th clauses clearly point to contracts having some duration in point of time, for the performance of that which the contractor was to do under them. The 4th section is "That nothing in this Act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to any contract, agreement, or commission made, entered into, or accepted before the passing of this Act, the term whereof will expire in the space of one year from the time of making thereof." That clearly points to a contract having some long duration in point of time. And the 6th is to the same effect, "That nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend to any person on whom, after the passing of this Act, the completion of any contract, agreement, or commission shall devolve by descent or limitation or by marriage, or as devisee, legatee, executor, or administrator, until 12 calendar months after he shall have been in possession of the same;" that is to say, in possession of some contract under which something was going on.

I think the whole scope of the Act points to contracts of that continuing kind, but I repeat, that I do not say that if there is a contract for a single supply of goods that contract is not within the Act, so long as it remains to be performed on the part of the contractor; he having to supply the goods, and the Government having a right to reject the goods, or to find fault with them. But when the contract is no longer executory on the part of the contractor, and he is turned into a mere creditor of the Government, I do not think he can be any longer said "to undertake, hold, or enjoy," a contract within the meaning of this Act of Parliament. The consequences of holding, otherwise, would be that a man might be disqualified from entering Parliament by the misfeasance of the Government in not choosing to pay a debt which was owing to a person who had supplied goods to them; and, as my brother Willes said, it would be twisting the Act so as to produce the very mischief which it was seeking to prevent, namely, giving the Government control over a man, and enabling them at their discretion, by paying him or not, to determine whether he should enter Parliament or not. I think we ought not to put a construction upon the clause which would lead to such a consequence, unless we are compelled by plain and direct words so to do. On these grounds, therefore, and these grounds only, I come to the conclusion that Mr. Birley was not disqualified by reason of Messrs. Macintosh & Co. being unpaid for that single supply of goods at the time of the election from being elected a Member for the city of Manchester.

With regard to the goods that were supplied to the Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum, the facts really come to this:—It is true that there was the form gone through of a written order from the superintendent asking for a tender, and there was an answer sent; but it really comes to no more than if the superintendent of the lunatic asylum had gone to the shop of Messrs. Macintosh & Co. and ordered three dozen of those articles, which were not supplied till after the election. It may be that this is a contract within the very terms of this Act, though, as I have already said, I very much doubt whether it was in the contemplation of those who passed this statute that such a transaction should be deemed a contract within the meaning of this enactment. However, assuming that it is, I am clearly of opinion that where the order is not given by some recognised Government officer, so that the fact of his giving the order is itself notice that it is an order on behalf of the Government, but where it is consistent with the manner in which the order is given, that it may have been given on the part of a private person—where, in point of fact, the person of whom the goods are ordered does not know that the order is given on the part of the Government—in such a case the person supplying the goods is not disqualified by this Act. I think there must be a contract with the Government on the part of the person

Manchester.

Special case.

person sought to be disqualified, which is known by him to be a contract with Government. Now here it is found, in point of fact, that Mr. Birley and his partners did not know that the order was given on the part of the Government; and there is every reason, upon the facts, for coming to the conclusion that the order given by the superintendent was not one which, upon its face, gave any notice to the person receiving the order that it was given on behalf of the Government.

I confess I am very glad that, upon this last contract, we are able to come to this conclusion, because it seems to be monstrous that the representation of one of the largest cities in the kingdom should depend upon the question whether the candidate was a partner in a firm which had engaged to supply articles so small in value (7*l.* 10*s.* only) that the contract might be made without writing. The Statute of Frauds regards contracts of sale under 10*l.* of so little consequence, that they may be made by word of mouth; still it might certainly happen, if the construction of the Act contended for is to prevail, that upon an order for goods under the value of 10*l.*, given verbally, if it had not been executed at the time of the election, a partner in a large house would be disqualified.

I cannot help thinking that it would be very desirable that this Act should be revised, because it certainly appears to me to be totally inapplicable to the present state of commerce and trade; and that it really provides pitfalls into which men who mean to walk uprightly may unwittingly tumble. I think Mr. Birley is entitled to keep his seat.

Mr. Justice Brett.] The questions are—What is the construction to be put on the first section of this Statute? And, How is that section to be applied to the two cases before the Court?

Now, as to the construction of the Statute, it seems to me that the first thing to be considered is, what is the canon of construction which is to be applied as to the circumstance of disqualification? Is the canon to be that which is to be applied to a highly penal statute? That seems to me to depend on the ninth section. In the ninth section there is disability spoken of twice in the same terms, and there are two results which are applied to that disability. In the first part of the section it is said "that if any person hereby disabled or declared to be incapable to sit or vote in Parliament, shall nevertheless be returned," the election shall be null and void; and in the second part of that section, using exactly the same words as to disability and incapacity, says, "And if any person disabled and declared incapable by this Act to be elected, shall after the end of this Session of Parliament presume to sit or vote," he shall be subject to the penalty of 500*l.* for every occasion of his sitting or voting in Parliament. Now, inasmuch as the same words are used, it does seem to me that whatever are the necessary incidents in order to make the person liable to the penalty of 500*l.* are also necessary incidents in order to make the election void. If, for instance, knowledge is a necessary incident in order to make the person liable to the penalty, it is also a necessary incident in order to make the election void. Therefore it does seem to me that the section, and indeed the whole Act, are to be construed as of a highly penal character.

If that be so, then the points raised in this case on this first section are, first, With whom is it necessary that the disqualifying contract should be made? On the one side, it was said that it might be made with a person who is an officer or agent of the Government to make contracts, the payment for which must be voted by the Parliament of Great Britain. On the other side it was said that all that was necessary was that the contract should be made with an agent of the Government, but that it was no necessary part of the matter that the payment shall be out of the public funds of Great Britain. I confess I am inclined to think that the latter is the right view; and I should incline to think in this case, that the Secretary of State for India is an agent of the Government. He is so much an agent of the Government that upon taking office he vacates his seat and is obliged to go to a new election. I should have thought it immaterial to say that any contract which he makes must be paid out of a particular fund—that is, out of the revenues of India; because otherwise it would seem to me that the mischief pointed at in this Act might be committed with impunity; that is to say, the Government might exercise very considerable influence over the independence of Parliament by means of the revenues of India; but I quite agree that it is not necessary for the Court to give any opinion upon that subject in this case.

Then the next point is whether it is necessary that at the time the person is elected, the contract, even supposing it is made with the Government, should be in some part executory. That depends upon the view to be taken of the first section with regard to that point. Now the first part of that section applies to the case of making or holding a contract. It says, "any person who shall undertake, execute, hold, or enjoy any contract, agreement, or commission." I should have thought that "undertaking" a contract is entering into it, and to "execute" a contract is to do that which may be done by a person who takes upon himself the execution of a contract not originally made with him, and that to "hold a contract or agreement" was meant to apply to the case of a possible transfer of an agreement which had been previously made with some other person; and that the word "enjoy" is really meant to apply to the case of a person with whom the contract was not made, but who as Cestui que trust is to enjoy the benefit of it.

But then the Act says, that any person shall be incapable of being elected, or of sitting in Parliament, "during the time that he shall execute hold, or enjoy" any such contract. Now the words "that he shall execute," seem to me to mean that he shall be executing,

executing, that is, be in a position to be called upon to execute ; and, if so, the "holding and enjoying" must be holding and enjoying a contract in the sense of a contract which the holder may be called upon to execute, or under which there may be something still to be executed. I think that such an interpretation might fairly be given from what appears in that section itself. But when you look at the second section, and interpret it by the seventh section, I think the argument becomes much stronger, because the words in the second section are the same as those used in the first, though the second section applies to the case of a person entering into such a contract, not before he is elected, but after he has become a Member of Parliament. It says, that if any person, being a Member of Parliament, "shall enter into, accept of, agree for, undertake, or execute" (the same words as in the first section) any contract, he shall be disabled ; or, "if any person shall, after the commencement of the next Session of Parliament, continue to hold, execute, or enjoy the same," he shall be disabled. Therefore, you have here the same words as in the first section ; and if the contract here contemplated is a contract which is still executory, it does seem to me that the contract contemplated by the first section must also be an executory contract. Now the seventh section deals with the case of persons who, being in Parliament at the time this Act was passed, were disabled by reason of the words used in the second section. It pointed out to those persons a means of getting rid of the disability. But the seventh section clearly contemplated that the contract from the disability under which they could escape was still an executory contract. It seems to me, therefore, strong to show that the contracts contemplated in the second section are contracts still executory ; and the tenth section would seem also to carry out the same view. And, as I said before, if the contracts under the second section are to be considered as executory contracts, then, as it seems to me, the contracts under the first part of the first section must also be considered executory.

The next question of construction is, whether the first part of the section requires that the contract there mentioned should be entered into, or be in the course of execution, with knowledge that it is with the Government ; it was argued that it does not, because it was said, there are no words in the first part of the section importing that necessity, whereas the second part of the section is introduced by the words "or shall knowingly and wilfully furnish."

But the first part of the section seems to be pointed to the case of entering into a contract, and the case contemplated in the second part of the section is not of entering into the contract, but of carrying out the contract. Mr. Manisty argued, that the second part of the section was intended to apply only where a person had entered into a contract and had given it up, and should nevertheless afterwards go on and act in pursuance of it. But considering how highly penal this Statute is, it seems to me that the more favourable construction would be to say, that the first part applies to contracts knowingly entered into with the Government, and that the second part applies to a case where a contract may have been entered into with the Government in fact, but without the knowledge of that fact by the contractor, but where afterwards knowledge has come to him that it is with the Government, and he nevertheless has gone on, and has insisted upon executing it. If that be so, knowledge is required under the first part of the section just as well as under the second part.

If such be the true construction of the section, then we come to the facts of the present case.

In the case of the first contract that was brought under the notice of the Court, it must be considered that it was a contract for the supply of goods to be paid for by cash payment. There was no credit. There was indeed power under the contract for the Government to object to the goods when delivered, but the goods had been supplied, had been delivered to the Government before the day of election, and the Government had accepted them as satisfactory. Therefore, everything which either party had to do under the contract was complete, the credit had expired, and nothing remained to be done but the payment of the money. The contract was so far complete, that under the circumstances, the credit being expired, it would not be necessary for the creditor to sue upon the contract. If he had to sue for payment of the money, he could sue as upon an executed contract for goods sold and delivered. Such a case has always been considered as the case of an executed and completed contract, completed and executed by both parties ; and therefore, as it seems to me, such a case is not within the Statute.

Then as to the case of the Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum, I think the objection to Mr. Birley fails, because it is distinctly stated, that not only he did not know that there was a contract with an agent of the Government, but he actually did not know that any contract had been made ; therefore, I think that the objections in respect of both contracts fail.

I must say, that when one considers the results of a contrary decision in both cases, it does seem almost impossible that the Court could hold otherwise than it is about to do ; because, if the first objection were a good objection (as has been already pointed out), the Government might, in the case of any person who has supplied the Government with goods, and where nothing remains to be done but for the Government to perform the simple duty of payment, keep a person out of Parliament for ever, simply by not paying him.

In the second case (as was pointed out by Mr. Mellish), if the traveller of a great firm in England is persuaded to take an order from a person whom he does not know to be an agent of the Government, although none of the principals of that traveller know even that the contract has been entered into, much less that it is with the Government, it would follow, if this objection is good, that any member of that firm, if he is elected to Parliament, although he knew nothing of the matter until after he was elected, or, perhaps, until after he had sat in Parliament for six months, would find his election void, and, according to my view of the matter, would find himself liable to be fixed with penalties for every day he sat or voted in Parliament during those six months. The injustice of such a construction of a penal Act seems to me to fully justify the Court in both points of interpretation which they have come to.

I will only further say that the view which the Court now takes is not at all inconsistent with the decision of Parliament in the case of Sir Sydney Waterlow, or with the decision of Parliament in the Leominster case, because in both those cases there was at the time of the election something yet to be done, the contract was still executory, whereas here the contract was, as it appears to me, complete and exhausted.

Mr. Manisty.] I take it for granted that the Respondent will not ask for costs in this case, because the Petitioners were advised that it was a doubtful matter, and they thought it more expedient not to proceed, and did not pay the deposit; but Mr. Birley also thought it so doubtful that he was very desirous that it should proceed. I am quite sure the Respondent would not ask for costs in such a case as that.

Mr. Justice Willes.] All we say under the circumstances is, we have come to the same conclusion that we did in the case yesterday, that we ought to give the costs to the successful Respondent. That is the only form in which the question comes before us at present. We ought, unless there are very peculiar circumstances, to give the costs to the successful Respondent, and, in this case, if Mr. Birley chooses to ask for costs, we are prepared to award him costs; but I think it must be left to him to determine whether the circumstances are such as will induce him to abstain from doing so.

Mr. Manisty.] I think the other side will admit that those are the facts.

Mr. Justice Smith.] It is really for him, if he likes to forego them, to say so.

Mr. Manisty.] At all events, they do not ask for them, and I should be very much surprised if they did.

Mr. Justice Willes.] If Mr. Mellish asks for costs, we are disposed to give costs. That is all we say at present. That of course is not a matter to argue.

Mr. Manisty.] No, my Lord, I feel that.

Friday, 7 May 1869.

Mr. Mellish.] In the Manchester election case, in which your Lordships gave judgment yesterday, I am instructed on the part of Mr. Birley to ask your Lordships for costs. I understand that your Lordships said that if we applied for them we should have them.

Mr. Justice Willes.] You ask for costs?

Mr. Mellish.] Yes, my Lord.

Mr. Justice Willes.] The Court is of opinion that your client is entitled to costs.

NORFOLK (NORTHERN DIVISION) ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Blackburn, 24 May 1869.Norfolk
(North Division).

Mr. Justice Blackburn.] It is quite true, as my Brother Ballantine has just said, that necessarily during the progress of this inquiry, having the evidence before me, and thinking of it, I had, to a considerable extent, made up my mind before hearing the counsel on either side. I could only try to keep my mind open until I had heard them; and when they called my attention to anything which was new to me, or which I had forgotten, or to any matter giving me ground to think that I had made any mistake, to consider it. But, except so far as what they have urged may have that effect, undoubtedly I had made up my mind to a very considerable extent; and I am now prepared to give my judgment at once, and to state what I think upon the case.

Now it is to be observed, first, that the petition is against both the sitting Members. In ordinary cases the seat of each Member would be dependent upon himself alone, unless there was something to show that the two Members had made common cause. As a general rule, in election matters it is not merely what the candidate himself does, but also what he does by his agents, which avoids the election, even though the agent has gone much further than was intended by the candidate. It is a general rule in election matters that if the agent does a corrupt act, though quite unintended upon the part of the candidate, it will vacate the seat. I have not had much opportunity of reading the different judgments delivered by different judges; but since I have had the opportunity of considering them, I find, as far as personal observation enables me to say, that they have all agreed very closely on what is the law on these different matters, though of course the difficulty is to apply the law to the facts in the different cases. Upon this particular matter about agency, I find the Scotch judge (Lord Barcaple), in the Greenock case, lays down the rule in exactly the same way as I should myself lay it down. I cite what is laid down by a Scotch judge, as showing that a Scotch lawyer has come to exactly the same conclusion as the English judges have come to; and I prefer taking it in his words rather than my own. He says, talking of agency, "I think that there are three principles applicable to three kinds of matters. There is, first of all, the strictest of all principles, that which is applicable to a criminal charge; and there you are responsible for nothing at all except your own individual guilt. That is a thing consistent with ordinary common sense. There is, then, the principle that is applicable to actions of a civil kind, raised against a party on the ground of a wrong done, and in which it is proved that the wrong was done by the defender's agent, that is to say, a person employed by the defender while he was doing the thing which he was employed to do. But there comes in the principle that he was employed to do the particular work, and that he was not employed to do the wrong. Then there is the third class of cases, with which we are at present engaged, where, in these election petitions, it being proved that a candidate is having his election carried on by a committee, or by certain canvassers, those canvassers do something which, if the candidate is responsible for it, will invalidate the election, and it is held that he is responsible for it in the sense of making the validity of the election depend upon it. I do not see how these election petitions would be of the least use otherwise, because I suppose that there are very few candidates indeed who undertake the practice of corruption by their own hand. I presume there are equally few candidates, or very nearly so, who ever say to their agents that they are to proceed corruptly in the matter." That is the passage at page 97 in the Blue Book which I am quoting from, in which Lord Barcaple lays down three classes, and points out where agency in an election petition differs from agency in other matters. He does not say, and he has no occasion there to say, what constitutes agency, which is a difficult question, and upon which, where it becomes necessary to inquire into it in the present inquiry, I will make any observations that occur to me as material.

Now, that being so, we have to see was there any corrupt act practised by the agent of the sitting Members, either or both. It happens that in this case Major Walpole and Sir Edmund Lacon have stood jointly; they have chosen to what we commonly call coalesce. They united in a canvass, and in fact have made each an agent for the other, and they have chosen to stand or fall together; consequently, if any corrupt act is shown to be done by an agent appointed by one Member, it will affect both. Such are the consequences of a coalition. A candidate is not only responsible for his own individual agent, but, having made a coalition, he becomes responsible for the acts of the agent of the other candidate with whom he has coalesced. Major Walpole, therefore, as far as those matters are concerned, is exactly in the same position as Sir Edmund Lacon. If a corrupt act is brought home to the one, both are unable to hold their seats.

There is, however, another point in the petition that is included here, namely, the new enactment, which says that wherever a Member employs, "personally engages" is the phrase that is used, a person who has been scheduled or declared guilty of corrupt practices, then he has done that which defeats his seat; the Act (whether wisely or unwisely it is not for me to consider) has pointedly and markedly said that that shall be proved against the Member personally; by which I understood it to mean, proved, as in that first class where Lord Barcaple says, as in criminal cases, a person is responsible for his own individual guilt and not otherwise, it must be proved to that extent. That being the case upon that head of the inquiry, necessarily and essentially the two Members stand quite in separate positions; it must be proved against either of them personally. The proof personally against the one does not prove it personally against the other; so that so far as that is concerned, their cases are necessarily separate.

Norfolk

That much I have said at the beginning, and now I have to proceed further and to see whether any corrupt act is brought home to any of the agents, for whom the Members are responsible, and in considering that, it depends very greatly indeed upon the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, and the true construction of it. That Act is about to expire. If I recollect right, it expires, unless renewed, at the end of the present Session of Parliament. But there is no doubt whatever that when it does expire it will be brought before the Legislature to consider whether it is to be renewed or not, and if it is to be renewed, what must be the modifications. Therefore, it is of very considerable importance that it should be known what construction the judges who have to deal with these election matters have put upon the statute as it at present stands. If, on the one hand, the Legislature, when considering the statute with a view of renewing it, consider that the construction which the judges have put upon it goes further than their intention, they will have an opportunity in any renewed Act of putting in words to say that it shall not go so far. If, on the other hand, they think that the construction put upon it by the judges is too narrow, and that it does not go so far as they intended, there will be an opportunity of putting in some words in order to explain the intention to carry it further. Whatever intention they express, there is no doubt whatever that the judges will be bound, as it is their duty, to carry out the intention of the Legislature. Therefore, I will for that reason express at rather more length than perhaps is quite necessary for the mere explanation to the particular parties here, my views upon the construction of this statute as far as it bears upon the present case; and with a view of doing that, I think it will be convenient to follow the course that has been taken in producing the evidence, and to treat the matters separately in that order, without more regard to the order in which they are in the statute. The first class of cases brought forward in the evidence, and which I will take first, are those which it is said proved that there had been undue influence exercised by agents, for whom the Members are responsible. That offence of undue influence is created and defined by the statute, the 17th and 18th Vict. c. 102, of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, section 5; and the only part which I have to consider here, is the first part: "Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself, or by any other person on his behalf, make use of, or threaten to make use of, any force, violence, or restraint, or inflict or threaten the infliction by himself, or by or through any other person, of any injury, damage, harm, or loss, or in any other manner practise intimidation upon or against any person in order to induce or compel such person to vote, or refrain from voting"—then come some other points which I will not read—"shall be deemed to have committed the offence of undue influence, and shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and in Scotland of an offence punishable by fine or imprisonment, and shall also be liable to forfeit the sum of 50 l."

Now, the first thing to consider is, what is the true meaning and construction of that Act. I think there can be no doubt when you look at the earlier part of it, which I have already read, that it is meant and intended to say, that where there is any force, violence, or restraint, or any threat of injury, or any injury, those are cases which of course would embrace all the cases where a wrongful act is threatened; but I do not think the Act is at all confined to that. I feel no doubt at all where a person, in order to prevent another from voting, or to force him to vote, either beats him or threatens injury to his person, or breaks the windows of his house, or threatens injury to his house, or the like, that is what is here called undue influence. But I do not think it is confined to that; where such a thing is done, and it is brought home to the agent, it avoids, according to my view, the election.

Just immediately before I came down here, in the case of Stafford, I was obliged very much against my will to put that doctrine in force, when I was convinced that Mr. Pochin, the sitting Member, had come down to a very corrupt borough, and had by a sort of direction on his part, prevented corruption upon his side, and hindered the other side in consequence from exercising corruption to any great extent, and in fact saved the borough from a commission. Of course I thought it highly meritorious upon the part of Mr. Pochin, and I was very sorry to have to decide as I did, but it was proved to my satisfaction that an agent of his, a man he had employed, a paid agent, did hound on a mob to beat and molest people on the day of the election so as to terrify men from coming to vote. I could not, according to the rule of law which has been laid down, say that because Mr. Pochin had been a meritorious man I would preserve his seat, and I was obliged to come to the conclusion that he had by his agents been guilty of undue influence, and consequently I had to unseat him. That was a case where the injury was a wrongful and violent injury. But I think the section is not at all confined to that. It goes on to say, if he shall inflict, or threaten to inflict, by himself, or by or through any other person, any injury, damage, harm, or loss. In another manner that is intimidation. I think that harm or loss is not confined to these cases; I think it would apply to cases where, though a person has a perfect right to do it, if he does not do it with the motive of affecting affecting the vote, yet the doing of it does inflict harm upon the other side. I take it that where a tenant who holds his land from year to year, to whom consequently the landlord can at any time give six months' notice to quit, the landlord has a perfect right to choose his tenant and turn him out; but if the landlord threatens to inflict, or does inflict, that turning out of his tenant for his vote, that is inflicting harm or loss within the meaning of the Act; and I think that sort of thing was intended to be struck at by the statute. So, again, where a person employs a servant, and the servant is continuing in his employment, and would in all probability continue in his employment in the ordinary course of things, the master of course may dismiss his servant at pleasure, giving him proper notice; he may dismiss him and change him at pleasure, and therefore he commits no wrong in so doing, but there again, if he does it on account of the vote, and for the purpose of coercing the voter, the statute intends, I think, to make that an infliction of loss which was to be punished, and punished severely. That has been acted on on more occasions than one. In the case of the Westbury election, to which I referred in the course of Mr. O'Malley's address, where it was proved that a manufacturer who had exercised coercion of that sort on a large scale in order to force his workpeople to vote, it was held, and I think it was held most undoubtedly, properly, that that was an infliction of damage or loss which, being proved to be done by an agent, vacated the seat. Other cases there have been something similar to that. In some of the towns in the north, Blackburn and Oldham, where something similar was ruled, it was clearly enough held, and I think rightly held, that though the loss and harm to be done to the man is not an illegal harm, not a matter that would be a crime, like beating the man or destroying his property, yet if it be a loss inflicted for that purpose, it is brought within the statute.

Then I come to other matters which are not quite so clear upon the construction of the statute, what you may call a precarious loss. For instance, if a person who is in the habit at intervals of frequenting a shop and giving the tradesman some custom, were to choose no longer to be giving that custom but to go elsewhere, if he chose to threaten to take away that custom and go elsewhere, is that a loss or not? It seems to me to be a good deal a question of degree. Acting on the same principle which I have been pointing out, I cannot but think, where the loss which is proposed to be inflicted in this way, is, I may say, to such an extent, and in such a way as would seriously affect the saleable value of the goodwill of a man's business, it would clearly be a loss; but such a trifle as that which Mr. O'Malley supposed, of a lady looking at a box of ribbons, and upon learning that the man was a Whig or a Tory, leaving the room and not buying, would be such a trifling thing that it could hardly be acted upon. I must weigh the matter as a question of degree, and see whether it is serious or not, for it is not to be forgotten that this section enacts that the offence shall be a misdemeanour, and shall be one which if it is made out shall subject the offender to fine and imprisonment; and I ought, therefore, in construing the statute, to remember that it is intended that such an infliction of loss, or such a threatening of infliction of loss, must be so serious that one could direct a jury in a criminal court to find that a person was guilty of misdemeanour. I cannot help thinking when you are looking at the principle of construction, that it must be taken in that way; if the loss where it comes to be this precarious loss (which expresses my idea perhaps as well as any other phrase), where it comes to be the loss of this chance, such as it would be in the case of a shopkeeper, it must be made out that it is done to a serious extent; and recollecting that to be so, you must see whether or not it is so made out. Then when one comes to see whether the thing is proved or not, of course the very essence of it all is, that it should be done on account of the vote. If there was an actual injury actually done, by the landlord dismissing or turning away his tenant, then of course the only question would be, was that done on account of the election; that is, as I have said, was it inflicted on account of his vote or not? Therefore, it would always come to be a question, more or less, of evidence, and no doubt the scale on which it was done would be an important thing to consider. If immediately after the election a landlord dismissed 50 or 60 tenants who had all voted against him, I do not mean to say the thing would not be capable of being explained, and it might be shown that it was not done upon that ground, but that there were very good reasons for turning them out. In many such cases, where prima facie it appeared as if there had been an act of coercion, they have been capable of explanation. I think that was the case at the Tamworth election, where a great deal was made of Sir Robert Peel, or his land steward, immediately after the election, having given notice to quit to, I think, about 20 cottagers, of whom two or three had voted against him, and no doubt that fact required explanation. My Brother Willes, who tried that case, took, as far as I can understand it, exactly the view of the law which I laid down just now, and I think, as far as I am aware, there has never been any difference of opinion among any of the judges as to the law. He took exactly that view, and inquired into and was satisfied upon the evidence that, though this act of evicting the tenants had taken place, yet it had nothing whatever to do with the election. He was satisfied that for some purpose—I think, if I remember, for improving the estate—it was intended to pull down the cottages before the election came on. The cottages were pulled down because of that intention, and that being so, of course it was held that there was no undue influence exercised. It would be monstrous if it were laid down that a landlord was obliged to keep on a tenant to whom he would otherwise give notice to quit, or that a master should be obliged to keep his servant whom he would otherwise send away, merely because he had voted against him; it must be shown that it was done on account of the election. Wherever an injury has been actually inflicted, wherever a thing is done which, for this purpose, would be a loss actually inflicted upon the tenant who has been turned out, or where a servant has been discharged, or the like, the proof is comparatively easy; but when it comes to be that he was merely threatened to go (which is equally within the statute), where a threat has been made, or what is supposed to be a threat, and not acted upon, the point is very much more difficult to determine. But I need hardly point out that in any such case it becomes a question always, more or less, whether or no the threat was a real threat. I think where a person, in a time of great excitement, uses what the Americans call "tall talk"—where an angry man says something that would apparently amount to a threat—in such a case, for instance, as one of the witnesses referred to when he said (I do not know whether he was using a Norfolk phrase or not) that Mr. Postle, in a time of excitement, was very "lavish" in his talk. I do not think that such a thing as that—an angry word spoken in that way, and not intended to be acted on; an angry thing, probably forgotten as soon as said—would amount to a threat at all. Of course it all comes to the question of fact; was this a serious and deliberate threat, meant to affect the vote (though perhaps repented of, and not afterwards acted upon), or merely angry words, not meaning anything? It always must be very difficult to satisfy the minds of those who have to decide the fact, whether the threat, which is not acted on afterwards, be a real threat or not. But when it comes to be a case of what I have called precarious benefit, arising from being a customer or the like, I think there, also, you ought to see tolerably well that the matter is made out to such an extent that you might, if the indictment were laid before a jury, fairly and properly leave it to the jury as a criminal matter, and direct the jury to find the prisoner guilty. In such a case as these I think the legal maxim, de minimis non curat lex, does to a considerable extent apply; and in seeing whether or no there is undue influence from a threat of some loss, you ought to see whether the loss is really considerable or not, and you ought also to see that the loss is not what a lawyer would call too remote. I will explain what I mean by reference to what occurred here. It appears in the evidence in this case that Postle, one of the persons who was complained of, was very angry with a man who had, as he, Mr. Postle, thought, promised him that he would not vote at all, and he found afterwards that the man was going to vote the other way. Mr. Postle, no doubt perfectly and sincerely, thinks he was angry at what he considered a breach of faith, not angry at his intention to vote for Wodehouse and Gordon, but angry at his breach of promise in not standing neutral. As I said before, I have no doubt Postle persuaded himself that that was the cause of his anger; but I must take the liberty of assuming, if the man had broken his word by promising to stand neutral, and had then gone and voted for Walpole and Lacon, Mr. Postle would not have been angry. I cannot doubt that his real anger was because the man was going against him. But in this case, Postle remembering during his angry words that the man had told him when they were friends before, that if, two or three years hence, when the young lady upon the coming of age of whom the sale of the property depended, the land should be sold, and if the land went at a tolerably low rate, he would like to buy the reversion and become his own landlord—Postle, suddenly remembering this, says in his rage and anger (he agreed he did say so), "When that comes to be done, I can buy it over your head, or, if I am dead, my son can do it for me," or some phrase of that kind. If that was said, was that a threat to inflict loss, which I am to treat as a misdemeanour, and which was to void the election? I have already said I think the loss must not be too remote; and if I were to come to the conclusion that Mr. Postle seriously and truly meant to do this little piece of long-lived spite which in a moment of anger he said he would do, I cannot think that it would come within the meaning of the statute. But to do justice to Mr. Postle, I have no doubt that as soon as his anger had cooled, before he went to bed, and certainly after he had slept upon it, he would as soon have cut off his little finger as have done it; it was merely a piece of what the witness called "lavish talk," rather than a threat seriously affecting the election.

I have said thus much on what does amount to undue influence, which to a great extent disposes of the cases under that head which were brought forward, and which were but few. The only one which struck me as being one in which there was any serious ground of doubt, was the case of the carter Edmunds, who had been for a long time past employed, though to no very great extent, for the brewery of Lacon and Company, to cart their malt; he was not employed as a regular servant, but he had had their custom for 22 years. Mr. Nightingale called upon him and asked him for his vote; he said he had promised the other way, and Mr. Nightingale left; and then when the next malting season came round the man was not employed, and he was not told why he was not employed. No doubt that looked suspicious; it appeared as if Mr. Nightingale was refusing to employ him on account of his vote; and that was fortified by the evidence of the discharged clerk, who said that Mr. Nightingale expressed to him, not as a message, to send to the man his determination that he would only employ his friends, and therefore the man should not be employed; and if the man was not employed afterwards it would be an injury and loss inflicted on account of the way he had voted. It was said that this man was a discharged clerk, and discharged servants do sometimes say matters against their masters which are not true. Then Mr. Nightingale says, though of course he was annoyed at the man not voting for him, the ceasing to employ him was not connected with that at all. He gives as a reason for it, that the man's horse had fallen lame, and the man was employing a donkey cart which would not do for the carriage of the malt. Unfortunately if that was so, he did not give the reason at the time, in which case there would have been no difficulty; then then he not only said it was not for that reason at all, but he afterwards swore upon his oath that there were other carters continued in their employment who voted against them. If it is true that he did not discharge them at all though they voted the other way, that fortifies his assertion that he did not discharge Edmunds for his vote; upon that evidence I am not called upon to determine which of the two is speaking the strict truth, because I must see whether or no the preponderance of evidence is such as to lead me to the conclusion that Edmunds was discharged upon that ground. Whether I can come to that conclusion or not is a matter upon which I am not bound to make up my mind, if I see enough to say that that case is not made out so that I can act upon it.

That was the case I mentioned just now, as to which I had the most doubt; as to the others when I come to look at them I think they all vanish away. First of all, there was the case of James Grimes, whom I have already mentioned; besides the angry words used by Mr. Postle about what might happen when the young lady came of age, it is said that this took place. Mr. Postle had purchased a portion of land which this man Grimes had been outgoing tenant of, so that at the end when Michaelmas came Grimes would have had to go out leaving the straw. Some time before, Grimes called upon Mr. Postle to ask whether he could make some arrangement about the straw, the result of which was that Mr. Postle took on Grimes as his tenant for two years, and the straw then became Grimes's. Mr. Postle entered in his book that that agreement was made, and that agreement having been completely made, Mr. Postle had no more power to turn the man out before two years, or to touch the straw afterwards, than I should have had, or anybody else; and Mr. Postle, who was a business-like man enough, and who was extremely anxious to show his business habits by showing his book, knew that perfectly well; whether Grimes was as well up in the law, is not quite clear. When Mr. Postle was very angry with Grimes, something was said about the straw; there was some difference in their evidence about that. Grimes rather gave the account that he understood Mr. Postle to say that he would take away the straw from him, which Mr. Postle clearly could not have done. Mr. Postle says he rebuked him for having broken his promise; that he said, "You have broken your promise to me, I might as well break my bargain with you to let you have the straw." I think it is probable that Mr. Postle did say something like that. I think it is very bad reasoning, because the two cases are not analogous: the one being a binding bargain, and the other nudum pactum. I think Mr. Postle is accurate in that, and that he did not make any such futile or idle threat as to say he would turn him out, or take away the straw, which he knew he could not do; and I think that the words were simply angry words.

Then there were several cases not relied upon by Mr. Serjeant Ballantine, and therefore I pass them by.

The next set of cases were those in connection with Mr. Foster; one of which was the case of the man Morter, who had mortgaged his property to Mr. Foster. It appears that the mortgage is one of 30 years' standing. Mr. Foster was the creditor, having the power to call up his money, and to inconvenience the debtor in that way. That being the state of things, Mr. Foster and Morter are quite agreed upon this, that when Mr. Walpole and Sir Edmund Lacon called upon Morter, Morter said something that Mr. Foster thought offensive to those gentlemen. Foster staid behind to rebuke him for his incivility, and then Mr. Foster and Morter both got angry. Morter professes to be able to repeat a great deal of the conversation. Mr. Foster says they were both excessively angry, and he will not attempt to remember what was said. I think it extremely likely that, in the heat of passion, something was said about calling up the mortgage; but afterwards Mr. Foster says he called upon Morter, and they became friends again, and from that time forward he had never said a word about it. Morter's account is that, after that time, when they met, something was said which he thought was a threat, and he got into a state of great indignation at the threat, and said he could get money elsewhere, and resented it so much that he went and voted the other way. There never has been an attempt on Mr. Foster's part to do anything in the way of carrying out that supposed threat, or exercising his power as mortgagor at all. He says he never intended to do it; and here it comes to be exactly that class of case to which I alluded. The threat, or what is said to have been a threat, was never carried into effect at all; and though no doubt it would be illegal if actually made to influence the election, though repented of, yet nevertheless the question whether it was so made is a matter of inference, and I do not think it is established that it was so made; and I must come to the conclusion that the case of Mr. Foster in relation to Morter was the case of an angry man using angry words, which he did not at all intend to act upon.

There is another man, Wilson, connected with the same Mr. Foster, in which, I think, the case failed. It was mentioned by Mr. Serjeant Ballantine, therefore I refer to it now; it appeared that this man Wilson had had an acre of land, of which he had had the feed, which was not at all a tenancy which was not to be renewed, but the acre of land he would have to give up at Michaelmas. It also appeared that this man was a bricklayer, who had sometimes worked for Mr. Foster, when he had a little job to do. Mr. Foster, it appears, supposed that the man had made a promise, which the man said he had not; they got into an angry discussion about it, and Mr. Foster seems to have said to him, besides some other abusive language, that he was a liar, and various other things, and told him that a man who would break his promise to vote would scamp his work, which I think did not amount to a serious intended threat, but was rather a case of angry language. It appears that this has not been acted upon, for Mr. Foster has not had any direct work of his own, and therefore he could not have employed him; but he had one little job where a tenant had some brickwork done about a chimney, when he told the tenant to get it done, not telling him not to employ Wilson, or to spite Wilson by not employing him, and in which case Wilson was employed. Therefore it was a mere idle threat, and came to nothing. Then there were two other cases (and those would make all the cases of undue influence) in which Mr. and Mrs. Fellowes were concerned; I must take it as not a disputed fact that Mrs. Fellowes did in the heat of the canvass use some such phrase to the man who kept the post-horses (I daresay they are not the lady's own words), as that she would get Conservative horses; but no doubt she said something to the effect that she would give her custom to people who voted upon that side, and not the other. And again it is said, in talking to the tailor who was sometimes employed by Mr. Fellowes, Mrs. Fellowes told him, on his saying that he was going to vote the other way, that she would have Conservative cloth. These, perhaps, were not the words she used, but I have no doubt she might have said something to the effect, that their custom ought to be given to those upon their side of politics.

Then we come to see whether that was a real threat, or was followed out by inflicting injury. Mrs. Fellowes could not inflict any injury except so far as she could influence her husband. It appears, as to the post-horses case, that the very slight custom which Mr. Fellowes gave before to Mr. Bush, is kept up now. Mr. Fellowes stated, that though he had been in the habit of sending for post-horses to Mr. Bush, on one occasion when he wished to take some guests from his house to a ball, he went elsewhere. Mr. Fellowes accounts for that extremely well. Mr. Fellowes had a larger party than usual, and instead of going in a two-horse carriage, it was necessary that he should have four horses, and an omnibus, and Mr. Bush did not happen to have an omnibus or four horses, therefore he went to the "Black Boy," at Aylsham. Even if the language used by Mr. Fellowes had gone much further than it did, there was not the slightest attempt to follow it up or to act upon it; therefore that case comes to nothing. The case of the tailor comes a little nearer to being followed up, because it does appear that Mr. Fellowes was always in the habit of having the gamekeeper's clothes made about Christmas time by this country tailor, and it happened unluckily at this particular time that Mr. Fellowes thought it convenient to get a pattern from a more fashionable tailor at Norwich, and consequently to remove that little custom from the country tailor. It is open to the observation which Mr. Serjeant Ballantine made upon it 'with respect to such matters not being trifles. There is a lady saying we must have Conservative cloth, and here is the cloth not got. But I stated before what I think the loss must be; that it must be a serious loss, a matter which in a criminal court, on a charge of misdemeanor could be left to the jury, and I must treat this as a petty matter, which the law would hardly take notice of. It would have been much wiser on the part of the person using the language if it had not been used; but I am happy to say, as far as regards the question, whether there was any crime in it or not, I am not called on to report Mrs. Fellowes to the House of Commons, and leave the House of Commons to consider whether the Attorney General should be directed to prosecute her. I do not think I am at all bound to do that. I daresay she will not again say anything of the sort to either innkeepers or tailors, when an election is about to take place.

That finishes the whole of the cases of undue influence, and I must say that the observation Mr. O'Malley made upon them is perfectly well-founded. Here have been five months during which there has been every endeavour to bring forward every possible case with no wish to spare anything, and they come at last, after all those five months, with these charges of undue influence, and those are all the cases they can bring forward, viz., one single case endeavoured to be made out of a landlord; one single case of a supposed harsh creditor in the shape of a mortgagee, and this wonderful case of the gamekeeper's coat. When that turns out to be the result after all this inquiry, I think one is justified in saying that it is very clear that there was nothing in this election for North Norfolk, which in any reasonable sense could be called oppression. As to the undue influence part of the case, I feel that it is what we should have called in old times frivolous and vexatious.

But we now come to a much more serious part of the case, namely treating; as to which the difficulty I find is very considerable indeed, in determining for myself what are the inferences I ought to draw, and what is the idea and intention which would make the treating a corrupt act under the statute. Corrupt treating is a different thing altogether from what I have just been speaking about, namely, undue influence. It always was the law, and is the law still, that when a man is directly induced to give his vote by meat or drink, it is just as much bribery as anything else. If a man sells his vote for a mess of pottage it is just as much bribery as if he sold his vote for the money which the mess of pottage was worth. That always was the law, and still is. But then there was a habit of giving the meat and drink for the purpose rather of keeping people to their colours, to keep them steady; and that had become excessively common centuries ago. When it was first endeavoured to be checked, I think the House of Commons endeavoured to check it far more with the desire of keeping down the expense of elections, and saving candidates heavy expense, than anything else; but by degrees they have more and more considered the extent to which this treating would corrupt the constituency; and finally, we have an Act of Parliament, the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, the 4th section of which is the one that governs the matter. But before coming to that 4th section I will mention the 23rd section, the mention of which now will clear the way, and relieve me from a great deal of after-matter. There was a very common belief that, at election times, upon the nomination-day, and day of the polling, where men had come to attend the nomination, or to

to attend the polling, they had a fair claim to have something given them for refreshment, and it was a very general practice indeed to give it them; and whether or no it was an illegal practice was a matter upon which Committees of the House of Commons entertained different opinions. One of the witnesses here, Mr. Beck, in mentioning that he had done that very thing, said, fairly and frankly, that he thought he had a perfect right to do it; and had done it before, and would do it again. He did not stand singular in that respect; a great many have thought so; but in the 17th and 18th Victoria, the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, the Legislature thought it necessary to stop it; and here is the enactment which they thought fit to put in. It recites, "And whereas doubts have also arisen as to whether the giving of refreshment to voters on the day of nomination or day of polling be or be not according to law, and it is expedient that such doubts should be removed, Be it declared and enacted that the giving, or causing to be given, to any voter on the day of nomination or day of polling, on account of such voter having polled, or being about to poll, any meat, drink, or entertainment, by way of refreshment, or any money or ticket to enable such voter to obtain refreshment, shall be deemed an illegal act, and the person so offending shall forfeit the sum of 40s. for each offence, to any person who shall sue for the same, together with full costs of suit." It is obvious, upon reading that, that the Legislature say distinctly that this shall be illegal; but they do not say it shall be a corrupt act, the doing of which shall avoid the election; they thought it was not like bribing or the like. They did not think it was so bad as to say that the election should be void if such an act were done; but they said it is a mischievous practice, we forbid it; and if any person, not only a candidate or a candidate's agent, but if any person gives meat or drink on account of attending on the nomination-day, or on account of polling, or on account of having polled, or being about to poll, it shall be an illegal act. Then they thought that they had devised a remedy to prevent it being done by the subsequent part of the section which enacts that persons so offending shall forfeit the sum of 40s. for each person receiving the same. I should have thought that that would have been an efficient remedy. There were a considerable number of attorneys in London who used to make a trade, which, I am happy to say, is a good deal hindered now, by getting up actions for the sake of costs; there are many men I could name, men whom my Brother Ballantine and Mr. Rodwell know, too, who used to get up actions for the purpose of getting their costs in actions for 40s. damages against poor people, out of whom it was difficult to screw the amount, except by selling them up. If I had been asked if this were an efficient remedy I should have said, "Yes; Mr. So-and-So is pretty sure, for the sake of his 40s., to come down and sue, and he will carry out the intention of the Legislature; not that he cares about that intention, but in order to get his 40s. and costs of suit." But 15 years have elapsed, and nobody has done so, and, as the Act expires this Session, it is not very likely that anybody will do it, though perhaps they may think there is a good crop to be made here. I do not know how that may be, but I do not think it likely. Therefore, if the Legislature, in considering the matter, desires that the practice of giving refreshment should be stopped, they will have to devise some penalty which shall effectually carry out their intention. But, though they made it illegal, the statute does not in the slightest degree touch its effect upon the result. You may, by giving money for refreshment upon the polling-day, subject yourself to a penalty of 40s., and it may be bribery if it is given for the vote, or treating if with the intention, and bribery or treating, none the more and none the less, because it comes within the 23rd section. Then comes the section which governs the matter, and which we have to consider, and that is the 4th section, which says, "Every candidate at an election who shall corruptly." Now I may stop at that and say, that I believe all the Judges have considered that the word "corruptly" governs the whole, and that that means, with the object and intention of doing that thing which the statute intended to forbid. What that is I will see presently. It does not mean corrupt in the sense that you may look upon a man as a knave or a villain, but that it is to be shown that he was meaning to do that thing which the statute forbids. The section proceeds, "who shall corruptly, by himself, or by or with any person, or by any other ways or means on his behalf, at any time, either before, during, or after any election, directly or indirectly give or provide, or cause to be given or provided, or shall be accessory to the giving or providing, or shall pay, wholly or in part, any expenses incurred for any meat, drink, entertainment, or provision to or for any person, in order to be elected, or for being elected, or for the purpose of corruptly influencing such person or any other person to give or refrain from giving his vote at such election, or on account of such person having voted or refrained from voting, or being about to vote or refrain from voting at such election, shall be deemed guilty of the offence of treating," which is not made a misdemeanor but merely made subject to a penalty. Upon the construction of that statute, I think, as far as I can observe by looking through the judgments of the Judges who have sat upon these election inquiries, we have had no difference of opinion at all; I believe every Judge has come to the same conclusion, that it is essential that the candidate should be mixed up in it, because the statute only makes it an offence in the candidate. The candidate must do it, but he need not do it with his own money or by himself personally, if he shall be in any way accessory to the giving or providing; and consequently if the candidate's agent, for whom he is responsible as agent, does give the meat and drink, that has, as far as the avoiding the election goes, the same effect as the candidate giving it. But then comes that which governs the whole; does he do it in order to be elected, or for the purpose of "corruptly," that is corruptly according to the intention of the statute "influencing such person or any other person to give or refrain from giving his vote?" That governs the whole, and that, I take it, is the key-note of the statute. Then we are to see was it done with that object; was the purpose that which the statute defined; that is to say, was the giving of the meat and drink with the intention of influencing the voters at this particular election? I take it that, influencing the voters to give their votes, means at the election then pending; and it comes to be a question then whether or no that intention is made out as a matter of fact. As I have already said, I think every Judge who has dealt with these matters, has agreed completely with what I am now saying. The words may have varied; different Judges may have used different words, but the meaning has been always the same. If I were directing a jury, I would say, "You, gentlemen of the jury, are to say whether or no, in point of fact, this meat and drink was given with the intention of influencing the voters at this election, assuming it to be given by the agent of the candidate; if so, you will find that it is corrupt treating." Unfortunately I have not a jury to leave it to; if I had, my task would be at an end. It is a very difficult thing to say in each particular case, whether or no that intention is made out. It must be a question of degree more or less in every case. I can only say upon that, as I have said several times before, that the question what is the intention of people must be inferred from the whole of their acts. As a good canon of the law of evidence, a man must be taken to intend the natural consequences of his act. If a man does a thing from which natural consequences ensue, we must say that he intended the consequences of his act. If a man in his sober senses stabs another with a knife, we must suppose that he intends to do him grievous bodily harm. The canon of evidence is, that where an act would have a certain natural consequence, and a rational man does it, you must suppose that he intended the consequences of his act. That being so in the present case, the fact whether or no the giving of meat or drink was intended to influence the votes, must depend upon the circumstances and the manner in which it was given, the time when it was done, and very much upon the nature of the entertainment which was given.

Norfolk

And here I must remark upon one fact which has a great bearing upon the present election; that is, that there is a very great difference between meat and drink, although the statute makes no difference at all as to the law of the matter. If meat be given with the intention of influencing the voters, it is as bad as if drink be given. But when we come to the question of fact as to what was the intention, that becomes to my mind excessively different. No doubt a man may be influenced as to his vote by giving him a sandwich to eat, and, on the other hand, a man may be made extremely drunk without influencing his vote. But when we come to look at the probability of what a man intended, there is a very great difference indeed; and then the question of whether it was meat or drink becomes an important question, I think, though it has been truly said by some of the Judges, that the statute makes no difference if once the intent is established, whether it is a thimbleful of drink given with the intent of inducing a voter to vote at the election, or whether it is a hogshead; nevertheless, upon the same principle of reasoning, when you come to look at the intention, that quantity is of very considerable importance. It seems to me that it is difficult to suppose that any person would throw open public-houses to voters, and make them all drunk, without intending to influence their votes, and whether a man gives them a small quantity of drink, it is a different matter. It comes to a question of degree and extent; and we have leave to consider whether or not it is intended to produce the effect contemplated. Here I think I must agree with what Mr. O'Malley said, that, as far as the evidence has gone, there has been, I should say, marvellous sobriety and temperance in this election. Some evidence was given as to there being drunkenness in Yarmouth. It is very possible there may have been. I think the truth is that it may have been somewhat exaggerated; but probably there were some drunkenness in Yarmouth. At the same time throughout the country generally, setting aside Yarmouth, it only incidentally appeared that there were two people, and no more, under suspicion of being drunk; and there was certainly nothing tending to show upon any one occasion, at any one of the county polling-places, that there was anything like general drunkenness. Never having come this circuit, I do not know much of Norfolk, and I do not know whether it is owing to some accident of their education, or from the way in which they live, that they are exceedingly temperate, and that there is very little drunkenness as compared with the North or West, or whether the merit is in the management of this election; but this I am quite sure of, that, contrasting this election with any other into which I have inquired, there is a most singular and astonishing difference between them; and looking at the question of treating, and the question of the intention, I cannot but think that is a very essential element to be taken into account.

Now I must say a few words about the particulars in this case. I feel quite satisfied, from the evidence here, that there has been a very general practice (it is highly probable that it was adopted also on the other side, although it not being material it has not been entered into) of farmers, or clergymen, and the clergy in this case where the Church was supposed to be in question, naturally enough took a considerable part in the election, arranging with their neighbours to meet at such-and-such a place where a conveyance was to be ready to take them to the poll; and when they came to the place there would be breakfast for them. Sometimes the time at which the breakfast was to be ready would be mentioned before, and sometimes the breakfast was there without having been mentioned at all; but breakfast was given on such occasions pretty generally. Whether it was a universal practice I cannot say, and I do not much doubt that in a very large number of these cases it would be illegal within the 23rd section, because the men were going to the poll.

poll. It does not at all necessarily follow that it would be so, although I think in a great many cases it would be so. But assuming that all these people were agents, when one comes to look whether or not they were agents, I can hardly come to the conclusion that, as regards any of these clergymen who have been mentioned as giving a small breakfast in that way (I put an emphasis upon the word "small," because the extent and degree is an important matter), even if they were proved to be agents, it could fairly and properly be said that it was done by them with the intention of influencing voters. It was given incidentally in the course of their bringing the voters to the poll, and it would probably subject them to a 40s. penalty; but I do not think I could treat them as giving them entertainments in order to influence voters, even if they were agents in all cases.

Then there comes a further class of cases, with regard to which I stopped counsel from commenting upon them, but I must render the reason why I did so. It appears that in a very considerable number of cases after the election was over, in some cases a day or two afterwards, and in some cases two or three weeks after the election was over, some landed proprietor, some squire or large farmer gave a dinner to his tenants and people around him, celebrating the victory their side had obtained; and he naturally enough might be expected not to invite those who had voted on the other side; with rare exceptions those people invited their own side. Now, I have already said, in pointing to the words of the Statute, that it says it is necessary, in order to make it treating within the 4th section, that it should be given by the candidate, or that the candidate should by his agents be accessory to the treating; and though the Statute in express terms says if given after the election it shall be just the same as before, yet nevertheless when given after the election it must be given by the candidate or somebody who still continues to be connected with the candidate. Now the agency at the election, which was solely from the canvassing before the election, expires with the election, whether or no a person who had been requested to canvass would be an agent whose misconduct would avoid the election, would depend upon the evidence; but unless there is something to show continuing authority, that person could not, if he had given a feast 10 days after the election, by that act upset the election. I have no doubt that most of these feasts, though not all of them, which were given after the election, were connected with the election; I have no doubt that the motive in the mind of the giver was connected with there having been an election. The intention was not to induce the electors to vote, because their votes had been already given; but no doubt these dinners, if you could come to the real motive of their being given, were given with the view to increase the influence of the squire who gave them; he gave the meat and drink with the intent of increasing his influence over his tenants and others who would be voters at any future election. No doubt that was the real motive with which these dinners were given; whether it be a right motive or a wrong one, whether it be a wise or a foolish thing to do, I have nothing to do with. All I have to do with is, that as yet no statute whatever has struck at it. If it is thought, as it may be thought, that such things ought to be prohibited, the Legislature must say that they intend to prohibit them; and, as I said before, they had better, with the experience which they have had of the working of the 23rd section, devise some remedy by which it can be enforced better than merely by subjecting the offender to some penalty. At present I only say that those things are not struck at, and are consequently out of the question, in considering this case. There were several cases where meat and drink was given by persons who were engaged in the election on the polling day; and where it was given before the polling was over, where the people were invited before the election was over, so that they knew of it, the distinction I have been pointing out, of where men have ceased to be agents, does not apply.

The clearest of the whole of that class of cases is that connected with Mr. Scott Chad, and Mr. Robert Magness, who was much mixed up with the matter at the same time. Now, as to that case, I think that all the facts came out very fully and perfectly satisfactory to my mind. My Brother Ballantine spoke of there being something behind not yet discovered. There may be something, but I feel tolerably confident that I really know all the facts that took place there as thoroughly as Mr. Scott Chad himself. I first of all say that I do think, on this evidence, Mr. Scott Chad must be considered an agent to some extent: I take the facts to be these; he is a considerable landed proprietor in the district, and when he was asked, not, I think, by the candidate personally, but by his authorised agent, to be upon the committee, and to act for them, he said, "No, I will not have anything to do with it, but I will answer for my own tenants." And he did, in fact, look after his tenants, and asked them, and reported to Mr. Loynes what was the result of his canvass, that his tenants would all go that side. I do not think there was any undue influence at all used, but they were all ready and willing to go; when that is the case, when a man who is asked in that way says, "I will look after a particular set of voters, my own tenants," and he does, in fact, canvass them, and nobody else does, I think he is an agent for the purpose of canvassing his tenants. I can hardly distinguish this case from the one I referred to of Westbury, where a manufacturer canvassed his own workmen much in the same way as Mr. Scott Chad did here. No doubt there were other circumstances there, that he was put on the committee, and so on; but the real governing point was that he was put forward, and consented to be the person upon whom they relied to get those voters, and, consequently, where that manufacturer did commit tyranny and oppression, and was guilty of undue influence, it was justly and properly held that that avoided the election of those who trusted him. And if Mr. Scott Chad had been shown to tyrannise over his tenantry, evicting them from their dwellings, or if he had been guilty of any other act of tyranny, that would have been undue influence upon his part at the election, and, consequently, would have avoided the election.

Norfolk

Then we come to consider would what Mr. Scott Chad did, taking him to be an agent in conjunction with Mr. Robert Magness, amount to treating? I think it far less clear that Mr. Magness was an agent, but he and Mr. Scott Chad were so mixed up together that I must take them together. The question is, Was the meat and drink which was given by them, given with the intention to influence votes at the present election or not? As to that, it is perfectly clear that Mr. Scott Chad sent round invitations to his tenants, and to several persons connected with his tenants, to come to the "Crawfish," I think it was, to dinner; and those invitations were sent round before the election took place, and everybody knew that he was going to give a dinner at the "Crawfish." There was another dinner that he gave elsewhere to his workmen, but one is enough, and I will not trouble myself about the other. It is equally plain that Mr. Magness, who appears to be the nephew of a gentleman of smaller property than Mr. Chad in the neighbourhood, at another inn did something very similar to what Mr. Scott Chad did, and to which Mr. Scott Chad invited one guest. It further appears that Mr. Scott Chad, when his tenantry and people came to the polling-place at Wells, provided a luncheon for them at the "Standard"; a moderate and reasonable luncheon; they did eat and drink at his expense, though not by any means much; and at the "Railway Hotel," Mr. Magness entertained others, I dare say rather more liberally (it appears that there was a little more drink given than at Mr. Chad's entertainment), but that he did pay for it, and that consequently meat and drink was given by him to voters.

Now, the question arises upon this, Was it done with that intention which the statute says is corrupt; was it done with the intention to influence the election, or to influence the votes at the election? As I said before, you must look at all the circumstances, the time, the place, the manner in which it was done, in order to see, taking it altogether, if it was done with a corrupt intention. Mr. Scott Chad seems to have had a well-founded confidence (perhaps he is a liberal landlord) that his tenantry would all come with him. Mr. Scott Chad says he did not think he was influencing the voters; he thought he had them all quite safe already, and I dare say that was so. That would not negative the possibility that the providing of such meat and drink might be corrupt treating, because a man might think, "I have got so many safe votes, but it would be a deal safer if I give them meat and drink in order to keep them in good humour"; and if it were done with that object, it would be done with a corrupt intention; but taking it altogether I come to the conclusion that, in the case of Mr. Scott Chad, what he did was not done to influence votes at the election. I think he thought he was safe enough without the necessity of his giving this entertainment. His intention was to keep up and promote his own influence; I draw the conclusion that the intention of those feasts was to promote the influence of the squire at some future election, at some future time, not to influence the votes to be given at the then pending election; and though it was done before the election was over, I think it comes to nearly the same thing. If that is judged by the Legislature an improper thing to do, and they wish to stop it, it is for them to devise some means of doing so. I can only come to the conclusion upon the law as it stands, that I do not think the cases I have mentioned are made out to be cases of corrupt treating. I need not go through the others, because I take Mr. Scott Chad's as being the clearest and most important.

I have then to come to that which finishes the cases of treating, viz., the lunch at Ormesby Hall, which does differ from all the rest in this, that what was done at Ormesby was done by Sir Edmund Lacon himself personally, and no question therefore arises about agency or anything of the sort. A great many things were done at different public-houses, particularly, for instance, Mr. Beck's giving a festival at the "Ormesby" beer house. All those I need not inquire into as to intention, because, as to them, there has been a failure of proof of any such agency as would have made the sitting Members responsible. But in what took place at Ormesby, Sir Edmund Lacon, of course, was his own agent, and from the manner in which the election was conducted, Mr. Walpole, must, I think, be responsible also for what took place there, and consequently, if what was done there was done with a corrupt intention, it would vacate the election. Now it is an excessively imprudent thing for a candidate to provide any entertainment at all for voters. In the course of the inquiries in which I have been engaged, I have found that very often the notion has prevailed, or at least it has been thought fit to say that it prevailed, that to give anything by a candidate in the nature of meat or drink was fatal to the election, and that idea has been used as a very salutary shield. Repeatedly in borough elections people have said to the candidate, "Give us something to drink; you will be a shabby dog if you do not"; and the answer has been, "I would willingly do it; I should have the greatest pleasure in obliging you, but the law says, if I give you the least morsel of food, or drop of drink, I shall lose my election." That is a very salutary notion, and acts as a protective machinery to the candidate, but I cannot lay down the law to the full extent that that goes to. If it were a possible thing I should wish that it should be believed by everybody to be the law, but though I cannot say that, this much I can say, that wherever a candidate or his agent does give any meat or drink, he does a very foolish and imprudent thing, because it becomes a question in every case, more or less, what the intention was in doing such a thing; he gives a plausible colour to people getting up a petition against him (and it is no small trifle even to be annoyed in that way); and it always does imperil his seat, for it always becomes a question of intention and a question of degree, and he always has more or less the chance of the judge who is to try the case being constrained to find that he thinks the meaning was to influence and affect the votes, and if so, it vacates the election. I have to see in the present case whether what took place at Ormesby was such as to make me think that that was the intention. In doing so, I must, first of all, make up my mind what was really done, and upon considering the matter, I have come to a conclusion which I think is correct. The billiard-room in which it appears this lunch was laid out, had a door opening into it, so that people could come into it, not clandestinely, but without going through the rest of the house. This billiard-room was evidently a very convenient place for people who were to come in and out of it, and to eat and drink in it without disturbing the rest of the family; much more convenient for that purpose than the dining-room. Then I find, taking the cook's evidence, which I have no doubt myself was accurate, that directions were given to roast, for the purpose of being laid out cold, a sirloin of beef, ribs of beef, and a silver side of beef; the precise number of pounds weight does not appear; one does not know what quantity those joints together would represent, but the quantity of cold meat would be probably 70 or 80 lbs. weight; it could not be much less. I suppose that each person would not eat much more than a half-a-pound, and it would follow that there was meat intended to be laid out that would serve for upwards of 100 people. One little thing I may mention, the silver side, if I am not mistaken, is an inferior piece of meat, which would not generally be used at the tables of gentry of the upper class, and consequently that does look a little as if it was intended to provide a coarser repast than would probably be provided for people of the same rank in life as Sir Edmund Lacon. I do not know whether I am right in the fact, but that is my impression; and taking that view of the matter, and considering the quantity, the place in which it was, and above all considering what took place afterwards, I cannot myself much doubt that that cold meat was laid out with the intention not to confine it to the 20 or 22 gentlemen who probably naturally came to luncheon, but that it was thought that there would be a great many people about who would come in and eat it, who would come in and go out when they liked. I cannot much doubt that that was the intention with which it was provided in that way. Then comes the question, was it intended to influence the voters so as to make a corrupt intention; that is a question more or less of degree, and everybody is capable of forming his own opinion upon that; I am far from saying others may not be right and I wrong; and indeed upon such questions as this, when I have made up my mind in the best way I can upon the subject, I always have an awkward feeling afterwards that I might as well have decided the other way; very likely I may be wrong; it is impossible to help that. But I must say I do not think it was made out that it was intended to influence the votes at the time; if it had been previously told to everybody that there was this entertainment to be provided, it would have been a much stronger case. If people who would be likely to be influenced by the notion that there was some cold beef to be provided at Sir Edmund Lacon's, had been told before hand, "Be sure you go and poll at Ormesby, because Sir Edmund is going to give you plenty to eat and drink," that would have been like influencing them, but as far as I have looked at the evidence I can find no indication of that; I think there is enough to indicate this, that after Sir Edmund had been at the polling place, and after he had on the Green met some gentlemen who were friends of his, and said, "If you go to Ormesby House you will get something to eat and drink"; he and his subordinate agents also said to other people, "You may go and get something to eat and drink at Ormesby House," and that that notion spread more and more; but in the case of every witness who was called it seems to have come upon him by surprise, and I cannot help thinking if it had been intended to get men to vote at this particular election they would have been told of it before hand; if it was an inducement to a man to vote it came rather late, when the man actually came to Ormesby in order to poll, to be told then for the first time there is something to eat and drink at Ormesby. Very likely it was a thing like that which Mr. Scott Chad had done; very likely there was an intention then to increase Sir Edmund Lacon's influence at a future election, and it may produce that effect, but, as I said before, I do not think that is struck at by the Statute; consequently the conclusion I come to upon all these cases of treating is, though the treating is not like the undue influence, frivolous and vexatious, yet that the cases of treating have completely failed.

Now, I come to a much more serious matter, the matter relating to Yarmouth. Now, the charge has been made that there was bribery there, and there is no doubt whatever that Mr. Serjeant Ballantine was justified in starting with this assumption, that he is entitled to say, this is a case in which from the antecedents bribery was a thing which was not at all unlikely to take place; he was entitled to start with saying this Blue Book pointed out that at Yarmouth there were several hundreds of people ready and anxious and willing to be bribed, and who have not been bribed, merely because they have not been offered the money; there are parties in Yarmouth ready and willing to take it. You find, then, that Sir Edmund Lacon himself has been mixed up in three or four elections there, where there had been undoubtedly, as this Blue Book shows, large sums of money spent, which came ultimately out of his pocket, with deliberate, and to me, wonderfully successful endeavours to keep him in ignorance that they were coming out of his pocket; but nevertheless they were so paid by him; and after this Blue Book had been published there could be no doubt in his mind or the mind of anybody else, that there were round about him in Yarmouth a large number of people ready and willing, as far as scruples of conscience went, to supply any quantity of money for bribery that was deemed prudent, and, consequently, I think Mr. Serjeant Ballantine was, as to anything that occurred at Yarmouth, entitled to start with a kind of presumption in his favour. It is like trying a man for receiving stolen goods with the knowledge that he has been a dozen times previously convicted of it, or trying a man for forging a Bank of England note with the knowledge that he has been before convicted for uttering counterfeit coin. It is not at all an unnatural or strong presumption that if bribery was desired there were plenty of people willing to do it; that the question whether there should be bribery or not was not a question of morality but a question of prudence. Something was said by Mr. O'Malley which I was rather sorry to hear, which causes me to make a remark which I should not otherwise have made. He said that there was nothing which had happened at Yarmouth which would cause any gentleman to think any the worse of Sir Edmund Lacon. Though it is true that many look upon bribery as nothing, to my knowledge that feeling is not universal, and I for one cannot look upon the acts shown to be done by Sir Edmund Lacon and Sir Edmund Lacon's friends as otherwise than disgraceful; but I pass that by. On the present occasion it further appears that there was by no means an endeavour to keep clear of those formerly concerned in corrupt matters, and Sir Edmund Lacon employed as his agent Mr. Diver. Sir Edmund Lacon stated that Mr. Diver was the partner of his former agent, Mr. Corry, the person who had been mixed up in that strange mysterious story of the 1,000 £. It was, however, a mistake on Sir Edmund Lacon's part to say he was a partner of Mr. Corry's. Mr. Diver explained that he managed Mr. Corry's business for him, and was not a partner. There was not an endeavour to keep clear of those who had been proved to have been guilty of corrupt practices, and no doubt, as I said before, it fairly stands that, as far as Yarmouth is concerned, the question was, was it a measure of prudence to bribe? And if it had appeared that any persons there engaged in the election had committed bribery, certainly there would not have been the smallest right on the part of Major Walpole, who had constituted them his agents, to complain or to be astonished if it had been made out that there had been bribery there. Then, though this evil character attaching to Yarmouth does make it much easier to convince one that there was bribery there, it does not dispense with the proof of it, and I must say the evidence by which it was attempted to show that there had been bribery at Yarmouth has completely failed. There was the story which that wretched man, Vines, was expected by those on the side of the petitioners to tell, which, when he came here, he told, that he was first employed upon the Liberal side, and that then he was employed by the Conservatives; and that then he had deliberately gone over to the other side and made false statements which he volunteered and wrote out, stating that he had been committing bribery of all kinds, and had received money for it. That is his story, whether true or not; and then he proceeded after having done this, in order to confirm his statement, to name a number of persons, who, according to his account, are innocent, and to assert that they had been given money, leading the agents for the petitioners to believe that he was prepared to swear to his statement. If he had come and sworn to all this, I should have supposed upon his cross-examination his antecedents would have been enough to make one not believe him a bit, but as it is he came into the box in a most unblushing way to say, "I have written all this, but it is all a pack of lies; I told it with the deliberate purpose of obtaining money under false pretences from the agent, and now I come to swear, with the most unblushing impudence, that all of it is a lie." Nothing shocked me more than the way in which that was received by the audience, exhibiting a total want of moral sense. Not only did they not seem to be aware how shocking it was for a man to be disgracing himself in that way, but there was a tendency to laugh, as if they thought it an admirable joke. If I wanted anything to convince me that bribery and corruption had a very evil effect, it would have been to see how that was received, and how it seemed to be supposed that in election matters all was fair and right; not only was it not received with the natural shock of horror which I expected, but there was an absolute absence of enough moral sense to make them aware that it must inevitably affect the mind of a man in my situation with horror and disgust. I acknowledge that it gave me a very poor opinion of that portion of the audience in the court at the time from Yarmouth and Norwich. But it is plain that no person could put the slightest credit in that man's evidence, or trust to it in the slightest degree.

Then there were one or two cases of bribery tried to be made out, upon which Mr. O'Malley was quite justified in saying what he did. The first was that of a man receiving half-a-sovereign at the station, which, from the nature of the story, whether the man was speaking the truth or not, could not be contradicted. As to the other case of a man who was accused of having taken a bribe direct from Mr. Preston, the story was told by a very doubtful and shaky kind of witness, in manner and appearance; and the story was capable of contradiction, and was contradicted by several persons, all of whom said it was a positive and absolute falsehood, and there is every reason for believing that it was an absolute falsehood; for if people at Yarmouth proceeded to do that which they had done before, viz., to give bribes, we cannot suppose that they would do it openly, we cannot suppose that they have lost all their old skill. You never had a chairman of a committee deliberately and publicly handing over the money in a committee-room, in the sight of strangers; the thing is incredible. Where there is deliberately-intended corruption, there are careful means (unsuccessful means, very often, but still careful means) that the bribery shall be done by some subordinate agent who is kept in the background, of whom it will be said, if he is shown to be committing bribery, "There is no evidence that he was an agent." That is the style in which bribery is generally committed, and the improbability of such a story about a bribe being given is enough to lead me to pay no attention to it. As to the rest of the evidence we have had to show that bribery was committed, it is quite true that Mr. O'Malley's observation is well founded upon that. It is quite true we have had five months in which there has been eager and anxious inquiry made, and they have got no more evidence of bribery being committed than that to which I have just referred, and I can only come to the conclusion that prudence has prevailed, and that bribery was not resorted to. I think, if any bribery was committed, certainly, if any bribery was committed on an extensive scale, there would have been some evidence to be found of it, and I can only come to the conclusion that they were prudent, and that they did not commit bribery. Consequently, that part of the case has failed, though I certainly think it was quite right to investigate that part of the case, and I do not blame those on the side of the petitioner for making every endeavour to watch and see that everything was strictly investigated.

Now, I come at last (and that concludes the whole matter) to the point that arises upon the enactment in the new Statute which for the first time is now attempted to be put in operation, and consequently I am the first person, I believe, who judicially expresses any opinion upon its construction. That enactment, the 44th section of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, is as follows: "If on the trial of any election petition under this Act any candidate is proved to have personally engaged at the election to which such petition relates as a canvasser or agent for the management of the election, any person knowing that such person has, within seven years previous to such engagement, been found guilty of any corrupt practice by any competent legal tribunal, or been reported guilty of any corrupt practice by a Committee of the House of Commons, or by the report of the judge upon an election petition under this Act, or by the report of commissioners appointed in pursuance of the Act of the Session of the 15th and 16th years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter 57, the election of such candidate shall be void." That is the section we have to deal with: in the first place, it is to be observed that the Legislature, probably from thinking that otherwise there would be such very great danger of elections being upset upon matters that should not bring about that result, have carefully confined the operation of the enactment to the candidate having personally engaged. In the passage I quoted from Lord Barcaple's judgment, where he is dwelling upon the different kinds of agency, the first class of cases to which he refers are those where, in order to prove the man guilty of a criminal charge, you have to prove the individual guilt of the man charged; not necessarily that he did it with his own hand, but his own personal guilt. So here the Legislature have said, that in order to bring the man who is alleged to have committed the offence, within the enactment, it is necessary that he shall have been personally guilty of such offence. I do not construe personal guilt in the sense of doing it with his own hand in order to bring him within this section. I do not think it is necessary to show that the candidate went and spoke to the scheduled man himself, and said, "Act as my agent"; but I think the Statute means that it must be brought home to his personal knowledge. If I send a man out with directions to hire somebody in order to shoot somebody else, I am personally guilty of murder if it is done, though I hire the murderer in a roundabout way, and though I may not know who ultimately did it. I think, however, what is required is, that it should be personal on the part of the candidate. I think this particular section means that where it is done with the candidate's "knowledge and consent," which is the phrase used in the section immediately preceding, then it amounts to a personal engagement. Then I proceed further to consider what the nature of the employment of the scheduled person is to be. It must be "as a canvasser or agent for the management of the election." I think, in construing the Statute, and seeing what is the sort of agency that is pointed at, it is not confined by any means to a paid agent. I do not think that is the meaning of the Statute, but I think he must be an agent for the management of the election. I do not think it is necessary that he should be an agent for the management of the whole election, it is enough if he is agent for part of the election; he must be not simply an agent who might be employed to such an extent as might make the candidate answerable for corrupt practices committed by him, but he must be employed in the way of managing a portion of the election. For instance, I have intimated my opinion that Mr. Scott Chad was an agent whose act, if he had been guilty of corrupt practices as regards any of his tenants, would have avoided the election, because he was agent to the candidate. If Mr. Scott Chad will pardon my supposing such a thing, if he had been scheduled I do not think his agency was of the character pointed at by this section. The agent must be an agent having something to do with the management of the election. Taking that view of the matter, and Mr. Preston being the only one whose case we have to consider (there was no evidence to show that Cooper was employed as an agent of that sort), the question is, is there any evidence here that Mr. Preston was engaged by either of the candidates personally as an agent in the sense I have intimated, in the management of the election? In the first place, as far as Major Walpole is concerned, there is no pretence whatever for saying that he engaged him in any such sense. Major Walpole tells us to-day he was well aware that there was a list of scheduled persons, and that he avoided meddling with them at all. He says that he was in ignorance that Mr. Preston was in the schedule, which I fully believe. I think it is a very natural and probable thing; for though Mr. Preston was put in the schedule for what was done in 1859 (and looking at the evidence, I must say I think the Commissioners could not well have done otherwise), still there is no more reason why Major Walpole should have known that he was in the schedule, than that he should have heard of the 500 or 600 other persons in the schedule. His was not one of the cases in which what was done would be prominent and notorious, and known to everybody. But Sir Edmund Lacon did not know it, and it was much more likely that he would be intimately aware of all that took place in that inquiry. And then comes the question whether Sir Edmund Lacon knowing that, knowingly consented to the employment of Mr. Preston in such capacity as I have mentioned, as a manager of the election? It is avowed, and not disguised at all, that Mr. Preston was asked to be chairman at one or two of the public meetings. It is not disputed (the candidates of course both knew of it) that Mr. Preston was asked by Sir Edmund Lacon to propose him at the election, and he did do that; but neither of those acts in themselves are acts which in the slightest degree make him an agent for the management of the election. Then, further than that, we have evidence that Mr. Preston did act in a capacity which would have made him an agent in the management of the election to some extent. I think it appears, though there was some difficulty in getting at it, that Mr. Preston attended the meetings of one of the committees, the Yarmouth committee, that he took an active part in it, that he was the chairman of it and acted as such, and I think that was evidence tending to show that he was manager of part of the election, so as to bring him within the Statute. There was a good deal of difficulty in getting at handbills and circulars, which it was alleged were signed by Mr. Preston. One was put in to-day signed by Mr. Preston, and I can hardly doubt that the others were also signed by Mr. Preston. It certainly is rather a remarkable thing that with the exception of that produced to-day, not one of those handbills should be forthcoming, and I cannot much doubt that the others would have borne the same signature, and consequently I come to the conclusion that Mr. Preston was acting as the chairman of the committee, and if the question were solely if he had committed an ordinary corrupt practice, whether such act committed by him had been brought home to an agent of the candidate, I should have thought that it was so brought home. I have very little doubt that the people at Yarmouth did know this; but the Legislature has for some reason thought fit to enact that the employment of the scheduled person, in order to bring the case within the Statute, must be a direct personal engagement by the candidate. Sir Edmund Lacon says that he did not know of Mr. Preston's acting as chairman of the committee and so on, and I think it probable that he did not. I suppose that Mr. Preston's so acting was with the knowledge of Sir Edmund Lacon's agents; they were aware of this Statute, and they were aware that by the employment of scheduled persons there would be a risk of upsetting the election; nevertheless, they thought it better to have the influence of Mr. Preston, and one or two others, acting on the committee in the same way. But at the same time, while they so procured their influence, they would do, as they had done in former cases, take great care that Sir Edmund Lacon should not know of it. Sir Edmund Lacon having been practised in former elections at Yarmouth, having seen the wisdom of not asking about money, or about questions of this sort, there is a great probability that this was not known to Sir Edmund Lacon. That would not prevent me coming to the conclusion that it was personally done by him, if I could see any evidence to show that he knew really that it was going to be done; his wilfully shutting his eyes to it would not prevent me from concluding that Sir Edmund Lacon was responsible for it; but I cannot find any such evidence.

That being so, I can only come to the conclusion that that part of the case fails. That part of the case was a very proper one indeed to investigate, and if the petition had been confined to that point alone, and had been against Sir Edmund Lacon only, I should have thought the petition a very proper one indeed to be brought forward; and if that had been so, probably, though I decided against the petition, I should not have decided that the petitioner should pay the costs. But the petition has been brought against both Members, and has extended over all the county; and it is impossible not to see that large expense must have been incurred on matters in which there has been a complete failure of proof. So that I must come to the conclusion, which what I have already said has indicated, that both Members were duly elected, and that in the present case there is no reason to depart from the ordinary rule that the costs must follow the event, and therefore the petitioner must pay the respondent's costs.

NORTHALLERTON ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Willes, 15th April 1869.

Mr. Justice Willes.] THE scrutiny is over in favour, so far, of the sitting Member, and it only remains to determine whether the election is void or not. I do not know that I am called upon to go through all those points which were reserved upon the scrutiny, because I have given credit for the purpose of determining whether it would be useful to proceed further with the scrutiny for all the votes that could be obtained by the Petitioner upon the most favourable view of the cases presented. I believe that I should not be assisting anybody if I were to express an opinion upon them, although during the evening I passed through my mind the cases, and looked up again those cases before the Committees bearing upon them; but I think it would be pedantic to give an elaborate judgment upon a scrutiny which has turned out to be abortive. I can only say, assuming that I were in favour of the Petitioner upon all the cases presented in the course of the scrutiny, there would still remain a balance in favour of the sitting Member, and the only question is whether the election of the sitting Member was void upon any of the grounds which vitiate Parliamentary elections. It is now so well settled, and I think I may say accepted by the profession and the public, that a Parliamentary election is void if the Member or any agent of the Member is guilty of any corrupt practice in the course of the election, that it is only necessary to state that that is the principle upon which the person sitting here ought to decide the prayer of the Petition, that the election should be held to be void.

Northallerton.

I have already stated my opinion that it is not proved that Mr. Hutton was guilty of any corrupt practice. The corruption charged against him was a promise attributed to indiscretion, but which I could hardly characterise by so mild a name if he really gave it to Mrs. Causfield, that she should have land and a cow if she got her husband to vote for Hutton. Of course, if that promise was given it was grave misconduct, and such as Mr. Hutton, even at his age, I think, must be perfectly aware was grave misconduct, and would defeat the election. But I must say with respect to Mrs. Causfield, that I am perfectly satisfied that her wish was father to the thought, and not anything that she really heard from Mr. Hutton. The most charitable view towards her would be to suppose that she construed the ordinary politeness of a candidate towards the womankind in the house where he went to canvass, to be an assent not to anything she asked for, but to something that she had very strongly in her mind a desire to get, and either has persuaded herself she asked for, or has made up her mind to assert that she asked for. Her evidence is either evidence inaccurate or evidence false; I am satisfied that it was one or other, and that the charge against Mr. Hutton of personal corruption in the election altogether failed.

Then there was a variety of charges of bribery against agents of Mr. Hutton, beginning with the case of the ragman, who spoke of being promised by a person named George Clark that he should have his rags; and there followed a variety of witnesses who spoke with more or less clearness, either in affirming or in denying, for some of them denied that which they were called upon to affirm, that promises or hopes were held out that benefits might be obtained from Mr. Hutton in the way of land. One of the witnesses was Ann Mark, whose case was disposed of incidentally in the course of the day. But I think with respect to evidence of that class that the judge before defeating an election ought to be very sure. I ought not to say very sure, but ought to be sure; he ought to have reasonable assurance that there really was a bribe held out, or promise of some particular benefit to the voter in case he voted or abstained from voting; and he ought to be sure that those general, and, very often, more often than not, exaggerated commendations of the wealth, and the liberality and other qualities of the candidate, have not been construed or tortured by the particular witness into a promise of some special benefit to himself. Of course the whole constituency ought to choose the best man for their Member, and yet they have a right to choose the best man, not only for the council of the nation, but also with reference to the neighbourhood itself, and with reference to the special interest, I may say, of a paternal character, which the Member may take in his constituency, which a Member often takes, and which displays itself in various ways; in the way of pecuniary benefit for public objects, subscriptions to charities, looking after poor people, and so on; a general benefit to people, whether they were blue or yellow, as soon as the excitement of the election is over. And the judge ought to be satisfied in his own mind that the conversation out of which a bribe is sought to be extracted, the promise of some valuable consideration for voting or not voting, really had a special character; that it was not a mere general commendation of the Member as being a good man for the place. I must say, taking the evidence upon the one side and upon the other together, I cannot bring my mind to the conclusion that in any one instance an agent of Mr. Hutton did make a promise of a corrupt character to a voter at the election; it certainly has not been proved to my satisfaction. When I say of a corrupt character, I call everything of a corrupt character that has a tendency to influence a man's vote with reference to mere lucre, instead of honest considerations, including considerations of that legitimate influence which I have already stated it is impossible to exclude, and which the attempt to remove by law I believe would probably turn out, I am sure would turn out, to be very ineffectual, because it is part of the nature of things, which the law has to deal with and to regulate, and which it cannot alter.

Then I pass over the head of corruption, which one has had to consider in other places, that of treating, by saying that in only one instance has there been a suggestion of any treating in this place; that glass of beer and cigar which we heard of to-day I think were the only bodily forms which the treating took. There was a suggestion of it at one period of the proceedings, I think, but only a suggestion, in order to withdraw any charge founded upon it. Now I must be allowed to say upon this, that there is moderation in all things, and there ought to be a moderation even in one's desire to sweep away the corruption which is alleged to be so prevalent, but which in many of the places I have visited, certainly including Northallerton, has been rather thought of by the suspicious than established by any proof. There is some moderation, and I think if I were to take serious notice of the cigar and glass of beer given some time before the election, I should not leave a good character for wisdom behind me in Yorkshire. It was no corrupt treating.

Then I go on to the case of intimidation, and I quite agree with what was said by my brother O'Brien, as to intimidation. It probably is not the most dangerous form of corruption, because if it is carried into effect, it is sure to be proved by the victim of it, and in two signal instances in the course of these election proceedings, the elections have been set aside upon the ground of intimidation, in the form of workmen being turned away because they chose to have different political opinions from their masters, or from the managers under their masters. That, of course, the law will not tolerate. The law will not tolerate that a man should tyrannise over the opinions of others; and if an agent of the candidate is guilty of the misconduct of doing so, the candidate cannot retain his seat, even though he himself be entirely innocent of any interference in the matter, and even though it should turn out that it had no real effect upon the majority. Corruption in any form is odious, corruption in that form is detestable. Only a rogue, as a rule, can be bribed; he is a rogue by accepting the offer, but an honest man may be intimidated. It is sufficient, however, to say that the law is such that if you prove intimidation by an agent you defeat the election. In this case intimidation is said to have been practised upon the voter, Mr. Stubbings. Mr. Stubbings does not appear to have been intimidated. He appears to have given his vote, as he finally made up his mind to do, for the yellow party. But if a person who tried to intimidate him turned out to be an agent of Mr. Hutton, even though the intimidation were not successful, it would defeat the election. The real question is, whether Curry or any of the other persons who formed part of the congregation of Mr. Stubbings, did cast intimidation upon him. Curry did canvass for Mr. Hutton.

Mr. O'Malley.] There is no proof of Curry canvassing.

Mr. Justice Willes.] I have looked through the evidence, and there is, I think, evidence by one person to the effect that Reed and Curry canvassed.

Mr. O'Malley.] Not Curry.

Mr. Justice Willes.] I should be very glad to be corrected, but my impression is that there was evidence of Curry canvassing. I will ask Mr. Hutton whether Curry went with him canvassing?

Mr. Hutton.] No, my Lord.

Mr. Justice Willes.] Curry did not go with you?

Mr. Hutton.] No.

Mr. Justice Willes.] I understood one of the witnesses to state that Curry did go with you canvassing.

Mr. O'Malley.] He did not even know him.

Mr. Serjeant O'Brien.] He might be with him, and not know him.

Mr. Justice Willes.] I suppose I rather assumed it in consequence of the evidence not being stopped; but in the view I take it is not material, and probably in the view Mr. O'Malley took it is not material. Certainly, this is the first time I have heard that the evidence as to Curry was objected to on the ground that he was not an agent. I was rather assuming him to be an agent, and I thought one of the witnesses had stated that he canvassed.

Mr. O'Malley.] It would not be an objection to his evidence.

Mr. Justice Willes.] What do you say was the evidence?

Mr. Serjeant O'Brien.] I do not say that we affected Mr. Hutton with any agency upon the part of Curry. I have been inquiring of my friend Mr. Shield —

Mr. Justice Willes.] Then this ought not to have been introduced at all into the first part of the case. This really is disposed of with the scrutiny. It would have been a serious serious error on my part if I were going to deal with the act done as being an act affecting the election, to take it even upon the silence of counsel that Curry was agent; but I have been rather assuming, as Curry was not stated point blank not to be the agent in the previous part of the case, that he was one of those persons who was said to have gone about canvassing with Mr. Hutton.

Mr. Serjeant O'Brien.] I was under the same impression.

Mr. Justice Willes.] It was my impression, but I have Mr. Hutton's statement that he was not. I do not think you had told us that before, Mr. Hutton?

Mr. Hutton.] I was not asked the question.

Mr. Justice Willes.] Then it passed sub silentio. I will finish what I have to say upon the assumption, for argument sake, that he was the agent, because that is the view I have been taking of the case. I have excluded Goldsborough from the case, because I think Goldsborough, upon Stubbings's own account of the matter, did not intimidate him in reference to his vote at all. He objected to his allowing the school-room to be used by one political party; whether that was a reasonable or an unreasonable objection—I am inclined to think it was a reasonable objection—it certainly does not appear to me to come within the 5th section. But with respect to Curry, assuming that he were an agent for Mr. Hutton, I am called upon to decide that Mr. Stubbings's account of the matter is correct, that Curry, without any reason whatsoever, except the desire to serve the political party to which he belonged, threatened Mr. Stubbings that he would give up his pew in the chapel if he voted, according to his conscience, for the yellows, if he did not sit still. If that were so, I desire to say, as at present advised, I should have held it to be a case of intimidation within the 5th section, and should have thought it necessary to go back through the notes for the purpose of satisfying my mind whether there was, as I had supposed, any evidence which would justify me in holding Curry to be an agent (I think not after Mr. Hutton's statement, to which I give entire credence), or whether, on the other hand, I should take Curry's account of the matter, and conclude that what passed between him and Stubbings was not really an act of intimidation on the part of Curry, or so intended; that it was not a tyrannical interference with another man's vote, but that it was a resolution come to by him in honest anger at Stubbings, for having changed his mind as to sitting still, which Curry alleges he had undertaken to do. Curry states that what took place was no intimidation at all on his part, but that it was a thing done in anger, whether reasonable or unreasonable, in consequence of Stubbings, as he thought, behaving in a shifty manner. And without justifying Curry, because a man has quite a right to change his mind as to whether he will vote or not up to the last moment; but without justifying what Curry did, I do not think I ought to come to the conclusion against him that he really meant it as intimidation. It was, I must use the expression, a squabble in the congregation, without any thought of intimidation upon the one side or upon the other. Looking to the relation between the parties, and to the unusual character of this sort of intimidation, which generally comes from the opposite direction, if it comes at all, I think I should be wrong in passing upon Curry the severe judgment that Stubbings seemed disposed to do, and without expressing any opinion further upon the subject, I should not have been content to act upon Curry's passage with Stubbings, even if it had been proved, which it now turns out it was not, that Curry was an agent.

With respect to Palliser, I was very strongly impressed with that case when it was opened, and indeed up to the end of the case for the Petition, and until Palliser himself was called and examined. But I quite believe Palliser's evidence, and when Cross was called it became as clear as light, that the letter which formed the whole sting of the charge of intimidation as against Palliser, was a letter written by Cross, as a bad joke, for the purpose of frightening Palliser's workmen, and that Mr. Palliser had nothing whatsoever to do with the matter. Cross appears to have apologised for that as long since as October, and that apology was published, and everybody must have known of it. I must say I feel slightly hurt at the thought of the apology not having been brought forward earlier to my notice, because I have been wasting a great deal of, I hope not unwholesome, sentiment on the case of Palliser, thinking that I should certainly have to set aside this election by reason of the letter of the 25th of September, which he was supposed to have written to his workmen, and which, if he had written, would have been an infamous act—an act worthy of all the objurcation cast upon it by my brother O'Brien; but the letter appears not to have been written by Palliser at all, but to have been invented by Cross, who I hope will conduct himself better in America, otherwise he will be very likely to meet with summary justice if he is not reached by the slower process of legal proceedings.

This appears to be the whole of the case. The only general remark I have to make is, that Northallerton has passed through the ordeal with very great credit. I must deem and determine that John Hutton, the Member whose election is complained of by the Petition, was duly elected and returned. I must report, that no candidate at the election is shown to have been guilty of any corrupt practices, and that there was no corrupt practice at the election with the knowledge and consent of either candidate. And I must further report, that no corrupt practices extensively prevailed, and that there is no reason to suppose that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the election. With regard to costs, I see nothing to exempt this case from the general rule.

SARUM, NEW, ELECTION—(SPECIAL CASE).

New Sarum.

JUDGMENTS delivered by the Lord Chief Justice Bovill, Mr. Justice Willes, Mr. Justice Montague Smith, and Mr. Justice Brett, 5 May 1869.

Special Case.

Lord Chief Justice Bovill.] I AM clearly of opinion that the 98th section of the Registration Act of 1843 is incorporated with "The Representation of the People Act, 1867," and that this case must be governed by the construction which we think ought to be placed on that section. The occasion of this enactment was the doubts which are recited to have arisen with respect to the power of Election Committees to inquire into the validity or invalidity of the votes of persons being upon the register; and after providing for certain cases, the section concludes by enacting, "that except in such cases, or on such grounds as aforesaid, the register of voters in force at the time of such election shall, so far as regards the proceedings before such Committee, be final and conclusive to all intents and purposes as to the right to vote in such election of every person who shall be upon such register."

If we were to give effect to Mr. Quain's argument, the result would be, that instead of the register being conclusive, we should hold it to be only primâ facie evidence of the right to vote. But the words are express that the register shall be conclusive except in the cases which are previously mentioned. What are those cases which are previously mentioned? One case is where an objection has been raised before the revising barrister, and the vote had either been allowed or expunged, or refused to be inserted by the express decision of the revising barrister. That must refer to matters which might properly come before the revising barrister, and upon which the right to be upon the register would depend. It is only those matters upon which he could give an express decision. All cases relative to the general qualification would seem to come clearly within that part of the section, and possibly others also. The second case in which the register is not to be conclusive, is where there is at the time of voting a legal incapacity under an Act of Parliament. And the third case is that of legal incapacity at the time of voting, which may have arisen subsequently to the expiration of the time allowed for making out the list of voters from which the register of voters in force at the time of such election shall have been formed. Those are the three cases in which the register is not to be conclusive.

Now it is not contended on the part of the Appellant, that the present case comes within the first class, namely, where there has been an express decision of the revising barrister. Also it is not contended that this is a legal incapacity arising subsequently to the expiration of the time allowed for making out the list of voters. But it is contended by Mr. Quain that it does come within the second class of cases, namely, of legal incapacity at the time of voting under and by virtue of the statute.

The nature of this objection is one which goes to the qualification and to the right to have been upon the register at all. It is an objection which might have been taken before the revising barrister, and upon which the revising barrister might have been required to give an express decision. But the objection was not raised before him, and he was not required to decide it. It was a matter which existed at the time of making out the lists of voters, and at the time when the revision court was held. And the objection was one, which, if good (about which I do not mean to suggest any doubt), might have been taken, and upon which the votes might have been disallowed. Had the objection been taken and the voters' names been struck off, in that case there would have been an express decision, and the question would have been brought within the first class of cases, in which the register is not to be conclusive by express enactment. It seems to me that if the objection is to the general qualification, as this is, the case then comes within the description of the first class of cases, upon which the decision of the revising barrister must be taken, otherwise that the register will be conclusive.

I cannot give the wider interpretation, which Mr. Quain proposes, to the words "legal incapacity at the time of voting," because that would include all cases which the revising barrister might have decided, including all questions of qualification in the sense that Mr. Quain has contended for. The words are "incapacity at the time of his voting under and by virtue of any statute," and those words are very well satisfied by placing the construction upon them for which Mr. Mellish contends, without including cases where it is sought to object to the general qualification upon which the right to be upon the register depends. If a man at the time of voting is an officer of the Customs or Excise, or is employed by the Government in the Post Office, there is a legal incapacity under a statute, and the clause would clearly apply to those cases. There may be others, but whatever cases may be included within those words, I am clearly of opinion that the words "legal incapacity at the time of voting under a statute," as used in the 98th section, do not include this objection, which is one to the general right or qualification to be placed upon the register. Therefore it seems to me that this case is not brought within any one of the three exceptions mentioned in section 98. It is only in cases which are brought within one of those three exceptions that the register can be opened, and in all other cases it is declared expressly by the statute, that the register shall be final and conclusive to all intents and purposes. This case not being brought within either of the three exceptions, I think that this register was final and conclusive, and that the present appeal must be dismissed.

Mr. Justice Willes.] I AM of the same opinion. I would only add, that no case has been produced in which it ever has been argued or suggested, that I know of, under the 98th section, that the fact of a man not having been rated before the 31st July (an objection which must have been then complete in order to be effectual, so that in every case in which it could be effectual the objection might have been disposed of before the revising barrister), has been re-heard upon a proceeding analogous to that upon which we are engaged at the present time—I mean before an Election Committee. There have been many cases before Election Committees in which more doubtful points have been rejected, where the objection was complete before the 31st of July, and no point was raised before the revising barrister. I will take, for instance, the case of Ailesbury, which is reported in 1st Power, Rodwell, & Dew, page 82. The Reform Act retained the qualification of the Ailesbury freeholders in respect of persons who had a right to vote on the 7th of July 1832, and the objection was taken in that case to the Petitioner's right to vote, because he was a minor on the 7th of July 1832. But he had come of age before the election, and upon its appearing that no objection had been taken before the revising barrister, the Committee held that he was a good Petitioner, although objection had been taken before the Committee to his right of voting, and consequently to his right to Petition.

I cannot recollect to have met, in the election reports, with any case in which an objection to the registration complete before the 31st of July, not raised before the revising barrister, has been allowed to be raised before the Committee. That being so, I should have thought that the common-sense interpretation of the 98th section would afford very strong grounds for declining to take a new course.

Mr. Justice Montague Smith.] I AM of the same opinion. The rating is part of the qualification as much as the occupation of the tenement, or, under the old Reform Act, the value of the tenement; and if this Court could go into the question of rating, which might have been gone into before the revising barrister, it follows, as was admitted by Mr. Quain, that the Court would have equal jurisdiction to entertain all questions which go to make up the qualification of occupation, or the other qualifications which are given, although not decided by the revising barrister. The words on which he relies are those found in the latter part of the 98th section of the 6th Victoria, c. 18, "and also that it shall and may be lawful for such Committee to inquire into and decide upon the right to vote of any person who, being upon such register, shall have voted in such election, so far as the same may be disputed on the ground of legal incapacity at the time of his voting under and by virtue of any statute." Looking at that enactment with the previous part of the clause, it seems to me plain that the Legislature intended to draw a distinction between the title of a person to be put on the register, in respect of occupation or otherwise, and all the matters that go to make up that title, and the legal incapacity to exercise the right to vote, although the name of such person was upon the register; and that it was intended that in the latter case only should an inquiry, under any circumstances, take place by the Committee as an original inquiry. In the clauses which give the right to vote in the Act of 1867, a distinction is again made between legal incapacity to vote and the matters which go to the title to vote by reason of the man being an inhabitant occupier. The 3rd clause is, "Every man shall be entitled to be registered as a voter, and, when registered, to vote for a Member or Members to serve in Parliament for a borough, who is qualified as follows (that is to say): 1. Is of full age, and not subject any legal incapacity," which goes to the personal status of the man. Then the rest of the clause relates to his qualification or title to an occupation franchise. "2. Is on the last day of July in any year, and has, during the whole of the preceding 12 calendar months, been an inhabitant occupier, as owner or tenant, of any dwelling-house within the borough; and, 3. Has, during the time of such occupation, been rated as an ordinary occupier in respect of the premises so occupied by him within the borough, to all rates (if any) made for the relief of the poor in respect of such premises; and 4. Has, on or before the 20th day of July in the same year bonâ fide paid an equal amount in the pound to that payable by other ordinary occupiers in respect of all poor rates."

Mr. Quain argued that inasmuch as it had been before held, as he stated, by the Committees of the House of Commons, that they had the power to go into the right to vote, and to strike off the vote from the poll where a man had ceased to reside after the 31st of July, and so was disabled from voting by non-residence under the proviso in the 79th clause of the 6th Victoria, c. 18, and as they had done that, as he asserted, by virtue of the power at the end of the 98th section, therefore treating it as a legal incapacity, it gave him a foundation for contending that the words "legal incapacity" in that 98th section, would extend to all the elements which went to make up the vote. I have not sufficient knowledge of all the cases before Committees, to say whether it has been so decided or not; but certainly it seems to me that it was unnecessary so to decide. The only way in which effect could be given to the proviso of the 79th section, namely, that a man ceased to be entitled to vote if he had not resided within the borough during the whole period from the 31st day of July to the time of voting, at all events where the non-residence was subsequent to the revision, was by a decision of the House of Commons. Therefore if this express power to inquire into the right to vote on the ground of legal incapacity had not been given in the 98th clause, I should have thought that the Committee, by necessary implication, would have had jurisdiction and power to give effect to the positive and prohibitory words of the enactment of the 79th section, by striking off the vote of a man who had not resided ever since the 31st of July. It is unnecessary to go into the other questions, which Mr. Mellish admitted were of some doubt, because they really do not arise in the view we take. It seems to me in this case that it is perfectly clear that this Court has no power to touch the register by striking off these votes, or to strike them off from the poll of the Respondent.

Mr. Justice Brett.] It seems to me perfectly clear that the 79th and 98th sections of the 6th Victoria, c. 18, are applicable to the new franchises given under the Statute of 1867. It seems to me that there is a difference, and a great difference, between "the title to be registered" and "the capacity to vote." By the 3rd section of the Act of 1867 every person shall be "entitled to be registered" who is qualified in a particular way. That section, therefore, goes to the title to be registered. The objection which is taken to the votes in question seems to me to be one exclusively pointed to the title to be registered. That being so, the case falls within the 79th section of the 6th Victoria, c. 18, and within the latter part of the 98th section, but is not within the first part of the 98th section, because the point raised was not expressly decided by the revising barrister. Where the objection is one taken exclusively to the right to be registered, it cannot, in my opinion, be questioned by the Court any more than it could formerly be by the Committee, unless the revising barrister has expressly decided upon the point. And the present case, as it seems to me, is not within the other enactments of the 6th Victoria, c. 18, because the objection has nothing at all to do with the question of legal incapacity as distinguished from the title to be registered. I think, if we were to hold otherwise, we should be holding contrary to every decision of every Committee of the House of Commons which has been given since the passing of the 6th Victoria, c. 18. We should be what has been called opening the register. I think that unless we can see clearly that a continued course of decisions of Committees upon a given point has been wrong, we ought not to decide contrary to those decisions. So far from those decisions being wrong upon the point now under discussion, I am of opinion, so far as I can judge, that they were clearly right; and therefore I think that this objection cannot be maintained.

Mr. Mellish.] My Lords, I am to ask for costs.

Mr. Quain.] The costs are left to your Lordships' discretion, by agreement between the parties.

Lord Chief Justice.] We need not trouble Counsel. This is a special case reserved for the opinion of this Court; the decision is in favour of the Respondent, and there is no reason why the usual course should not be followed. The costs must follow the event.

SOUTHAMPTON TOWN ELECTION.

Southampton
Town.JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Willes, 23rd April 1869.

[Mr. Justice Willes.] THIS is a Petition praying that it may be determined that Russell Gurney and Peter Merrick Hoare were not duly elected or returned at the last election for this borough, and that the election was void, or that George Moffatt, a candidate at the election, was duly elected, and ought to have been returned.

It is quite unnecessary, in disposing of the Petition, that I should say much, because the views which I entertained upon the various questions of law arising upon the facts were stated yesterday for the purpose of indicating to the learned counsel for the Respondents what part of the case made on the part of the Petitioners appeared to require attention and answer from the Respondents. So far as the claim to the scrutiny is concerned, inasmuch as it has been withdrawn and all the evidence which might possibly have been brought before the Court has not been laid before me in a form in which I can deal with it judicially, it would not be right, I think, to say more than that I am satisfied that the learned Serjeant, brother Ballantine, has given very prudent and wise advice to his client, so far as I can form a judgment upon the case. So far as it would be proper that I should express an opinion, I may express a very decided one, not so much in point of law as with reference to the conduct of an advocate, although brother Ballantine does not require any expression of opinion from me in favour of his prudence; I repeat that I am thoroughly satisfied, and I desire to say so emphatically, if it be any satisfaction to his client, that the advice which he has given was very prudent and wise advice under the circumstances of this case.

Passing away to the subject of the Petition, it is right to make a few general remarks; I do not propose to exhaust all that could be said upon the case, but rather to say what may be useful in order to prevent any mistake as to the ground of the decision.

There is no suggestion, and certainly there is no ground for suggesting, that there was any general or prevalent corruption or suspicion of such at the last election for this borough. There is no suggestion, and no suspicion of any system of bribery; treating is out of the question, except so far as any remark is to be made upon the two gallons of beer which appeared to have been given to the men at the docks, not by anybody connected with the Respondents; and any general intimidation is out of the question.

The Petition was founded upon suggestions of individual cases of bribery and individual cases of intimidation. Where there is no general corruption in a constituency, when you come to deal with individual cases, it is necessary, in order to vitiate and void the election, to prove not only a violation of the law, but that that violation took place with the knowledge and consent of the Member or an agent of the Member. I may dispose of all the cases of alleged bribery, with the exception of what was insisted upon as to the employment of the children of voters, and with the exception of the suggestion made in the evidence of Withers, by saying that the persons who are alleged to have bribed are not shown to have been agents of either of the Respondents. I may take one case, that was the man of the name of Chandler, who spoke of being bribed with a promise of 10 s. worth of drapery goods for his wife, by a Mr. Biddlecombe, as an instance of the class of cases got rid of by this remark. There was no proof that Biddlecombe was an agent of Mr. Gurney or of Mr. Hoare; if Mr. Biddlecombe had been an agent of Mr. Gurney or Mr. Hoare, it would have been, unless that case was disproved or explained, a ground for defeating the election. As Mr. Biddlecombe does not appear to have been an agent of Mr. Gurney or of Mr. Hoare, unless further investigation for the purpose of the scrutiny had removed the evidence of Chandler, or rather of his wife (because I need hardly say I paid very little attention to such a person as Chandler described himself to be), the only result would have been that the vote of Chandler and the vote of Biddlecombe would have gone off on the scrutiny.

It is right to add, in order to prevent any mistake of what the law may be, that a considerable number of such cases, even though not traced to any agency affecting the Members amounting to general corruption, would have the effect of defeating the election apart from agency; I am dealing now with the effect of some few cases, and in dealing with one or a few cases, any charge of general corruption being out, it is necessary to establish agency; and in Chandler's case, and some others which it is unnecessary to go through (as I named all of them, I think, in the course of yesterday), either proof or suspicion of the existence of agency was not in any of them established.

That brings me to the cases in which agency was established; I think it right to say that I rather anticipated the course which has been taken. I have gone through the whole of this evidence carefully in the course of last evening and this morning, and I rather came to the conclusion that that would take place which has taken place. That may account for my being prepared to state what I think of the matter, without taking time for further deliberation. I rather think that in the course of yesterday the only cases in which agency was established appeared to be the cases spoken to in Withers' evidence, and the employment of the boys as affecting the question of bribery ; and the case of Mr. Day, as affecting the charge of undue influence. With respect to Withers, his evidence may be put out of the case with a word. According to him, he went upon an expedition, near the close of the poll, with Mr. Gray, who was the agent of Mr. Hoare, and bribery was spoken of in a manner and under circumstances such as made it exceedingly likely that Mr. Gray was upon a bribing expedition ; and if Mr. Gray had not been called to give his own account of the matter, it would have been necessary to consider how far Withers ought to be believed, and his evidence acted upon. In arriving at a conclusion upon that, of course quite apart from the aspect of the man, and the watching of the mode in which he conducted himself in the box, there would have to be taken into consideration the account he gave of himself and of his previous transactions ; not at all upon the ground that he happened to be unfortunate in business, because that will happen to the best man, and may be open to explanation, but upon the ground that he made what appears to me to be a point blank false statement as to the circumstances which, but for the learned counsel having, probably unknown to Withers, the means of exposing the falsity of it, would have passed muster as truth. There was strong reason for thinking that Withers was not a man much to be depended upon. Had that evidence not been answered, Mr. Gray being in court, I think that gentleman would have run the risk of the Court believing what was said against him, even by a shifty person like Withers, when he had an opportunity of answering it and did not answer it. However, Mr. Gray was called, and contradicted the statement of Withers, under circumstances in which I believe him. It does seem improbable in the highest degree, that the agent of a Member picking up a stranger, whom he had never seen before the day of the poll, on that day and at a critical period of it, should expose himself to detection in the way Mr. Gray is said to have done ; and I think when the evidence of those witnesses comes to be compared, Mr. Gray's is to be preferred to that of Withers ; and therefore brother Ballantine certainly lost nothing by at once saying, as became him, that he could not maintain the case upon Withers' evidence against that of Mr. Gray.

Then there is the case of the employment of the boys. I have gone through all that evidence with a view of seeing what it comes to. It appears that the municipal election took place upon the 2nd of November, and the Parliamentary election on the 17th and 18th of the same month. I must observe, with respect to those elections, that they are primâ facie distinct ; there is no necessary connection between them, and it is not enough to show misconduct with reference to the municipal election without connecting that election in some way with the Parliamentary election. No evidence was given in this case to connect the two elections, to show that they were part of one political contest. There have been cases in which it was clear that the municipal election and the Parliamentary election were part of one political contest, and that corrupt action at the municipal election either was expressly intended to operate upon the Parliamentary election, or that the necessary result of what was done at the municipal election was to affect the Parliamentary election ; whereupon the principle being applied that persons must be taken to contemplate the natural consequences of their acts, an intention to affect the Parliamentary election ought to be attributed to people who were shown to have misconducted themselves with reference to the municipal election, and to agents of the Members who have been guilty of corrupt practices in the course of the municipal election, but with a view to the effect of such practices upon the Parliamentary election, or the practices being such as must necessarily have affected the Parliamentary election. In such cases the judges have held that the two elections were, under the circumstances, really parts of one and the same political contest, and that the Members in the Parliamentary contest were bound by the acts of their agents in the course of the municipal contest. One of those cases was the case of Beverley, which has been very much discussed. Of course I do not at all refer to what took place in the House of Commons, although it would be prudery even to suggest that I do not know what took place there ; but many remarks have been made upon the course taken by my brother Martin at Beverley, in dealing with what was done immediately in respect of the municipal election, as having an effect upon the Parliamentary election. I desire to say, not at all with the view of confirming what my brother Martin said at Beverley, because his authority can receive no increase by such an addition, but in order to let it be known that I have thoroughly considered this matter, and whilst I concur in what was done in this respect by my brother Martin at Beverley, I act advisedly in the present case in not taking the same course here as was taken at Beverley, because here the evidence fails to connect the two elections. I desire to add, that at Blackburn I followed the same course which was taken by my brother Martin at Beverley (a course which I entirely approve), and held the Parliamentary election to be void in consequence of intimidation practised upon workmen, immediately following the municipal election, which, in my opinion, had a necessary effect upon the voters at the Parliamentary election. I only mention those cases for the purpose of saying that the circumstances of the present case are altogether different. There was no evidence here to show that the two elections, which legally and primâ facie are distinct, were connected, with the exception of the fact of Mr. Jellicoe having been employed as agent at the municipal election, and also having been employed as agent at the Parliamentary election. The same person happened to be employed as an agent at each by distinct employers, but it is not at all shown that Messrs. Gurney and Hoare took any part in the municipal election, or that otherwise than in that one respect was there any connection between the one and the other ; and the same remark applies, applies, so far as the evidence has gone, with respect to Mr. Moffatt and Captain Maxse, with regard to the municipal election.

Upon these grounds it appears to me that the employment of the boys at the municipal election by Mr. Jellicoe does not (I speak guardedly) have any necessary effect upon the Parliamentary election. And when I add to these circumstances the fact that neither Mr. Gurney nor Mr. Hoare ever were consulted about, or knew anything of the employment of, these boys, and that Mr. Hawse, the agent of Mr. Gurney, having before the municipal election found that a number of small boys were employed, forbade their employment with reference to the Parliamentary election, I think with respect to those who were employed only at the municipal election, it would be contrary to common sense and justice to bind the Parliamentary candidates with the employment of the boys for the municipal election purposes.

Now having said that, I will observe that with respect to a very great number of the boys who were called, it is clear to my mind, upon the evidence, that they were employed with reference to the municipal election only. And I say that, not only upon the evidence of Mr. Jellicoe (who was, I must say, a very nervous witness, whose hesitation possibly is open to explanation upon that ground), but quite apart from his evidence, I can refer to several of these boys who clearly were employed at the municipal election, and not at the Parliamentary election. One of them, for instance, is Joseph Paddington, a boy of 12. I came to the conclusion, upon comparing his evidence with that of his father, that it was for the municipal and not for the Parliamentary. I should say the same with respect to Albert Anthony; his age was not given. I should say the same clearly with respect to Thomas Bright, and the same with respect to William Kingswell. Now these are cases in which the evidence, whilst it was being given, seemed to act upon the Parliamentary election, but when it comes to be looked at and considered, it is clear that it applies to the municipal election only, and not to the Parliamentary election.

There is a great deal of evidence also which seems to be removed from the case. I think it is very questionable whether the evidence of Floyd comes to much. I marked his case with a query, as it went by. Looking over the notes, it is not at all clear to my mind that that is a case of consequence, except that the boy Floyd was one of the two boys who spoke of the work not being much. The boys generally spoke to having a good deal to do, and though they were idle for some hours in the day, they appear to have been watching and waiting to go on messages when they were wanted. I do not think that Floyd's case is of so much importance, except so far as that statement was given. I think that there was really work for these boys to do, although I am inclined to think, so far as I can judge, that it was rather overpaid, and paid somewhat more handsomely on the one side than on the other. One of these boys spoke to getting as much as 12 s. a week on the one side, and he went to the other side, and instead of getting only 2 s. a day, or 12 s. a week, he got 18 s. a week, or 3 s. a day. With respect to Simms, the youth of 15, he spoke of having real work, and the money was not paid to his father, as I collect from the evidence. That is a case of a boy grown up, and the money, as I recollect, not being paid over to his father. George Wareham was a boy who worked one day for nothing. He, of course, is out of the case. His services were lent, and he got nothing for them. George Hopkins was 20, and he appears to have got the work for himself, and not to have been employed at all at his father's request. Champness' son was 15, and he took his son away from the Tories as a point of honour, because he did not mean to vote for them. That again comes to nothing. Hurford proved nothing. Bartlett proved nothing, he had four sons, and none of them was employed. Henry Wyndham was 21, and he was not employed on the application of his father. That does not seem a case to be relied upon. Walter Cocks was not connected with a voter. I have already observed upon several who appeared distinctly to have been connected with the municipal election. Paddington, Anthony, Bright, and Kingswell. Hayes was called; he had two sons, and neither of them was employed. Alexander McDonald—I have not got his age, but, if I recollect, he was a sturdy, well-grown lad, who seemed quite able to take care of himself—was not one of the small boys, and he appears to have been employed not at all upon the application of his father, but upon his own; and I think his father said he was employed against his will or against his wish. He appears to have spent what he got upon himself. That is not a case that could be relied upon. Then as to John Smith, his son was 30 years of age. I take these rather in batches than in the order of the evidence. There was Saunders, who was a man in the same condition as John Smith, because his son was 25, and he was married, and Saunders got none of the money.

I think Sillance and Harrison are the only two I have not gone through. Sillance was the one who I think was first employed, at wages of 12 s. a week. That is one of the cases that would, unless disproved or explained, have gone off on the scrutiny. Sillance's account of himself was not so bad as that of the man Chandler; but it appeared that he was desirous of getting some consideration for his vote, and his son appears to have gone to the Whigs for a certain time, and got 12 s. a week, and having worked for them two weeks, as I collect, at the municipal election, he said they only paid for one week, and then, having promised them to vote, he broke away from them, and went to the Tories, who were to have given him 3 s. per day. The person who employed his son was Pope. Pope was not an agent. Pope was, I think, first stated to be a gardener, and afterwards described in a manner which led me to believe he was a groom; perhaps he is both; he certainly was not an agent. I refer to that case rather for the purpose of comparing the prices. I think I could form a pretty good guess what would be a fair sum to give a boy a week in regular employment, but I am not sure that I can trust myself to say exactly what would be a proper sum a day for occasional employment for a spurt, so to speak. I think it possible, under such circumstances, a little more than ordinary prices might be allowed; I do not feel called upon to give an opinion upon it. It would be only one of fact, and I do not pretend to have any particular knowledge upon the subject. One must have it proved tolerably clear before acting upon a case of alleged colourable employment as bribery, either that it was one where a man was employed apparently to do something, but really to do nothing, or next to nothing, so that the payment, or part of it, is as much a gift to him as if there was no pretence of employment at all; in other words, either that there really was nothing for him to do, or that the amount was something so obviously and distinctly beyond any fair payment for work, that the excess must be set down to corrupt intention. I think I may pass over Sillance's case. It is not very distinct in my mind that that boy, who was 14 years of age, was not employed at the Parliamentary election, even taking Mr. Jellicoe's evidence; but he is a bigger boy than many others. I might pass it by saying that in any construction of the evidence Pope would not be an agent. But supposing that I ought to conclude that he was employed at the Parliamentary election, and that Jellicoe must have known of it, I think the evidence does not come near what would justify a conclusion that it was a corrupt employment by Jellicoe so as to vitiate the election of his principals.

Then there was the case of Harrison. I must say that the case of Harrison, taking the account given by the father, is the most distinct of these cases for the purposes for which his evidence was given on the part of the Petitioner. That was the reason, no doubt, why he was called first. But when the evidence of the father comes to be compared with the evidence of the son, it is anything but distinct. It seemed at one time as if Harrison was called, not merely to prove an employment, and a colourable employment, but as if he meant to say that Mr. Jellicoe had actually bribed him—had given the son employment, upon the statement by Harrison that he would not vote either at the municipal or the Parliamentary election for the Tories unless the son had employment; and if you take the evidence of the father, the son was employed not merely at the municipal election, but up to the Saturday before the Parliamentary election. And he stated it with circumstances such as leave no doubt that the impression upon his mind was that the employment continued after the municipal election, and up to the eve of the Parliamentary election. He, however, stated that the employment was for a fortnight.

Now take the opposite side of the picture; it seems, when you come to look into his evidence, that the conversation in which he alleges that there was a stipulation for employment in a form which would be literally a bribe, was not with Jellicoe, but was with Pope; and when you come to compare his evidence with that of his son, it will be found that whilst the father speaks to a fortnight, the son speaks to a week, and the son is not certain as to the time when the week's employment took place. It requires, therefore, very wary walking in dealing with that evidence, not to make the mistake of coming to a hasty conclusion that the father must be in the right on every point that is to be decided; he appears to have applied to Jellicoe, and simply asked him for employment; Jellicoe took down his name, and told him to look up again; then after about a week the boy was sent for; that does not look like a design on the part of Jellicoe to entrap the voter; he took time to consider, and sent for the boy when it may fairly be supposed he had something for the boy to do. Then he says he afterwards saw Pope; he appears to have got a note from Mr. Jellicoe, which is not produced; he appears afterwards to have seen Pope, and to Pope it was that he made that statement. "I shall turn round and vote for the other party on both the municipal and Parliamentary election, if I cannot have my boy employed. Q. Was your boy employed after that?—A. Mr. Pope then said, 'Send him up to the committee-room, and I will find him employment.' That looks very like a conversation between a person whose boy had originally, at least, been employed for the municipal election, and who wanted a continuance of his employment at the Parliamentary election, and it was not addressed to Mr. Jellicoe, but it was addressed to Pope, who was a person in the position of a mere servant. It looks, circumstantially, unlike any unfair dealing between the agent and the voter, and it also looks, circumstantially, unlike any impression upon the mind of the voter that the agent, Mr. Jellicoe, was likely to yield to any such corrupt pressure on the part of the voter. When you come to consider that, I think it amounts to an acquittal of Mr. Jellicoe, and that another person was the one addressed, and that other person was in the same condition of life as Harrison, to whom, therefore, he might venture to make such a proposition, if he did make such a proposition. I observe that it was put to him by Mr. Hawkins distinctly, and the question was raised at once; I did not recollect it, but upon looking at the notes, I find there was distinctly raised upon the first cross-examination the distinction between the municipal and Parliamentary election. "Was it in November or earlier?—A. I do not remember; it was soon after the election began. Q. What election?—A. The canvassing." That seems to show very considerable confusion of ideas to mix up the canvassing with the election; he cannot tell which month it was. "Q. Was the municipal election going on at that time?—A. Not at that time; it was afterwards. Q. It was before the municipal election?—A. Yes. Q. Cannot you give me the date?—A. I could not, unless I got the note;" that is the note from Mr. Jellicoe. That makes it the more dangerous to rely upon his evidence as to the time without something to assist you; he says himself he cannot tell the date without the note. "Q. Was it in October?—A. I cannot say; it was before the municipal election. Q. Was it in the summer?—A. No. Q. Can you tell me within a month a month how long it was before the general election took place?—A. I should think about a month.” Then he is asked what the boys did; he undertook to say that it was for the Parliamentary election that the boys took out the circulars. Then he is asked, “Q. When did you see Pope; about a month before the election?—A. No, a fortnight before the election. Q. That would be just before the municipal election?—A. The municipal election was out then when the meetings were held down there.” His fortnight does not seem to be very precise, because, if it were precise, the municipal election would not be out then; it would be over then. Then he said his boy was employed up to the Saturday before the general election; that really is the substance of the evidence. The son is asked as to the work; he thought it was hard work; Sillance thought it was not hard work. Then he is asked at the end, the father having said he was employed for two weeks, “I understood you to say you were two weeks; were you there two weeks or one week?—A. One week.” The father said a fortnight; he spoke of the time in the manner I have referred to, and the son, when he comes to give his evidence, says a week. On the other hand there is the evidence of Mr. Jellicoe, and there is the evidence of Mr. Hawes; Mr. Jellicoe says it was two weeks; but he had a number of boys whilst the municipal election was going on, and he would not undertake to say but that the boys employed in respect of the municipal election were sometimes sent with notices relating to the Parliamentary election. But he says that the employment of the small boys, which was so much relied upon, ceased upon the Saturday before the municipal election, which took place upon the 2nd of November, and that afterwards the boys who were employed were older, and there was only the number of boys sufficient for the real work of the Parliamentary election; and not any general employment of small boys. There is also to be added the fact that Mr. Hawes stated, and Mr. Jellicoe stated, that there was no charge in respect of any of the small boys in the accounts of the Parliamentary election; and though I should not pay much attention to that circumstance by itself, making no remark upon this account, which I have not investigated, for such accounts generally are very loose, yet that is a circumstance to confirm the evidence of Mr. Hawes and Mr. Jellicoe. Taking the whole evidence together it falls far short of the conclusion that there was any attempt made, such as was at first suggested, in respect of the Parliamentary election, to obtain votes by pretending to employ the children of voters, or by employing them at wages so largely disproportionate to the work which they did, that the employment and payment amounted to a mere colour and cloak of bribery.

Here, again, I must mention, in order that nobody may go off in a mistaken notion upon the subject, that if the scrutiny had been gone into, and no further evidence had been given in answer, the votes, for instance, of Harrison and Pope would have been struck off upon the scrutiny, upon the ground that he stated that he offered himself or his vote for sale to Pope, and, according to him, Pope did procure employment for the boy in order to make certain of Harrison’s vote at the Parliamentary as well as the municipal election; and whether the employment was at the Parliamentary election or at the municipal election, or any other, if it were stipulated for as the price of a vote, there would be a bribe, and the persons who entered into such a contract would each of them be guilty of bribery within the statute. Then if it be said, “Why do not you void the election if you would strike the votes off on the scrutiny?” I answer, at the risk of repetition, “Because Pope was not an agent of the sitting Members, and because there was no general corruption.”

That disposes of the case so far as the Petition is concerned.

With respect to the recriminatory charge, I do not know whether anything is to be said about that.

Mr. Hawkins.] No, my Lord.

Mr. Justice Willes.] With respect to the recriminatory charge, I am bound to dispose of it for myself. The recriminatory charge against Mr. Moffatt (there is none against Captain Maxse) consists of, first treating; and next bribery; and the treating consists of giving two gallons of beer to some dock labourers; I think a witness said a fortnight before the election, but it was rather later. I think it was on the 11th of November.

Mr. Serjeant Ballantine.] It was proved by the date on the card to be the 11th of November.

Mr. Justice Willes.] It was two or more gallons of beer, according to the first witness upon the point. No doubt, as Mr. Moffatt observed, that is a very objectionable proceeding, and one which, if repeated, would have made out a case of treating in respect of which it would have been necessary to report corrupt practices against him personally, because although he did not give the card in the first instance, he did not stop the proceeding, though he knew of it whilst it was in progress. But I think, in dealing with a case of treating, with an isolated instance of giving meat and drink (standing alone to the great credit of this town in the history of the election), one ought to have more evidence of a corrupt motive than the circumstances at all supply. It was given after an inquiry whether there were any voters, and an assurance that there were not. I think, upon the whole, it would be going beyond what fact would warrant, to say there was any corrupt intention to obtain votes by means of the two gallons of beer; it was an act done in yielding to an unwise impulse, but I cannot say it was corrupt.

With respect to the other circumstances in the case, I am rather glad to be relieved from deciding upon them with reference to the recriminatory case; I speak of the transactions with Dr. Bencraft and Mr. Pearce; those I think are not in the particulars.

Mr. Serjeant Ballantine.] No, they are not.

Southampton.

Mr. Hawkins.] I believe Pearce's name is in the particulars, Bencraft's is not.

Mr. Serjeant Ballantine.] Not in relation to that matter at all.

Mr. Justice Willes.] Was either of these transactions brought to the attention of Mr. Moffatt by the particulars?

Mr. Hawkins.] No, not the transaction itself.

Mr. Justice Willes.] I am inclined to think not; because in the opening speech of Mr. Hawkins, in which he stated particularly the other matters, he made no reference to those, and they came upon my mind by surprise in the course of the cross-examination.

Mr. Serjeant Ballantine.] Your Lordship will understand that if I had not taken the course I have, I should have called other witnesses.

Mr. Justice Willes.] I should not take a course adverse to your client, without giving you full notice to answer. I have been thinking what is the duty of the judge sitting here; whether he sits here to judge according to what is alleged, and what is proved, by the parties who bring the case before him, or whether he sits here as a sort of inquisitor after the case is over, so far as the parties are concerned, to enter into either a general inquiry with respect to the borough, or a special and particular inquiry with respect to individuals. My impression, as I have already elsewhere stated, is, that the case of individuals, except so far as it may be necessary to consider such a case for the purpose of determining whether the election be void or valid, stands upon the same footing, so far as the duty of the judge sitting here is concerned, as a general inquiry into the state of the borough; and inasmuch as the latter certainly does not fall within the province of the judge, so neither does the former, except in so far as the question is raised by the proceedings in the cause, or necessary to be decided for the purpose of disposing of the prayer of the Petition.

With respect to the loan to Dr. Bencraft, that may or may not fall within the 2nd section of the statute, according as it was a loan for the purpose of obtaining that gentleman's vote or not. I think he was stated to be a strong party man, who had made up his mind before, and had shown that it was made up by his vote at former elections. I think that loan, although it is a transaction which of course it would have been necessary to inquire into if it had continued to affect the issue of the Petition, cannot be treated with reference to this proceeding certainly as a bribe. No notice appears to have been given to answer the charge, and there is no such proof of any corrupt intention, as it would be proper to act upon. With respect to the sums of 10*l.* paid to Dr. Bencraft and Mr. Pearce respectively, after the election, for the purpose of remunerating them for the expense incurred in employing assistants to attend to their business while they were away, I am quite clear that the payment of 10*l.* brings those cases within the 11th section of the "Representation of the People Act, 1867," and that those votes must have been struck off if the scrutiny had proceeded; but there again it is necessary to prove some corrupt intention to reward beyond the value of work done, or the like, in order to bring the case within the statute against bribery.

I conclude by saying that, as a scrutiny is not to take place, I consider these cases to be beyond the scope of my jurisdiction; and I also desire to say that, in any case, no sufficient notice having been given to Mr. Moffatt to answer and explain with respect to those cases, I feel that it would be wrong to make any prejudicial order upon the footing of their having come out in his cross-examination; I wish they had been earlier mentioned, because it occasioned me a great deal of anxiety how to deal with them, coming out in the sudden way they did.

I believe this disposes of the matter. I must determine, therefore, that Russell Gurney, one of the Members whose return is complained of by the Petition, was duly elected and returned, and that Peter Merrick Hoare, the other Member whose return is complained of by the Petition, was duly elected and returned; that it was not proved that any corrupt practice was committed with the knowledge and consent of any candidate at the election; that upon the evidence corrupt practices did not extensively prevail, nor is there any reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed in the borough. I must reserve to myself to consider whether it is right that I should add to the report the names of any of the witnesses under the clause in the "Parliamentary Elections Act of 1868," because there were some of them who, if their evidence is to be read literally, and if no explanation had been given upon the part of the Respondents during the scrutiny, would come within the 11th section; but I wish to be cautious in naming anybody, having regard to the fact that the scrutiny has been abandoned, and to the possible consequences of the evidence in that respect being incomplete. I do not think it necessary to state at present the terms in which the additional clause in my report to the Speaker will run, in case I should think it necessary to add anything.

That is the whole matter. Of course there is nothing to take this case out of the general rule as to costs.

STAFFORD BOROUGH ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Blackburn, 13 May 1869.Stafford Borough.

Mr. Justice Blackburn.] I HAVE of course had an opportunity during the long time this inquiry has proceeded of considering the evidence as it has been given; and upon many parts of the evidence I have found very great difficulty indeed in making up my mind, and I have very great difficulty still. But yet I do not feel it necessary now to take time to consider my judgment, after the remarks which have been made by counsel on each side; but I am able at once to give my opinion.

It is very true that in all these election inquiries, and I may say in all inquiries of every sort, there always is a great deal of evidence which has to be considered with great care and attention. One part of the evidence, as has been truly observed by Brother Ballantine, is of this description: a good many witnesses in election times come to give their accounts of things that occupied but a short time in happening, when they were in a state of excitement at the time, and they imperfectly remember what occurred. A thing is imperfectly noticed at the time, and imperfectly remembered, but by thinking and brooding over it, they come and give evidence positively as to what they really believe to have been the real state of the facts at the time. It is somewhat similar to what uniformly occurs in cases of accidents. On each side there is a great deal that you must strike out. This kind of experience has happened to every man who is present. We will suppose a man sees two carriages come into collision, but from the nature of the thing, it being an instantaneous matter, he is somewhat excited at the time, and he imperfectly notices and imperfectly remembers the facts, and by brooding over what he has imperfectly noticed and imperfectly remembers, he thinks he saw everything, and comes and relates a story quite inconsistent with the story given by another equally honest man looking on. It becomes a matter of considerable nicety, with such kind of evidence, to determine how much you will rely upon as accurate, and you must look very much to the probabilities of what took place at the time.

There is another class of evidence occurring upon these election inquiries, and which in the particular case now before me has occurred very largely indeed. I mean witnesses coming forward whom in a court of criminal justice one would call self-discrediting witnesses, spies, informers, and people guilty of crime, according to their own story, and who are now seeking for the reward that is to be got by telling the truth the other way. In a court of criminal law no verdict of guilty would be permitted upon the evidence of such witnesses without confirmation. That has long ago been established. In a civil action, though they are looked upon with distrust, yet there is no absolute necessity that there should be confirmation. In such a matter as this, we must look upon them with considerable distrust, but still treat it as information which may be true, though the man who gives it is not worth much credit himself. It calls upon the other side to give evidence in order to explain how it was. In that way these witnesses are very valuable, but as a general rule they should not be made the staple of a case, or be too much relied upon, for they are certainly to be looked upon with a good deal of distrust, except when some trustworthy witness comes in to confirm their evidence.

Anyone who has listened to this inquiry will see that from the large number of witnesses who come fairly within the last category, it becomes very difficult to form one's opinion as to the real fact. But upon some parts of the case I think the facts are clear, and not disputed at all upon the evidence, as it turned out. All that I have to inquire into now is the present election; but as far as what occurred formerly is relevant to the present election, I must, I believe, inquire into it. It appears that there has been formerly very great corruption in Stafford, and that the last election in 1865 was no exception to that at all. It appears from the evidence given by Mr. Fernie to-day that he returned Colonel Meller's election expenses for 1865 at 1,300 l. odd, whilst Mr. Fernie was aware that there was nearly 5,000 l. spent. I do not know whether that fact would have been told us if Colonel Meller had not been called first, and told us the truth, as we might expect he would do. Nearly 5,000 l. was spent; and Mr. Fernie admits that there was a considerable portion of it spent for illegal expenses. Whether any of it was actually paid to anybody in the town in the way of corruption by paying 5 l. or 10 l. for a vote, or whether it was all spent by pretending to pay men for services which they never performed as committee-men, I do not inquire; but that there was that large expenditure upon that side is clear.

And it is equally clear, from Mr. Brough's evidence, who was then the agent for Mr. Bass, the returned Member, that there was a large expenditure upon their side. Mr. Bass is not before us as a witness. It does not appear that his expenditure was so large as Colonel Meller's was; but Mr. Brough admits that Mr. Bass at that time spent 1,900 l. in paying voters, under the pretence that it was for services as committee-men, but really to get their votes. I do not mean to say that Mr. Bass paid them, or that he knew more precisely than Colonel Meller knows now what became of that money; but that there was a considerable corrupt expenditure by Mr. Bass at that time, so that the borough stood in that position, that at the last election in 1865 there was extensive corrupt expenditure on both sides.

Mr. Pochin was a candidate, and an unsuccessful one. He says that he became aware then that there was considerable corrupt expenditure which he did not approve of, and he took steps upon the present occasion to check it. I must observe, in passing, in Mr. Pochin's favour, that I believe firmly that he did so wish, and did so try, and did effectually do it, by the steps which he took in taking the control of the expenditure out of the old corrupt agent's hands, who had been tainted with corruption, and bringing one of his own agents down. I think he did succeed in preventing there being any what I may call regular corrupt expenditure, or anything of that sort, upon his side; and my belief is that it is owing to Mr. Pochin having taken that very business-like step, and shifting the payment and the financial department upon his part from those connected with the old corrupt organisation to an independent man whom he chose himself, knowing him to be honest, that I am not now called upon to report to the House of Commons that there has been in my opinion extensive corruption prevailing at the present election. I think it is solely owing to the good and honest measures of Mr. Pochin that that has been prevented. If he had trusted the matter to the local agents, and the local agents had proceeded to organise a system such as has been organised on the other side, I feel very little doubt that when the machinery was ready on both sides it would have been used upon both sides; each would have thought that the other would do it; and each would have thought that the other dare not tell; and I have very little doubt that but for Mr. Pochin's measures there would have been that corrupt expenditure upon both sides; and that I should have had to report that Stafford was a place at which at this election there had been extensive corrupt practices. As it is, I do not think I shall report that.

There is one thing further I wish to observe upon with regard to former elections. It appears that during the period since 1865 (I have not inquired whether it was before that), each sitting Member has been in the habit of distributing in the borough at Christmas what are called "Charities" and "Christmas Gifts." Colonel Meller's account is that he has habitually at Christmas sent down a cheque for 250 £. It is to be observed, that he sent down that sum to his agent, Mr. Fernie, without any directions at all, and without looking after how he spent it, and without any inquiry as to what was done with it. Colonel Meller tells us that it was done under the impression that it was to be distributed in charity, equally amongst friends and foes. I dare say Colonel Meller was good enough to think so at the time. I do not think after what he has heard now he will entertain that opinion any longer. That was the course taken then. Then it appears that Mr. Bass, the sitting Member, did not, according to Mr. Brough's account, send down a particular sum; but Mr. Brough spent what sum he pleased in charity, without any directions from Mr. Bass, and without any inquiry from Mr. Bass as to what were the amounts; and Mr. Brough had the amounts disbursed in charity repaid to him. It appears that he spent habitually 300 £ a year at Christmas in charities; and at Christmas 1867, when it was well known that there would be soon an election coming on, the sum which was distributed swelled up to 720 £.

Now, I do not for a moment mean to say that there may not be very many munificent charities distributed to that amount, and more, by many people; but when I find that charities are distributed in a borough by those who are expecting to contest it as candidates, and are distributed without check by the election agent of the borough, I am not charitable enough to draw any other conclusion than that they do it with the intention of giving the voters money, in the hope and expectation that it will influence the future election. And there is the further very great danger attending it, that the knowledge that they have been doing so will cause men at the future elections to give their votes in the expectation and hope that they will hereafter receive payment. When that is brought home to any person, I think it would undoubtedly mean corruption. In the present case, I have hesitated and paused about it in this way. With regard to corrupt practices, whether they be bribery, or whether they be intimidation, I take it that there is this important distinction to be made. By the Statutes, and by the usages of Parliament before them, where any candidate is by his agent, or by himself, guilty of any corrupt practice, the seat must be vacated, and the Member is incapable of sitting again during that Parliament; but it is required that it should be shown to be brought home to the agent. Any corrupt practice, whether bribery, intimidation, or treating, brought home to the agent, will vacate the election. But there is another principle which I apprehend, though it has been very little acted upon, still exists in Parliamentary law, and is in itself good sense, and I think will probably be acted upon whenever it is required, that is, that although it does not appear to have been done by any agent, yet if there has been general corruption, something that makes the election no longer a fair and free one, either general corruption preventing the election representing what it ought to represent, namely, the feelings of the constituents, or general intimidation, so that you may say it is evident that the election was not a free one: in that case, although it is not brought home to the agent, the election would not be good by the common law of Parliament. It must be very difficult in such a case to prove, and very difficult to be able to say whether or not a case is of sufficient magnitude to amount to that. I have hesitated and paused before coming to a decision on the question of the Christmas gifts after the last election; it is not brought home to any particular voter, any man who at the election has voted for Colonel Meller upon the ground of his having received a payment after the election, so as to bring it distinctly under the Corrupt Practices Act. As Mr. Bass is not himself a candidate, I cannot inquire further into that; and though there there was a point which passed through my mind as to whether any previous corruption upon the part of Mr. Brough might not affect any person who adopted him as his agent, I think that could hardly be sustained, unless it was made out more specifically that there were particular votes influenced by it. I do not see that I can treat the giving of Christmas gifts as a matter to avoid the election at present. The other view I took was, Could there be such extensive corruption as would avoid the election? I am not quite sure whether that is a matter that has ever been acted upon; and though it passed through my mind, and I thought about it, I think I could not go to that extent.

I therefore think I must proceed to consider what it was that happened at this election, and then to see what has been proved. I may remark, since I am now talking about what will generally avoid an election, that the same thing applies to intimidation. There is no doubt at all, and common sense would have no doubt about it as being the only true view of the terms of the Act of Parliament. Amongst other corrupt practices mentioned is this: "Every person who shall directly or indirectly, by himself, or by any other person on his behalf make use of, or threaten to make use of any force, violence, or restraint, or inflict or threaten the infliction by himself, or by or through any other person, of any injury, damage, harm, or loss, or in any other manner practice intimidation upon or against any person in order to induce or compel such person to vote, or refrain from voting, or on account of such person having voted, or refrained from voting at any election, shall be deemed to have committed the offence of undue influence."

I think the reading of those words requires no explanation. It is obvious that when a mob has possession of a town, and beats those who come to the polling booth, or otherwise intimidates them, that is plainly exercising intimidation, and is undue influence, and in my opinion it is the very worst kind of undue influence. It is very bad for a master to threaten and dismiss his men; it is very bad in a landlord to eject his tenant. All these are very bad, improper acts, but they are justifiable acts if it were not for the effect they would produce upon the freedom of election, because they have a right to do so if it were not done to interfere with the freedom of election. But to riot, and to beat people, and disturb the peace of the town is worse. It is a crime in itself, and is committed for the purpose of producing an undue effect upon the election. This is a thing that is very likely to happen without the Members or the agents being guilty of it. Where this happens to such an extent as not to let the election be free, though not traced to the agent, it will make the election void; but whether it has happened to such an extent as to make the election not free, is a question requiring very great consideration; the judge must exercise his own common sense, and say whether he thinks it is so great an intimidation as would prevent its being a free election; and that, as in every other thing in which discretion is to be exercised, one cannot always feel sure that one is right, and it is tolerably certain that wherever a man decides upon his discretion, there will be plenty of people who will say that he is wrong. In my own experience, it seldom happens when I have to decide a matter by discretion, that I do not myself feel very serious doubts, whichever way I decide, whether I am right or not. I frequently hesitate, and come to the best conclusion I can, and act upon it, and I feel great doubts frequently in such matters whether I am right or not. In the present case I come to the conclusion that I do not think the evidence given of rioting and intimidation was sufficient to avoid the election upon that ground. I quite assent to the distinction which Mr. Giffard pointed out, not in his address to-day. While I say that I think it was not sufficient to avoid the election, I assent to the observation he made, that in considering whether an election was free or not, it would be necessary to see what is the positive majority; and if we had entered into a scrutiny here, and it had happened that Mr. Chawner had succeeded in establishing that he had a majority of one or two votes, or a very small majority of that sort, over Colonel Meller, then no doubt the intimidation which would not have been enough to upset the election of Mr. Pochin, who was returned with a majority of 80, might well have affected the election; whether it would be enough for that, would be a question to be considered afterwards. If it were so proved that in the majority of good votes received, Mr. Chawner was in a majority, but a very small one, that would be a question that would arise hereafter. But then it is equally clear that whenever intimidation is brought home to the agent it would upset the election, however slight the intimidation might be, provided it be intimidation.

Now, having said this much generally upon both of these points, I will consider each of the cases separately, and I think it will be no doubt more convenient to take first the case which has just been finished, the first petition in order of date, that against Colonel Meller. It was begun first, but there were some difficulties about the particulars, and the trial was postponed till the other was completed; I have already pointed out that I think Colonel Meller came down here, having employed Mr. Fernie, who was his former agent in the matter, when there had been, as I have already said, at the election in 1865, evidently a general system of corruption. I give Colonel Meller credit for not understanding what his money was spent in; I do not think he understood it then, and I do not believe he understands now what his money was spent in. He trusted it all to Mr. Fernie, and Mr. Fernie managed it himself.

The first thing we find is this, that Mr. Fernie takes public-houses; I think 31, if I am not mistaken; and he hired those for the purpose of holding committee-rooms. He secures also the services of, I think, 30 or 31 paid agents, who are hired for the sum of 15*l.* each. The rooms at the public-houses are taken from the 1st of September till the end of the year; I suppose it may be said that that extended time was fixed upon because, as it was not perfectly known when the election would be, they thought it was necessary to extend it to December; but they paid for the committee-rooms sums very handsome indeed for such rooms in such public-houses as I take them to be; 10 £. for the use of a room in a house let at 15 £. a year is certainly a very handsome payment, and the landlord had no ground to complain. It was opened by Mr. Stephen, that the effect of that must be that the 10 £. paid for the room in the house was much beyond what it was worth; and that the 15 £. was paid to the canvassing agents. And it certainly was difficult to see what they did for the 15 £. One of them, Mr. Snape, frankly said he was hired to do what he was wanted; and as it turned out that they did not want him to do anything, that he did nothing and was paid for doing nothing. That was a fair representation of a good many of them; but they did not all speak so plainly. Mr. Stephen's notion of this as proving treating, is that it must have been a sham; and in fact, that notwithstanding the provision in the agreement that you shall not bestow any portion of the 10 £. in refreshment, it must have been meant to have been bestowed in refreshment; and that the 15 £. paid to those paid canvassers and chairmen must have been intended to be spent in the payment for refreshments; and in short that these committee-rooms were but places arranged and contrived for bringing the voters together that they might be corrupted by giving them meat and drink for the purpose of influencing their votes at the election; which would be treating. And there is no doubt whatever that it would be treating if it were made out; if they were brought there and meat and drink were given to them for the purpose of the election it would be treating. Mr. Giffard's argument upon it is that though it was true that everyone did not absolutely pay his score (which was the case upon the other side) they did all pay for themselves, and nothing was furnished from the sitting Member at all; that the sums of 10 £., which were given to the different innkeepers, were kept by the innkeepers for themselves, that they were bonâ fide not asked to spend any money out of it in giving away refreshment; and one can believe that they would not be particularly anxious to spend any portion of the 10 £. in giving away refreshment. There is a great deal of evidence given (and I cannot find any evidence to the contrary) to show that there was no score kept and no money payment made for the purpose; and I am to be led to believe that, though the men did meet there, no money was really paid by them for their drink. My own impression, looking at the way in which these things were done, is a good deal in that way; but it is in a way not favourable to Colonel Meller's side or Mr. Fernie who managed it; I cannot help feeling that where there are committees of the sort, formed in this way, where a paid agent is put at the head of the committee, to get the men together in that way, and where at a meeting he has always a body of committee-men round him, and a chairman of the committee at the head, it seems to be exactly the sort of machinery and organization which anyone would devise who intended to have the ready means of corruption at hand if at any time it should be thought desirable that there should be corruption practised. It may easily be imagined that the scheme of a man in conducting electioneering matters may be of this kind. We are not going to bribe yet, but I will so arrange matters and have such an organization, that if at any moment it becomes desirable to do it it may be done; I will arrange an organization by which I may do it at a moment's notice. Such an organization as this would consist of getting paid agents, to whom you could give the word at the time, and who could be trusted for that purpose, and putting each of them in communication with the more corrupt and corruptible voters, and being in readiness (as the phrase has been used more than once here) "to give the tip" that so much would be paid to them. I acknowledge I think that was the intention of that organization as it seems to me; and accordingly a great part of the evidence which has been given by the people themselves tends to point to the fact that that was what was expected. It is very true that many of those who came and gave evidence were voters who having been upon the committees no doubt professed that they would vote for Colonel Meller; with probably an understanding expressed or implied to this effect: if Colonel Meller's agents will tell us we are to be the better for it hereafter we will vote for him; and there is no doubt that many of these did vote for Pochin and Chawner afterwards; but when one looks at the evidence they gave, the whole effect of it seems to show that they assembled together in just such bodies as I have mentioned.

In the "Unicorn" case the witnesses may have meant to say simply that they had entered into that committee in order that they might be in the way to get any bribe which would afterwards be offered. Whether they went there with the pre-determination, being really adverse to Colonel Meller and friendly to Pochin and Chawner, to take any bribe which was offered and then to tell about it, or whether they went there with the determination of doing the double treachery, of getting any bribe they could get and earning what they could afterwards, I cannot say. But this appears plain that at the "Unicorn" a witness called to-day says they did demand to be paid; that it was to be "No tip, no vote"; and that Machin, the chairman at the "Unicorn," one of the paid agents, was endeavouring to get them the promise of this tip, as it was called, which a witness who was called to-day says he positively refused to give for two very good reasons; one that he did not wish to go to gaol himself, and the other, that he had no authority to do it. That leads me to the conclusion that there was such matter of fact at the "Unicorn" at least; I must observe this, that if the evidence was to the effect that Machin, though he was then a paid agent of Colonel Meller, was at that time planning to betray Colonel Meller, that it was what is called a plant, then I do not think that Machin could any longer be considered an agent for Colonel Meller, so that his acts would vacate the election. I wish to point out the distinction which I make, that according as the law stands at present, if a Member employs an agent and that agent contrary to his wish, and contrary to his directions, commits a corrupt act, the sitting Member is responsible for it; but but where he employs an agent, and the agent treacherously or traitorously agrees with the other side, then if he does a corrupt act it would not vacate the seat unless it is proved that the corrupt act was at the especial request of the Member himself or some untainted and authorised agent of the Member who directed the act to be done. The distinction is pretty obvious, and I mention it to avoid any difficulty or doubt that there might be hereafter, from its being supposed that I have said anything more than I do say; I say if Machin was a treacherous agent he loses the power of upsetting the seat by reason of his unauthorised acts of corruption; it would require actual proof of authority in order to make it so. It is a very different affair if a man being an agent has been tricked by the other party into committing a corrupt act, he himself honestly still intending to act as an agent. As to the particular case of the "Unicorn" it seems to me that what took place there shows that they were quite prepared to do what I have already stated that I believe the organization was intended to do. They were quite prepared, upon receiving notice that a particular sum would be given then or hereafter, to act upon it and give their votes corruptly; but I think it is very doubtful whether Machin was not in treacherous collusion with the other side, and it seems pretty plain from the fact of what took place that the notice or tip was not given, and that the men who were at the "Unicorn" did go and vote for Pochin and Chawner just because they were not satisfied that anything was going to be given; I feel no doubt, therefore, that as far as that part of the case was concerned, they were not satisfied that anything was going to be given to them, and that the notice that there would be payment made was not made to that party, at any rate.

Then we come to another case upon which we have had evidence to-day; that is the committee at the "Fountain," at which Arrowsmith presided. There we find exactly the same thing; Arrowsmith is one of the paid agents; and my impression, is upon the whole, that these people were all there ready to corrupt, but that it was not intended that they should corrupt; that they had no instructions to corrupt, and that Arrowsmith volunteered and went beyond his directions; but it would equally upset the election as if he had done it with instructions. I have tried in vain to imagine to myself any reason why Arrowsmith should write the names of these men, and why they should be anxious to have their names written upon the cards as a kind of voucher, not only that they had voted, but that they had been members of Arrowsmith's club at the "Fountain," when they did vote, except what the witnesses (very bad witnesses, I grant you, and requiring a good deal of confirmation) said, namely, that it was done in order that they might be the better for it hereafter, when, if there was anything going upon the part of Colonel Meller, they were to be paid it; and that Arrowsmith wrote the names as part of his promise that it should be so. I can therefore come to no other conclusion than that it was an act of corruption quite sufficient to upset the election on the part of Colonel Meller, and I must act upon it. My impression is, of course, that though there was every preparation for corruption, it did not come to any actual corruption, notice being given. Therefore, according to the evidence, upon the whole, the result is that upon this part of the case, as far as it goes, I do not think I can say that there is reasonable ground for believing that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the last election. It is the last election only that I speak of; if the Act of Parliament had extended to the two previous elections, I should not have had the slightest hesitation in giving my opinion upon them.

Now that is enough to say that Colonel Meller's seat cannot be maintained; but it is necessary to remark upon some other parts of the case in which evidence has been given as to specific bribery that is said to have taken place. The cases as to which there has been distinct evidence given bearing upon them, are those of the seven men, who were at the "Shoulder of Mutton"; Cotterell, who was called to show some intimidation, and Kent, who was alleged to have had money given to him. The supposition is that these seven men got money actually paid to them. There are also two other cases which Mr. Stephen relied upon, one of which I may dispose of at once, namely, Mr. Tyrer's statement about sending the children to school. I cannot for a moment suppose that that was intended for a bribe or an offer. The other case is where Mr. Linter is said to have offered money to a man named Bird; I think that there I cannot act upon the notion that Mr. Linter's statement is not true. One side said that Mr. Linter came and offered the man money, and that, for some unintelligible reason or other, he would not take it, though he wanted his rent paid. Mr. Linter said he refused to promise him anything, and left him. I cannot act upon the promise there as being a matter that is made out.

Then I must come to the other cases. The man, Cotterell, was called, and he told a very improbable story of some intimidation, which I pass by as having no bearing whatever against Mr. Pochin. He positively denied all that was said against him; he denied that he had taken money at all; he denied everything. A man of the name of Gerrard was called, who avowedly says that he was engaged in every species of corruption upon the present occasion, and who has come over to the other side, because, as he says, Mr. Fernie, against whom, for some reason or other, he expresses great personal indignation, has paid none but his "disciples," as he calls them, and has refused to pay him. I must say, that a man coming forward to give his evidence under such circumstances is not a man to whose evidence much weight could be attached if his evidence was contradicted. He says Cotterell said he would plump for Meller if he would give him 5 s.; and that then he observed it was very cheap, and he would get him a sovereign. And, according to his story, he took him to the "Vine," and introduced him to three or four gentlemen, Mr. Lea, and several others, with the very candid statement, "Here is a plumper I have brought you for a sovereign." Whereupon without any inquiry Mr. Bridgwood, the butcher, took him away. As far as that goes we have the evidence of others that that did not take place; and I must say that it is so improbable a story, that I do not think I can trust Mr. Gerrard's evidence upon it.

As to Kent, Gerrard says that Kent offered to give his vote for a consideration. He does not say that he gave him any money himself, but he produced his daughter, Isabella Gerrard, who swore that she saw Bridgwood, the butcher, give it. With regard to the daughter's evidence, I thought Mr. Giffard was quite right when he confined his cross-examination to asking when she first mentioned her statement to her father, and she said "Last Sunday"; and then to make her repeat twice over what it was she said, in which she repeated the unvarying words exactly as if she had learnt them by heart from her father. I do not say that it is conclusive that the father made the daughter commit perjury, but it is enough to make me not act upon the evidence at all.

Now comes the other case, that is the case of the seven men. I must say that that case did look extremely suspicious; seven men were sitting together in the "Shoulder of Mutton," having declared, according to the evidence, that they intended all to vote together. There they stayed, not having voted till past three o'clock, when, as it turns out, the actual majority, including these seven, was 17; and when their voting was nearly enough to turn the poll, and when it must have been supposed to have been so, and then they come to vote in a body. I do not wonder that anybody that sees that done should at once have a strong suspicion that these men were guilty of being bribed. I confess to having had a strong suspicion of it myself; but what is there to prove that there was anybody bribing? Mr. Salt did go down and ask them to come up. Mr. Salt positively says that he did not know of any bribery, and Mr. Bridgwood, the butcher, went down and saw them, and induced them to come up and vote. I am not surprised that it was said that he must have given or promised them something; but he swears that he did not do so. Again, there is the man, Thomas Gerrard, who says that he heard Humphreys say, when he was coming out, that he was satisfied; but, except that, there was no proof that money was given. It is exceedingly suspicious, but the case is not proved; and I should not be warranted in saying that that particular case of bribery is made out. There is quite enough, without making up one's mind upon it, to say that the election of Colonel Meller cannot stand.

Now, as to the other part of the case, it is twofold. Whether Mr. Chawner is disqualified from entering into the question of scrutiny against Colonel Meller; and, whether upon the other petition Mr. Pochin can retain his seat, considering the circumstances under which it was obtained.

Now, as Mr. Pochin and Mr. Chawner stood together, coalesced, employed joint agents, and had everything joint throughout, the two cases must stand or fall together. If one is to go, the other must go; if one can stand, the other must stand.

Now I have to see what the case is that is made out; and, first, let us consider what was done. Mr. Pochin, who had stood the last time, tells us that he knew that there was illegal expenditure at the last election in 1865. He was then a candidate, though not a successful one; he knew there was illegal expenditure, and he resolved that there should not be, as far as he was concerned, any this time; and he tells us that he took what I have already said was a sensible, business-like precaution; he removed the financial department of his business here from the local agents, and the old agents, and any persons who might be considered corrupt agents; and he purposely brought down a man to look after it, Mr. Readwin, who he had good reason to believe was a man who would look after it and see that there was nothing illegal done. I think that that was a very business-like, sensible precaution. Of course, like everything else, it might be a sham, and pretend to be so when it was not; but my impression, from the way the election was conducted, and the way in which Mr. Readwin gave his evidence, is that this was bonâ fide, and that Mr. Readwin was brought down for that purpose; and that in consequence of Mr. Readwin being brought down for that purpose, and the management being taken into his hands, there was no such organization as upon the other side. There was at different public-houses notice given on particular nights, that Mr. Pochin and Mr. Chawner's friends would meet together, and call themselves a committee, and that Mr. Pochin and Mr. Chawner would come and canvass them and speak to them; but there was no committee formed in the sense in which it had been formed on the other side. There were no rooms taken in houses, with the exception of the house where there was the general committee; there were no rooms taken in the houses, and no meetings of people from time to time at those different houses, and there was none of that organisation which would enable corruption to be extemporised in a moment, if required. It seems to me as if it were genuinely intended upon Mr. Pochin's part that this should be done; and upon Mr. Chawner joining afterwards with Mr. Pochin, he had the full benefit of all Mr. Pochin's merits in that respect; I think the result was that it prevented there being any general corruption upon that side. Still there remains what Mr. Giffard truly pointed out, that though Mr. Readwin was instructed to keep the expenditure in order, and I really think meant to do so, yet ultimately he did not do it completely. Mr. Pochin would probably have seen to it if he had thought of it; and he ought to have taken care that the messengers and others should be paid as systematically and in as business-like a way as wages would be paid in an ordinary establishment. The names of the men who were engaged should have been written down when they were engaged, and they should have been paid their wages as regularly and uniformly as they would be at a manufacturing establishment where men were doing their work. That was not done, and on hurrying afterwards afterwards to close the payments, Mr. Readwin did pay to a very considerable number of persons sums of money (which Mr. Giffard has dwelt upon very truly) without sufficient investigation and check to show that they were really men who had done work. When a man came in and demanded payment the only inquiry that seems to have been made was whether he was a voter or not. Mr. Readwin seems to have trusted to a few strangers to tell whether he was a voter or not; and the consequence was, no doubt, that several persons did get money paid to them which, if Mr. Readwin, being Mr. Pochin and Mr. Chawner's agent, had intended, should have been made to them, would have been corrupt payments, and would have invalidated the election. Mr. Readwin produced his little memorandum book in which he wrote all these payments down at the time; I have looked at the book, and my impression is that it is a genuine book; of course anybody may commit a very clever forgery or get up a document that should look genuine afterwards; but the look of this makes me think it is a genuine book in which he wrote them down; I find when he paid anyone he seems to have taken down the name. For instance, coming to messengers, he writes down "Clark, George, 7s.; then "Abberley." A good way down there does no doubt appear what Mr. Giffard mentioned, "Cook, Z," put down as one of those names. It is curious enough, that in the list returned by Mr. Readwin, he returns it Cook, Z, in the voucher, Mr. Readwin returns it as Cook, T, not "Cook, Z." There was some discussion as to whether the man meant was "Zachariah" or "Thomas"; it is of very little consequence; if it was really Thomas Cook, a non-voter, who was paid the money, it would come to nothing; if it was Zachariah Cook, a voter, who got the money, Mr. Readwin himself paid a person who ought not to have been paid; it is certain that he paid Peak and two or three others who ought not to have got it. Then, am I to consider that it was purposely and intentionally paid by Mr. Readwin as Mr. Pochin's agent, for the purpose of paying men who ought not to have been paid? I have already said, looking at the book and thinking it genuine, and the way in which Mr. Readwin gave his evidence, I believe that Mr. Readwin was bonâ fide brought down to be a bonâ fide check upon the expenditure, and that Mr. Readwin bonâ fide acted in that capacity; and taking the whole matter I must give him the benefit of the doubt; I must believe that he did not mean it when he says he did not; I think I cannot treat this matter as being made out; I think it is not impossible that some of the other agents or persons connected with the election may have been pretty well aware that these men were getting their 7s. when they ought not, and sometimes even that it was intended that it should be for remuneration for having voted; but that is not proved.

Then we come to the other matter, the treating which was spoken of. There are a considerable number of public-houses, the "Swan" in particular, at which there was a very considerable quantity of drink and meat consumed, particularly on the nomination night; upon that it was argued that it was impossible that such a very large quantity of brandy and drink of one sort or another could be honestly and legitimately consumed; Mr. Readwin himself was quite unable to account for it; he was so much driven to despair about it that he said he really could not suppose that it was consumed; that there must have been some undue charging in the bill; but whether it was so or not, there was a great deal consumed; one view is that it was given to the voters; another view is, that it was not given to the voters for the purpose of treating them; but it is explained that this vigilance committee which came in from time to time to make their reports, had breakfast and drink, and in that way it is accounted for; now if it were made out that this was given to voters with a view to influence the election it would avoid the election on the ground of treating; if it was given to the people acting as the vigilance committee it bears upon another view of the matter, which I will mention presently. I think myself I can hardly upon this evidence conclude that there was any corrupt expenditure with a view of influencing the election; I think that is hardly made out; but then it appears that Mr. Follows, who was an agent of Mr. Pochin and Mr. Chawner, on the night of the nomination did proceed to organise what they were pleased to call a vigilance committee. As far as I could understand Mr. Follows' account of it, what was intended was that there should be seven men named who were to be a vigilance committee, and that he was to get some 30 or 40 people, non-electors, who were to go about the town, and in some way or other discover corrupt practices on the other side; in fact, however, as I understand it, something occurred which took the nomination of these people out of his hands, and it was by no means the people whom he named alone, but a very considerable number of others who went about that night. Now, I must mention, in bearing upon the question of intimidation, what follows: I cannot myself see how any large body could be legitimately or properly employed in a matter of that sort; I can understand that when you have reason to believe there are corrupt practices going on upon a particular side, that, in order to discover where they are going on, you may employ a single scout or spy to act as a detective to find it out; but the essence of his finding it out must be that he is to go quietly and without alarming them. I cannot imagine how you can legitimately employ a number of persons for any such purpose. It seems to me the only thing you could expect, if you sent a number of persons round, would be that they would commit violence and intimidation; and, accordingly, so it happened. No sooner did the men go to the different houses than you find that the windows were broken there by the mob, and that there was intimidation. Then during the night it appears that the same people kept going about, and they were allowed to come in to make their reports, and to drink. And certainly refreshing them with drink under those circumstances would very considerably increase the probability of violence the next day. The first thing that happened the next day was, as one witness who was called the foreman to some stationer describes, that going early in the morning, at half-past seven, to his work, carrying some documents belonging to his trade, a number of men surrounded and seized hold of him, and insisted upon it that he was bribing, took his papers away from him, satisfied themselves that they were not bribery papers, gave them back to him and then dismissed him, telling him that if he dared vote for Colonel Meller they would break his neck; and he says this produced the effect of terrifying him and making him not come to vote afterwards. Whether he did or not would depend upon whether he was very anxious to come and vote for Colonel Meller, or whether he was a bold man or not; but this much is plain, that this is just the sort of thing you would expect a vigilance committee sent about in this way to do. I do not say that the mere employing of a vigilance committee of that sort would be conclusive evidence that intimidation was intended, but it would very likely be the means of producing it. When, very shortly after they were appointed, there was found to be violence used, all who employed such people were certainly bound to take care that they did nothing to encourage violence afterwards. Then during the course of the day there appears to have been a good deal of violence, and various people were struck and beaten.

Stafford Borough.

Stafford Borough.

Now we come to the question, Is there sufficient ground, besides what I pointed out in the employment of this vigilance committee, for saying that this intimidation, as to which I have already expressed my opinion that it was not sufficient to avoid the election upon the ground of general intimidation, was exercised by any of the agents of Mr. Pochin and Mr. Chawner? The matter upon which that turns are what Mr. Follows did, and what Mr. Brough did. As far as Mr. Follows is concerned, it appears plainly enough, that he having taken the notion into his head that there had been bribery to some of these seven men at the "Shoulder of Mutton," and which afforded strong ground for suspecting some one had bribed them, came to the conclusion immediately that he was therefore justified in rushing after Mr. Lea and Mr. Brookfield and preventing them continuing their canvass at all. Whether he did this deliberately, upon the notion that now had come the time when they were in a majority, and therefore to stop the poll would be a good thing, or whether it was only in his excitement at the time, he undoubtedly did take a course more calculated to increase any violence going on than otherwise. He knew what sort of violence was likely to happen. He had witnessed the day before when, in much less excitement, there had been an attack upon Mr. Vincent. Nothing could justify the attack of knocking him off his horse. He had witnessed that, and knew perfectly well what was likely to happen. Then we have a statement of the speech he is said to have made from the cannon, and the exhortation in terms not to allow Meller's people to vote. If that is an accurate report of the speech it undoubtedly was an exhortation to do that which was afterwards done by the mob, which is enough to prevent the seat being held when it is shown to be done by an agent. As to that, Mr. Follows hardly denies that he was in a state of excitement, and that he did use such language, or something like it. And I must place a good deal of weight upon what Mr. Giffard says, that in such a matter as that it is not very likely that a person would deliberately write down words the day following, and come here a long time afterwards and swear unless he really and truly believed that they were accurate. I therefore cannot but come to the conclusion that Mr. Follows did encourage violence with the view of intimidating persons from exercising their votes; and having come to that conclusion, that must prevent both Mr. Pochin and Mr. Chawner being eligible candidates for this borough.

I am very sorry indeed to have come to this conclusion in the case of Mr. Pochin, because, from what I have already said, I have come to the conclusion that he honestly endeavoured to make the election pure, and to purify the borough. I am very sorry indeed that I should be obliged to turn him out, for I think it is due to his conduct that I do not make such a report upon the present election as would cause a commission to sit to inquire into the state of the borough; and believing that, it is with regret that I am obliged to say that Mr. Pochin cannot stand. But it is one of the cases in which gentlemen must learn to take care, when they choose their agents, to choose agents who can be trusted to avoid not only bribery and corruption, but also violence and intimidation.

Under those circumstances I must certify that the election in both cases is void.

I have only further to add this about the costs. It seems to me that in this case in which each side has been successful, and each side has failed, I should not saddle either side with the costs of the other. I treat the two petitions as really and substantially the same thing; the petition against Mr. Pochin, whether or no Colonel Meller himself is substantially the petitioner I do not know, but one of the persons who were put forward as petitioners acknowledged, when he was called as a witness, that he bore a grudge against Mr. Pochin for having refused to pay him some demand upon the last election, and viewing it in that way, if he is an independent petitioner, I cannot think him a very meritorious one. And, in each case, I must say that each party must bear his own costs.

There is nothing further that I need say except this, that I do not think there is any evidence that would justify me in saying that Colonel Meller personally was a party to any corrupt practices, and I need hardly say, after what I have already stated, that I think Mr. Pochin was a party to nothing at all illegal personally.

YORK COUNTY, WEST RIDING (SOUTHERN DIVISION), ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Baron Martin, 15th April 1869.

Mr. Baron Martin.] I HAVE no doubt that the course pursued by counsel is the proper and right course; and, when the position in which this case stands is explained, it will be obvious to every one that the course which has been taken is right.

The law upon the subject is not as yet very well understood; but the effect of the two Acts of Parliament is this, that if a candidate, or a person for whom he is responsible, who is called his agent, does an act which is prohibited in the three sections of the Act of Parliament, however innocent the man may be, and although he has expressly forbidden the act to be done, and has directed the agent not to do it, yet by the construction that has been put upon these Acts of Parliament (and I believe the correct construction) it affects his seat. It destroys his status as a candidate from the moment the act is done, and every vote given for him is in a sense thrown away; and, however innocent he may be in his conduct himself, and not merely innocent, but however anxious and desirous he may be that no illegal act shall be committed, it is established that an act done by an agent will destroy his status as a candidate and prevent his election.

In this case the objection to Lord Milton's election was abandoned, and thereupon it became a question whether Mr. Beaumont or Mr. Stanhope was legally elected; the direct mode of testing that would have been to have ascertained for which of these gentlemen the greater number of legal votes was given, or, in other words, to have gone into a scrutiny. The majority was, I understand, six or eight, and in all probability on both sides there were votes which would not stand a legal investigation; and the result would depend upon whether it would turn out that the one or the other had the greater number of lawful votes. This would naturally have been the first question entered upon yesterday morning, when we commenced this inquiry. But that is not the course which the case took. By the 53rd section of the Act of Parliament under which I sit, it is enacted that upon a trial of a petition complaining of undue return and claiming the seat, which Mr. Stanhope has done, the respondent may prove that the election of that person was undue in the same manner as if he had presented a petition against him. We have been engaged these two days upon, not whether Mr. Beaumont or Mr. Stanhope be the legally elected Member, but whether or not something had not been done by an agent of Mr. Stanhope which incapacitated him from being Member. We have not been trying the substantial question at all, we have been trying this preliminary question. I will take that which is probably the strongest case that has been adduced in evidence; that is, whether the old man, Gledhill, was taken away by force, and prevented from voting, so as to bring the case within the fifth section of the Act of Parliament. There was a person engaged in it who was an agent for Mr. Stanhope, and for whom he was responsible, that is Joseph Sykes. If I had been of opinion that that act was done, it would have been a sad thing that a gentleman who had polled the legal majority, should lose the seat by reason of this act done by persons of whom he knew nothing, and which he no doubt would have condemned; supposing I had decided that, the only effect would have been that Mr. Stanhope would have been prevented from sitting for the southern division of the West Riding of Yorkshire during the present Parliament. It would have imposed personal incapacity upon him from being elected or sitting for this division. Supposing that I had come to that conclusion, or supposing that I had come to the other, we must have entered upon the scrutiny before the determination of the case. I do not know what time might have been occupied upon it, but the expense would have been very great; and I defy any man living to form a conclusion what the result would have been; it would be a mere toss up. That is the real position of this case. We have been hitherto trying a preliminary question whether or not there was a personal incapacity for Mr. Stanhope to sit in the present Parliament by reason of the act or acts of the persons upon whose conduct Mr. Maule has just commented; and, whether decided in favour of Mr. Stanhope or against him, would have made no difference with reference to the scrutiny; because the question in the scrutiny would be which of these gentlemen had the majority of legal votes; and, assuming Mr. Stanhope to have been personally incapacitated, that would not have affected the votes of the persons who gave their votes for him, they being ignorant of it. They would have been perfectly good votes, and the persons who were the supporters of Mr. Stanhope would have a right to have it determined whether or not Mr. Beaumont was sent to Parliament by a legal majority. I cannot conceive a more unsatisfactory inquiry. It would have been at a most enormous expense, and without any human being being able to form a conclusion as to the result.

I understand there is no personal feeling between these gentlemen. As far as they were concerned the election was conducted in the most honourable and straightforward manner; there was no unkindly feeling, and no taking undue advantage by one over the other; but they met each other as gentlemen should. Mr. Stanhope was desirous, in the event of having a majority of votes, to have as high an honour as any man can enjoy of sitting for the Southern Division of the West Riding of Yorkshire. No person can stand in a more honourable position. No person can impute to him personally an illegal act.

Now, it seems to me that the parties have done what you would expect from their position, that in a case of such uncertainty they would not throw upon each other such an enormous expense. Besides, there would be this further expense, that possibly there would have been a special case for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas. That would have been a still further expense, and would have further procrastinated the matter.

There is a thing upon which I am to exercise a discretion, that is, as to costs. Assuming the case stood on the scrutiny, I would not have given costs on either side; because I think, in a constituency of 19,000, a gentleman who has been only rejected by a majority of eight, may reasonably come forward to ascertain what the true majority was. I do not mean to say that evidence might not have been given to alter my opinion, but, as at present advised, I should not have given costs on either side.

Now, as to costs to Lord Milton. The case has been abandoned against him, and prima facie he would be entitled to his costs; but I cannot give them. It is perfectly clear that there has been conduct on both sides, to which both sides had no idea that any objection could be taken; that is, entertainment was given to voters upon the day of polling. Both sides seem to have given it; and I think it was highly honourable that it was not insisted upon against the two successful candidates. It was the course that a gentleman would take; having done it himself, he would not put it forward as illegal on the part of his opponents. Nevertheless it was an illegal act, and I think a person standing in the position I do ought to say so. We must decide upon the Act of Parliament. I strongly recommend at any future election, that the parties look to the law and the law alone, and take it as their guide; and, however hard the law may be, and I am far from saying that it is not a hard law, to comply with it, and not to put their seats in jeopardy by doing apparently innocent acts, but which, by the express operation of this Act of Parliament, are declared to void their capacity to be elected. I think this case has come to a satisfactory conclusion. It has been conducted in a manner creditable to all concerned.

YOUGHAL ELECTION.

Youghal.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice O'Brien, 2nd March 1869.

Mr. Justice O'Brien.] At the close of this very protracted inquiry it is my duty to state the conclusions at which I have arrived on all the matters (with one exception) which I had to consider. The final judgment in the case will be postponed until the result of the reservation I allude to is ascertained; with regard to the other parts of the case, I shall first consider the particular and special charges of bribery as to which evidence was given, and though most of them were not pressed by Mr. Exham (petitioner's counsel) in his reply, I think it right, where I express a decided opinion on the subject, that I should state shortly my reasons for coming to that conclusion.

The first case of alleged bribery is that of John Griffin, who voted for Sir Joseph McKenna. He deposed to several conversations with John O'Shea, Richard O'Shea, Daniel Geary and his wife, Michael Cronican, James Troy, and John Mariga at various periods before the election, which, if his statement were true, would show that these several parties had attempted to bribe him; his demeanour and the manner in which he gave his evidence were not, however, such as would of themselves inspire much confidence in his veracity. It is clear, on his own admission, that during the entire period to which he referred he wanted to be bribed. He had to admit, what I cannot but designate as a very fraudulent act, the substitution upon certain pawn tickets of one pawnbroker's name for another, in order to raise money on them. The case, however, does not rest upon the result of his cross-examination, for all those parties to whom he referred, persons of respectability, and whose evidence I saw no reason to doubt, were examined on the subject, and they denied in the most explicit and positive manner every statement of Griffin as to anything that would amount or refer, in the slightest degree, to an attempt at bribery. According to his evidence, he said that he would vote for Sir Joseph McKenna, "according to his conscience," because an untruth had been told him of the Reverend Canon Murphy; while Geary, on the other hand, positively swears that Griffin told him that his politics were £. s. d., and that Sir Joseph McKenna would have to pay dear for his votes this time. From this statement of Griffin to Geary as to motives which influenced him I am not inclined to dissent.

The next case is that of Richard Daly, who also voted for Sir Joseph McKenna. He swore that John O'Brien told him last August (after he had told O'Brien that he would vote for Sir Joseph McKenna) that he would get his name down for 30*l*. if he would vote for
Mr.

Mr. Weguelin; and that O'Brien took him to Mr. Barnett, who said it was all right. Daly also swore that David Tracey, one week before the election, offered him two bags of flour and a watcher's book; and he gave an account (which on the face of it is almost incredible,) as to what passed at Mr. Eastaway's public-house on the evening that he went up to Mr. Weguelin's house and told him that he would vote for him. He admitted on his cross-examination that he proposed to Tracey not to vote at all, but to stay away and shut himself up if he got 30*l*. The evidence of this witness as to these alleged offers and conversations was also positively and expressly denied by Mr. O'Brien himself, Mrs. Eastaway, and David Tracey, to whose denial I give full credit.

The next case is that of Michael Keniry and Walter Quinlaw. Keniry voted for Sir Joseph McKenna; he swore positively that Mr. Mariga offered him 20*l*. if he would vote for Mr. Weguelin, that is 10*l*. for himself and 10*l*. for Quinlan. This statement also was positively denied by Mr. Mariga; and if his denial requires any confirmation, which in my opinion it does not, it was supplied by the inconsistent statement of Michael Keniry himself on his cross-examination.

We next come to the case of the alleged bribery of Michael Fitzgerald, who also voted for Sir Joseph McKenna. It appears that he had made a claim on Mr. Barnett, Mr. Weguelin's agent, for 9*l*. 16*s*., the amount of his account for porter supplied in August and September on the order of Mr. McCarthyn, and that Mr. Rice, a solicitor acting for Mr. Weguelin, was present at the time. When Fitzgerald made that claim, Fitzgerald swore that Mr. Barnett, when the account was first presented to him, repudiated it, saying that it was a swindling bill; but that Mr. Rice then said it was a shame not to pay his account, as he, Fitzgerald, was a supporter of Mr. Weguelin, and that then Barnett told him, Fitzgerald, to leave the bill, and that he would see after it. This statement was contradicted both by Mr. Rice and Mr. Barnett. They swore that Mr. Rice did not say it was a shame not to pay the bill, and that Mr. Barnett did not say he would see after it, but that on the contrary, when Fitzgerald said he would not vote for Mr. Weguelin, unless he was paid his account, Mr. Rice said that even so he would repudiate it. Fitzgerald also swore that Mr. Barry, Mr. Weguelin's agent, told him, in reference to his account, to remain firm and quiet, and that it would be all right, and that he, Fitzgerald, should not, for the sake of his account, upset an election which had cost between 6,000*l*. and 7,000*l*., a statement which Mr. Barry positively swore was wholly untrue. Fitzgerald next states that on the Sunday evening before the election he went to Mr. Barry's house where Mr. Weguelin was dining, that he was asked for his vote, but would not give a promise, that he got two glasses of champagne and drank to Mr. Weguelin's health, and that Mr. Barry followed him out and asked him how many men he had in his ship; he then states that Mr. Barry told him to employ some of those men, (I think four or six), but that Mr. Barry did not tell him what they were to do; and it would appear, according to Fitzgerald's statement, that they were to be employed by him to do nothing. Mr. Barry gives a very different account of this conversation; he says that it took place not on the Sunday night, but afterwards, and that he positively told Fitzgerald to employ those men to watch a particular voter who he was afraid would be carried away. He says also that Fitzgerald had previously promised his vote to Mr. Weguelin. Fitzgerald also states that he paid the men the money Barry gave him, but that the ship belonged to Mr. Curtin, and that the men were at the time sailors of that ship, employed under a monthly engagement by Curtin, who paid them their wages, and that he, Fitzgerald, had nothing to do with their hiring.

With regard to those four charges I have perhaps gone into unnecessary detail in stating the result of the evidence. It would be a waste of time to do so further; they were abandoned by Mr. Exham in his reply, and I do not believe that any impartial person in court who heard the evidence of those parties alleged to have been bribed, and that given in contradiction, would attach any credit to their statements as to those charges, or come to any other conclusion than that they were a tissue of fabrications.

We next come to the case of Sargent, which stands upon somewhat different grounds. He also voted for Sir Joseph McKenna, and he states that in August he met Mr. Mariga, who spoke to him, and said that he, Sargent, had been given in charge to him by Mr. Weguelin; that he, Mariga, had told Mr. Weguelin that there were many poor men in Youghal to whom 20*l*. or 30*l*. would be of advantage, and that Mariga offered to pay the money at once if Sargent would promise his vote for Mr. Weguelin; but that Sargent told him he would wait a bit, and that Mr. Mariga then said he held a blank cheque of Mr. Weguelin's to fill to any amount he thought proper, and that Sargent should not promise anyone else till he saw him again. Considering, however, the position of Mr. Mariga, and what came out upon his evidence here, it would strike anyone that Sargent's statement was improbable; and Mr. Mariga in his evidence denies positively the offer of 20*l*. or 30*l*., or of any sum; and according to Mr. Mariga's statement, which I credit, the only matter that would give colour to this story was, that Mariga said he had a blank cheque of Mr. Weguelin's in his pocket. He also swore that he never had a check of Mr. Weguelin's, and that what he said to Sargent was said in such a manner that he could not think that Sargent believed or understood he had the cheque. Perhaps that occurrence either suggested to Sargent's mind to invent the story, or perhaps by dwelling on it he persuaded himself that what he stated in his evidence had some foundation.

With respect to this charge I may refer to what happened on the Cheltenham election petition, as reported in the "Times" newspaper of 11th of February, and which in some respects resembles this: A Mr. Ryder, in canvassing a voter, took out a 5*l*. note, and flourished it about; and said, "Oh, that is the way our party bring up the men to the poll."

Youghal.

This was relied upon as an act of bribery, but Mr. Baron Martin did not so consider it; he stated that he believed the intention was only to "chaff" the voter, and that there was no real intention to bribe him. I have not the slightest doubt in the present instance that Mr. Mariga had not the most remote intention of bribing or attempting to bribe Sargent or of holding out any offer of money to him.

I will conclude my observations on this charge by saying that, considering the way evidence may be manufactured by witnesses, it is a dangerous thing, pending or in contemplation of an election, for persons to say anything, even in mere joke, that would give any foundation for fabricating such a charge.

With regard to the cases of Hurley and Michael McDaniel, the circumstances are of a different character. John O'Brien is alleged to have attempted to bribe Hurley. O'Brien was the agent of Mr. Dower, a brewer in Dungarvan, who had for years supplied Hurley, who is a publican, with porter. I do not impute perjury to Hurley, although I think there was inaccuracy as to some of his statements. It was the habit of Mr. Dower and of Mr. O'Brien, as his agent, to advance money from time to time, as a loan, to Hurley, as is usually done by brewers to publicans who deal with them. O'Brien says that during the years 1866 and 1867 such advances had been made to Hurley, and I am of opinion, upon the evidence, that the advance of 12 £. by O'Brien to Hurley, which is charged as an act of bribery, was, as O'Brien positively swore, made by him as agent for Mr. Dower in the usual course of business, and had no reference whatever to the election, and would have been made by him if there had been no election at all. He further swore that about the same time he made, on behalf of Mr. Dower, a similar loan of a larger sum to Mr. Garth, another publican, who was a supporter of Sir Joseph McKenna, and who also dealt with Mr. Dower, and whose wife told O'Brien, at the time of the loan, that she thought her husband would not vote for Mr. Weguelin. This case was pressed very strongly by Mr. Exham; indeed it was the only one of those cases of bribery which he much relied on, and I must say that the imputations thrown out by him against O'Brien appear not warranted either by O'Brien's evidence, or the manner in which he gave it, or anything that transpired on the trial.

But what does Hurley himself say? He voted for Sir Joseph McKenna, and he swore he never understood O'Brien's offer as at all relating to the election, and he repeats that answer two or three times. Then it is thought to disconnect this 12 £. loan from the offer to pay Hurley's rent, upon the ground of some difference in the dates, as stated by O'Brien and Hurley, from those proved afterwards by Mr. Greene, who was an active supporter of Sir Joseph McKenna, and is now acting for petitioner. It is very improbable that if O'Brien intended to bribe Hurley by paying his rent, he would have communicated as he did with Mr. Greene on the subject; and I have no doubt that Mr. O'Brien made that offer, as he stated, with reference to Mr. Dower, and as the agent of Mr. Dower, and he also swore (what was perfectly intelligible) that though Hurley was poor and owed rent, it was the interest of the brewer to keep up and sustain the publican that dealt with him; and it is well understood that, from time to time, brewers, for their own benefit, advance money to their customers.

With respect to Michael McDaniel, who also voted for Sir Joseph McKenna, there is nothing to connect Mr. Weguelin, or any of his agents, with the alleged offer of Rooke to McDaniel; and, upon Rooke's evidence, I do not believe that even Rooke himself had any intention of making that offer as a bribe. He never spoke to Barry upon the subject; and in justice to Rooke I feel bound to state that, in my opinion, the charge against him of any attempt to bribe is not well founded.

Another charge was made on the cross-examination of Mr. Judge at nearly the close of respondent's evidence, namely, that he attempted to bribe Duggan. Duggan was not examined, but Mr. Judge stated that some time before the election Duggan, together with several railway porters, partook of porter, or some other drink, in Murphy's public-house, which was given by Judge. But Judge positively swore he did not know that Duggan was there until he saw him with the railway porters following him into the public-house. A great deal of time was consumed in examining as to the fact of Duggan having called that evening upon Mr. Mooney, and in inquiring whether he walked down to the railway station side by side with Mr. Judge, or after him; and as to whether he sat in Mr. Mooney's house in the hall, or in the parlour; but upon the facts which came out in the examination and cross-examination of Judge, there appeared no foundation whatever for this charge of bribery (which is not mentioned in the Bill of Particulars); and with respect to its being a case of treating, the observations which I have made on the evidence would also apply to that charge.

These several charges of bribery, to which I have particularly referred, are the only cases among the 78 mentioned in the Bill of Particulars as to which any evidence has been given; and I have referred to those cases at some length, not merely for the sake of showing the grounds upon which I have come to the conclusion that none of them has been established, but also for the purpose of expressing my strong disapprobation of the manner in which this Bill of Particulars has been framed. It appears that 127 voters polled for Mr. Weguelin at the election, and 106 for Sir J. McKenna. There are charges of bribery in 78 cases, as to voters, of whom the far greater number voted for Mr. Weguelin. When the case was opened by Mr. Heron, as a case in which substitution was not prayed, it struck me (what the result has proved), that there was great doubt whether these cases were inserted upon any sufficient grounds. The object of a Bill of Particulars is to give the opposite party reasonable information as to the case that will be made made against him; to give him an opportunity of inquiry, and to enable him, if he can, to contradict or explain the facts charged against him; but the system adopted here would defeat that object. The petitioner might almost as well in this case have included in the Bill of Particulars the 127 parties who voted for Mr. Weguelin, and I cannot avoid saying that, in my opinion, this Bill of Particulars was either framed "as a blind" (to use an expression attributed to Mr. Justice Willes on a late occasion), and for the purpose of baffling inquiry, by rendering the cases to be inquired into so numerous, that proper inquiry could not be made, or else (if not prepared with that intention) that it was framed with a reckless disregard and indifference to its accuracy and without the slightest consideration whether the charges in it were true or not, or whether those acting for petitioner had any reasonable ground or reliable information as to their truth. Besides, in the present case, the respondent himself is charged with personal bribery in all those cases except two or three. He was examined by petitioner as a witness, but he was not asked a single question by petitioner's counsel as to those charges. Other gentlemen were also charged with personal bribery. Several of them were examined during the trial; but, with a few exceptions, not a single question was asked of them by petitioner's counsel as to those charges; and Mr. Butt, as respondent's counsel, had of course to ask them to negative charges that were made upon paper, but which neither the counsel nor the witnesses for petitioner ventured to support. I think that some regulations should be made with regard to such Bills of Particulars, and I have made these observations to express my disapprobation of the practice resorted to on this occasion, and to show that it should be discountenanced in every possible way and should be regarded as a matter, which (whatever the result of the petition may be), should materially affect the question of costs. If a party has a case, and comes forward and succeeds on it, that is no reason why he should load the proceedings with gross charges against individuals without any ground or reliable information upon which to sustain them. In the present case, Mr. Barnett, although not served with a subpoena as a witness, stated that he came here with every document he could get to vindicate his character, because he heard that he was charged in the Bill of Particulars with having bribed several persons.

The next part of the case is as to the employment of watchers. In the course of the trial, I expressed my opinion that it was upon the evidence sufficiently shown that the general arrangement for the appointment of watchers was made bonâ fide, and was considered necessary by the parties who made it for the purposes which they stated, namely, for their protection. I understood that Mr. Heron, petitioner's leading counsel, did not dissent from that view, but acquiesced in it. The matter was referred to by me upon the examination of a witness who was asked as to a conversation with the Rev. Mr. Foley. Mr. Heron, on the part of the petitioner, objected to that question, and I stated that the only object of such evidence appeared to be to show the bonâ fide character of the arrangement made for the employment of watchers, which I said was in my opinion sufficiently shown upon the evidence. When I stated what my impression was, Mr. Heron acquiesced in it, and the question was not pressed; but on the following day after Mr. Heron's departure, Mr. Exham dissented from my view of Mr. Heron's acquiescence, and I then stated I did not wish to bind counsel by what had been stated in the course of discussion, and not taken down as admission. A considerable amount of evidence was, however, given on this matter, which in my opinion clearly showed that Mr. Heron was justified in not disputing the correctness of the conclusion at which I stated I had arrived. It appeared from that evidence that Mr. Weguelin in the beginning of his candidature was encountered by the decided opposition of the Roman Catholic clergy of this town, who had in very strong language attempted to discountenance any opposition to Sir Joseph McKenna, and had in like manner addressed their congregations on various occasions to that effect. Mr. Kennedy (an active supporter of Mr. Weguelin) swore that in a conversation with Mr. Hodnett, the conducting agent of Sir Joseph McKenna, early in August, Mr. Hodnett said in his office that the Rev. Canon Murphy, with the mob, would sweep the opposition to Sir Joseph McKenna out of the town. The Rev. Canon Murphy was examined; he denied (and I believe his denial) that he ever had said or done anything that would have warranted Mr. Hodnett to make that statement; and Mr. Hodnett also on his examination said that Canon Murphy had never said anything that would warrant such a statement. But I refer to this matter, not for the purpose of considering whether such a statement was in fact made by Canon Murphy, but to show the impression which Hodnett conveyed to Kennedy, and the apprehension that might naturally be supposed to have been created in the minds of Mr. Weguelin's supporters by what Mr. Hodnett said. Mr. Hodnett was examined to contradict Kennedy's evidence. On his direct examination he gave a qualified denial of having said so, but on his cross-examination he said that he would not positively say that he did not make such a statement to Mr. Kennedy, as he said many things during the election agitation; but he was sure he did not make that statement to Kennedy in his office, or except among groups of people to keep up their spirits. It appears, however, that Mr. Kennedy understood the statement in the terms in which it was made. Mr. O'Shea, another supporter of Mr. Weguelin, also swore that after the declaration of the 4th of June, in which so many pledged themselves to oppose Sir Joseph McKenna, he was constantly beset by the mob in the streets, shouted at, and hissed at, when passing at various times from that till the time of the election. Mr. Eastaway, another supporter of Mr. Weguelin, swore that before the watchers were appointed, he had heard the threats of the mob that his house would pay for it as it had done in 1852, if he did not vote with the clergy.

Youghal.

Donovan, another supporter of Mr. Weguelin, stated that before he got his watcher's book, his house was attacked, his wife dragged by the mob into the street, and that he had been attacked and struck by Sir Joseph McKenna's mob in the street at night, and that on one occasion they said they would have his life. Subsequent to these occurrences, and on the 13th of November, within a week or eight days of the election, an arrangement was made at Mr. Barry's office by several of the principal supporters of Mr. Weguelin, that watchers should be appointed for the protection of Mr. Weguelin's friends and supporters. It was then arranged that, in order to secure the selection of proper watchers, and prevent the indiscriminate appointment of persons who might act, and take money on both sides, various voters who required protection, or who were considered proper persons to make the selection, should get books or papers for the purpose of entering in them the names of the men they employed. A large discretion must have been necessarily left to the parties who got the books as to the number of men they would employ. After that arrangement was made, events happened which showed that the precautions were not by any means superfluous. Mr. Eastaway swore that on the night before the polling his shop was attacked and entered by the mob, headed by Mr. O'Connor, the son-in-law of Sir Joseph McKenna. Eastaway stated what took place on that occasion. Mr. O'Connor was in court, and was not examined to contradict him. Mr. Fleming and Mr. O'Shea also stated that on another occasion (whether before or after the arrangement of watchers I do not now recollect) Mr. O'Shea was thrown down and knocked about by Sir Joseph McKenna's mob, opposite Sir Joseph McKenna's committee-room; and several witnesses also deposed to the fact that a country mob in the interest of Sir Joseph McKenna entered the town at the election; and that in their opinion the appointment of watchers was requisite for their protection. Mr. Exham very properly relied upon the evidence of Mr. Dennehey, the resident magistrate, who deposed to the peaceful state of the town during and previous to the election. I attach implicit credit to anything Mr. Dennehey stated from his own knowledge of the state of the town during that period; but outrages such as I have stated, being sudden and of short duration, might take place and cause serious injury before the police would come up; and, with respect to the attack upon Eastaway's house, Mr. Eastaway stated that the mob had nearly all gone away before the police made their appearance. Mr. Dennehey also stated his opinion that the mobs were so well matched against each other as to prevent them from fighting.

Supposing, therefore, that this arrangement was made bonâ fide (as I have no doubt it was), and that it was a reasonable precaution, the question is whether it was in any instance carried out colourably, and as a cloak for bribery or undue influence. Several witnesses were examined as to the appointment and employment of these watchers for their protection, and as to the names and the numbers of those employed, and the amount paid them. Without going into their evidence in detail, I think it enough to say that in my opinion no case of any such colourable appointment was established. The rate of payment was not excessive, being 3 s. a day or night. It appears that the number of men was about 350 or more, and the amount paid was about 300 l. I may observe that at the late trial of the Limerick election petition before Baron Fitzgerald, it appeared that a very large number of men were employed for a somewhat similar purpose, and that though they were only employed during two days, about 250 l. was paid for them. Mr. Exham, in his reply yesterday, endeavoured to establish a case of colourable payment of money, under the pretext of watching, on account of a discrepancy of a few shillings between the statements of Patrick Ahern and of Cronican. It is possible that Ahern may not have got the full amount he claimed, but he swore positively as to the number of men he employed, and that the amount due to them was equal to the money that he claimed.

Having disposed of this question as to the watchers, I now come to the charge of distribution of money in the streets to the poor. None of this money was given to any voters, but it was alleged that this was bribery under the third paragraph of the second section of the Corrupt Practices Act of 1854, which declares every person to be guilty of bribery who should "directly or indirectly, by himself or any other person on his behalf, make any such gift, loan, &c., as therein mentioned, to or for any person, in order to induce such persons to procure or endeavour to procure the return of any person to serve in Parliament, or the vote of any voter," &c. There was certainly a very large sum of money given (I would say, most improvidently given) to the poor people in the streets; it was really no charity, whatever it was intended for, because its effects were not those that would be produced by well-administered charity. Mr. Weguelin himself expressed his own disapprobation of it in strong terms. It appeared that about 130 l. was given by Mr. Barry in this way, 160 l. by Mr. Mooney, and some 50 l., I think, by Mr. Barnett. That money was distributed to an extent which, considering the way it was given, was quite inexcusable. The sums were distributed in sixpences and shillings, and I think sometimes in two-shilling and half-crown pieces. But what is the ground upon which it is alleged that the giving of this money was bribery, or that it was given to induce the persons who got it to procure Mr. Weguelin's return, or the vote of any elector? When I asked the petitioner's counsel this question, the only ground which his ingenuity suggested for connecting the return of Mr. Weguelin to Parliament with the giving of this money to poor non-electors, so as to bring the case within this bribery section, was, that it was given in the contemplation that the people who got the money would spend the amount in drink, and thereby increase the profits of the publicans with whom they drank, and would in that indirect manner influence the votes of those publicans, and endeavour to procure the return of Mr. Weguelin. Until Mr. Exham stated that, I was at a loss how to connect this giving of money with an act of bribery. His suggestion is very ingenious, but I think it is enough to read the words of the Act of Parliament to see that such a proceeding as this was not contemplated as being within its provisions.

Petitioner's counsel also relied on the orders for food, drink, boots, shoes, and other articles of clothing to be supplied to the poor non-electors; and Mr. Exham endeavoured also to establish that these orders were given with a view to induce the shopkeepers by whom those goods were supplied to vote for Mr. Weguelin, on account of the profits they derived from such orders. Numbers of those shopkeepers were, however, examined, and stated that their profits on the goods were very inconsiderable. The parties who gave the orders were also examined, and they swore they gave them without the slightest reference to any advantage to be gained by the shopkeepers, or to their votes, though it appeared that all the orders were given to shopkeepers who had promised to support Mr. Weguelin.

With regard to the profit of the shopkeepers, one of them said that on the sale of 80*l.* or 90*l.* worth of goods his profit was not 30*s.*; others said they sold them at lower prices than they usually charged. It appeared that in one shop boots of rather an expensive description were supplied; but the shopkeeper's daughter, who was examined, accounted for it by saying that when the order was given her stock was nearly exhausted, and she could only give what she had; and, with respect to some patent leather boots which were so much commented upon, it appeared that they were bought for Mr. Weguelin himself.

With reference to the orders for food given to the poor non-electors, Mr. Exham stated that he could not bring them within the 4th section against treating. But if he could not bring them within that section, how could they be brought within the section against bribery? If the purpose for which those orders for food were given was such as to bring the case within the 3rd paragraph of the bribery section, it would follow that it would be equally within the 4th section against treating.

I shall next consider the charge of excessive payments made to respondent's agents. Mr. Exham applied at the close of petitioner's evidence for liberty to amend the petition by charging that those over payments rendered the election void under the 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 58, sec. 6. I refused that application on the various grounds I then stated, and I stated also that if it was necessary to decide the point I should be inclined to hold that this Act of Geo. 4 has been impliedly repealed. With regard to counties, by the subsequent Acts to which I referred, the Reform Act 2 & 3 Will. 4, reduced the number of polling days from fifteen to five; and the subsequent Act of 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 68), further reduced the number of polling days to two in counties and one in cities, towns, and boroughs; and another subsequent Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 62) further reduced the polling days in counties to one day. Now the very division of polling places in counties made by those latter Acts would necessitate the employment of more than one conducting agent, which alone was allowed by the Act of Geo. 4. In a county it could not be contended as reasonable or just that a candidate should be prohibited from having more than one such agent. Take the county in which we are, in which there are so many polling places, and where polling lasts but one day only, could it be contended that in this county a candidate should employ only one conducting agent, or should pay his other agents or inspectors only the sums prescribed for one day by the Act of Geo. 4? If he did so, he would not get persons upon whose judgment or intelligence he could rely. Supposing, however, that this provision of the Act of Geo. 4 is still in force, the petitioner cannot rely on those over-payments as of itself vitiating the election, because he did not make that case by his petition. But Mr. Exham further contended that these over-payments were acts of bribery within the 3rd paragraph of the bribery section of the Act of 1854. Considering, however, the very penal consequences attaching to bribery, and that if these over-payments to agents were to be considered as acts of bribery, they would be acts of personal bribery by the candidate who paid those agents, I cannot come to the conclusion that they should be considered as such, or that it was the intention of the Legislature to make those over-payments acts of bribery. Such an intention should, I think, have been expressed in clear and unambiguous terms.

A supposed case was put by Mr. Exham of extravagant sums (say 1,000*l.*) being paid to two or three influential solicitors in a town, ostensibly for their services as agents, but really for the purpose of securing their support and influence with the voters. Every case must, however, be judged of by its own circumstances; and if such extravagant sums were paid to influential parties in a town, sums exceeding, and out of all proportion, the amount of any fair remuneration for their legitimate services, then indeed it would be a question whether the money was bonâ fide paid for such services, or was not really paid for the purpose prohibited by this third paragraph. When that case arises it will be requisite to deal with it; but for the present I state my opinion that on the question raised in this case, and having regard to the facts which appeared upon the evidence as to the agents who were appointed, I do not think that these over-payments can be relied on as acts of bribery. It appears that the only agent who was a resident or voter of this town is Mr. Barry, who was virtually Mr. Weguelin's conducting agent, and who did not vote at the election. Mr. Mooney's first acquaintance with Youghal was on a visit some months before the election. Neither he nor Rice or Mackay had votes; and it is to be observed as to the payment to Mr. Rice, that it included his attendance at the revision, which was a matter that required intelligence and labour to carry out.

I now come to a question upon which I have felt some difficulty, namely, the charge of treating; and I shall first notice the argument of Mr. Exham, that the old Act of the 35th Geo. 3, c. 29, section 19, is still in force as regards boroughs. The provisions of that section are (amongst other things) that no person to be thereafter elected to serve in Parliament for any county, city, town, or borough, shall, after the test of the writ, or after a vacancy shall have happened, give or allow to any elector, directly or indirectly, any meat, drink, or entertainment; or shall at any time thereafter give or allow any meat, drink, &c., to any voter in order to be elected, or for being elected; and that the election of any person so giving or allowing any meat, drink, &c., should be void. Mr. Clarke, whose book has been cited, expresses his opinion that, under that 19th section, the qualifying words, "in order to be elected," &c., governed only the latter part. Without saying that I concur in that conclusion, the consequences of not holding would be very serious if that section was still in force. Supposing a candidate's brother, or other near relation, who had a vote, came and dined with him before the teste of the writ and the election, the candidate would be liable under that section, as the first part of it prohibits the giving of meat or drink to any voter, without reference to the purpose or design for which it was given; and the candidate would in such case be disqualified from being elected. It appears that this old Act of Geo. 3, so far as relates to counties of cities and counties of towns, was repealed by the 4th Geo. 4, c. 55; but the 79th section of that latter Act contained a provision in terms the same as the 19th section of the former Act, except that it applied only to counties of cities and counties of towns. That 79th section was itself expressly repealed by the Corrupt Practices Act of 1854, which does not repeal or notice the Act of the 35th of Geo. 3, which was then unrepealed, as to boroughs in Ireland, though it does repeal the English Act of Will. 3, which contains provisions similar to those of the 19th section of 35th of Geo. 3; and Mr. Exham contends that accordingly this 19th section is still in force as to boroughs. It would, however, require some reason to establish that the Legislature intended that a different state of the law should exist in Ireland from that which exists in England, and also intended that there should in Ireland be a difference in the law of treating as regards boroughs from that which exists as to counties of cities and counties of towns. Mr. O'Hagan (respondent's counsel) also relied on the preamble of the Corrupt Practices Act of 1854, as showing the intention of the Legislature to have (as regards corrupt practices) the same law for all elections. That preamble states the insufficiency of the laws then in force for preventing corrupt practices in the election of members; and that it was expedient to consolidate and amend such laws. Then the 4th section deals with some of the Acts which are legislated against by the 19th section of the 35th of Geo. 3, and provides that they shall constitute the offence of "treating," if they are done, "corruptly." The 23rd section of the Act of 1854 may also be referred to. It is clear that, so far as the 19th section of the 35th of Geo. 3 was to remain in force, there would be no doubt that the giving of food, meat, or drink upon the day of polling would be illegal. But this 23rd section of the Act of 1854 states that doubts had arisen as to "whether the giving of refreshments to voters on the day of nomination or the day of polling be or be not according to law." Probably whoever prepared this Act had not in his contemplation the Act of 35th of Geo. 3. But I fully concur in the principle so clearly relied on by Mr. O'Hagan, namely, that an Act of Parliament, though not expressly repealed, is impliedly repealed by a subsequent Act, the provisions of which are inconsistent with the previous Act, and I think on that ground I should hold that this 19th section of the 35th of Geo. 3 is no longer in force even as to boroughs in Ireland.

The part of the case as to the charge of treating, with respect to which I feel the difficulty I have stated, is that which rests upon the 4th section of the Act of 1854. Mr. Butt, in the first instance, contended that, having regard to the Act of 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. chapter 87, section 3), which altered the definition that had been given by the Act of 1854 of the words "candidate at an election," Mr. Weguelin was not responsible for any act of treating committed before the dissolution, consequent upon which the writ for holding this election was issued. That Act of 1854, section 38, says that the words "candidate at an election" shall include "all persons elected to serve in Parliament at such election, and also all persons nominated as candidates, or who shall have declared themselves candidates at or before such election." If that definition of the words "candidate at an election" was still in force, there would be no doubt whatever that the sitting Member would be answerable for any acts of treating committed by him or his agents after the time when he declared himself a candidate, though long before the election. But Mr. Butt (and I believe he may have the credit of having first suggested this point) refers to the 21 & 22 Vict. chapter 87, the 3rd section of which expressly repeals so much of section 38 of the Act of 1854, as defined the words "candidate at an election," and declares that in the construction of the said Act of 1854, as amended by said latter Act, "the words 'candidate at an election' and the words 'candidate at any election' shall include all persons elected to serve in Parliament at such election, and all persons nominated as candidates at such election, or who shall have declared themselves candidates, on or after the day of the issuing of the writ for such election, or after the dissolution or vacancy in consequence of which such writ shall have been issued." The following definition of the word "candidate" is given in the 3rd section of the interpretation clause of the Act of last Session, viz., "Candidate shall mean any person elected to serve in Parliament at an election, and any person who has been nominated at or declared himself a candidate at an election." Mr. Butt contends that the 4th section in the Act of 1854, which defines the offence of treating, should be read with the definition of the words "candidate at an election," given by the subsequent Act of 1858; and that if a person was not (within the meaning of that definition) a candidate at the time he treated, he therefore was not responsible for it under said 4th section, and that no action could be brought against him for the penalty of 50*l.* imposed by that section except for acts done after he became such candidate; and he further contends that if such person was sued for the penalty, after he declared himself a candidate, for acts of treating committed by him before he became a candidate, it is clear that as he was not liable to the penalty at the time of committing those acts he could not subsequently become liable thereto on the ground of his subsequently becoming a candidate.

Though this is a very ingenious argument, I am not prepared to pronounce any opinion upon it. I think the construction for which Mr. Butt contends would lead to consequences that would in a manner nullify one of the manifest objects of the Act, by holding that, down to the time of dissolution, acts of treating might be committed with impunity. If so, the mischief intended to be avoided by the Legislature might take place, and the candidate absolved from all responsibility, provided he stopped at the dissolution. If, on the other hand, treating by the candidate before the dissolution was, by reason of the subsequent Statute, exempted from the operation of the Act of 1854, which is a penal Act, then Mr. Butt has a right to contend that these Statutes should be strictly construed. I have stated that he may have the credit of raising this point, because I find that in some of the recent election trials in England acts of treating were proved and successfully relied on, though they took place before the dissolution. In the Windsor case (the first that was tried), a transaction took place in the month of August, which was relied on as an act of treating, namely, that of the sitting Member presiding at and providing wine for a dinner that was given by some Society. Mr. Justice Willes held that it was not an act of treating, because the Society was a social and not a political one; but the fact of its having occurred before the dissolution was not relied on.

Under these circumstances I will not here decide that Mr. Weguelin is not responsible for acts of treating committed previous to the dissolution. The question has been very ably argued by Mr. Butt, and I stated in the early part of the trial that I would, if necessary, reserve the question for the consideration of the Court of Common Pleas, under the 12th section of the Act of last Session.

What I have already stated implies that I have come to the conclusion upon the question of treating, that acts took place which might be considered as treating, subject to the construction of the words, "candidate at an election," in that 4th section; but there is upon this point another question of difficulty as to the meaning of the word "corruptly" in that section. It has been urged for respondent, that if an Act of Parliament attaches a penalty to an act, "if done corruptly," this would imply that the doing of the act was not per se corrupt, and that there should be some other element in the case to warrant the conclusion that the party, by doing the act, became liable to the penalty.

This 4th section uses, in the beginning of it, the word "corruptly." It provides that "every candidate at an election shall be deemed guilty of the offence of treating who shall 'corruptly,' by himself, or by or with any person, or by any other ways or means on his behalf, at any time, either before, during, or after any election, directly or indirectly give or provide, or cause to be given or provided, or shall be accessory to the giving or providing, or shall pay, wholly or in part, any expenses incurred for any meat, drink, entertainment, or provision, to or for any person in order to be elected, or for being elected, or for the purpose of corruptly influencing such person or any other person to give or refrain from giving his vote at such election, or on account of such person having voted," &c., &c. The question then is, what is the meaning of this word "corruptly"? and whether, having regard to the various authorities upon this point, the proof that has been given here of what took place at the "Devonshire Arms" showed that the drink there supplied was given "corruptly." At the recent trial of the Bradford Petition, No. 1, it was held that the opening of a number of public-houses for the purpose of indiscriminately supplying drink to voters and non-voters, warranted the conclusion of corruption. But before I consider the various authorities as to the effect and meaning of that word "corruptly," I will refer to what took place at the "Devonshire Arms" Hotel, which had been taken for Mr. Weguelin in July. Mr. Heron, in his opening statement, commented at considerable length upon the bill furnished by that hotel. During the early part of this trial it was the case of petitioner's counsel that almost all of the great quantity of drink of various descriptions charged in that bill was consumed at the entertainments in the upper rooms of the hotel in which Mr. Weguelin and his friends and agents were stopping from time to time. But I could not reconcile that supposition with the evidence given as to the number and description of persons who dined in or frequented those upper rooms. Miss Murphy, the daughter of the hotel keeper (who was himself unable, from illness, to attend as a witness), swore on her first examination that she took down the orders for such drink as they were given to her by the two waitresses who attended in those upper rooms (one of whom was produced here, and the other was not now in her service). It appeared from the evidence of the waitress who was examined, that she used to bring such orders to the bar, and take upstairs what was so ordered; and Miss Murphy stated that she used to put down on a slate, and enter from that in her book, either in the evening or the next morning, the amount of drink so ordered, and which (as I understood from her first evidence) was carried upstairs to some of the rooms occupied by Mr. Weguelin's friends or agents. I examined the hotel book more particularly, and was struck with the fact that this excessive supply of drink occurred on some particular days. I accordingly had Miss Murphy recalled, and on her further examination it appeared (what had not before transpired, though I do not think she had in the slightest degree intended any concealment or misleading on her first examination) that a great quantity (two-thirds, at all events) was consumed, not in the rooms upstairs or upon orders given, but under the following circumstances: It appeared that on 14 or 15 evenings during the few months preceding the election there were meetings of Mr. Weguelin's supporters at Dill's committee-rooms, and that on those occasions the gentlemen and persons of the better class who attended those meetings used to come to the hotel when the meetings were over and go upstairs; that they were followed to this hotel by a crowd, several of whom attended the meetings, and this crowd forced their way on some occasions into the hotel, and insisted upon getting drink, and that she had to give them drink in order to get rid of them, and had sometimes to send for the police to clear the house, and that the drink supplied to them was put down by her to Mr. Weguelin, and constituted so large a proportion of the amount. She also stated that neither Mr. Barry nor Mr. Mooney, nor any others of the committee ever told her to give such drink, and that she never informed them of the amount so given. That would, according to her evidence, account for about two-thirds of the drink, but the remaining one-third was very considerable in quantity, and it appears that the greater portion of it was consumed in the rooms upstairs. A great deal of evidence has been given as to the number and class of persons who frequented those upper rooms, their position in life, and their decided feelings in favour of Mr. Weguelin. It also, however, appeared that on three several occasions when Mr. Weguelin entered this town, namely, on the 29th of July, the 5th of September, and the 26th of October, drink to a considerable amount was consumed in the coffee-room by the persons who took part in such processions and accompanied them to the hotel, several of those persons being voters. It certainly appears that some persons who drank from time to time in the coffee-room on those occasions, used to treat each other and pay for their drink themselves; but a considerable part of the drink consumed on those three occasions was not paid for, but was charged in the hotel book to Mr. Weguelin. The name of Robert Murphy, son of the hotel keeper, was mentioned yesterday by Mr. Exham, and his non-production was commented upon. As I had not known that he took any part in the management of the hotel, the necessity of calling for his production had not occurred to me; but when Mr. Exham observed upon his not having been examined, I thought it right, under the power given to me by the Act, to have him called and examined; and he stated that he recollected a number of committee meetings on which occasions several of the humbler classes followed from the committee-rooms, the gentlemen who went upstairs. From the manner in which Murphy gave his evidence, his memory does not appear to be very good, as he seemed to forget things that one might reasonably think he would have remembered; but at all events he did not give his evidence in a manner that would induce me to think he was adverse to Mr. Weguelin, or that he would exaggerate in the slightest degree anything that would tend to that gentleman's disadvantage. He stated that on several of those occasions when the crowd came over from the committee-rooms, it consisted of voters as well as of non-voters; that about 60 or 80 persons used to attend the committee-rooms, and that out of those 60 or 80 persons, several of them would come to the hotel when the meetings were over; that some of the voters would go upstairs and have drink there; and that several of the poorer class of voters used to come into the hotel and stand at the bar. Taking his evidence with that of Miss Murphy, that those presenting themselves at the bar and asking for drink would get it without her knowing whether they were voters or not, the manifest conclusion is, that on those various occasions several voters got drink at the bar.

So far even as relates to the entertainment upstairs, this arrangement was a very improvident one for Mr. Weguelin. It has been held in England in several cases that Acts much less positive have been considered as treating. The candidature of Mr. Weguelin was announced on the 29th of July. The opposition which he encountered then, and the feeling that was sought to be got up against him, were relied on by Mr. Butt as suggesting the reason why he should leave persons here to act for him. To that alone there would be no objection, but if it is contended that the motive of giving these constant entertainments in the rooms upstairs was to promote his popularity and to counteract the influence of the opposition, it would go very far towards establishing a case of treating. It may be that the feeling against Mr. Weguelin, which was caused by the Roman Catholic clergy and others, rendered it advisable for him to leave some of his friends behind to act for him in his absence; and that this may more or less account for the giving of charity, which, as I have already stated, did not in my opinion amount to bribery, though given for the purpose of increasing his general popularity. But with respect to the entertainments in the rooms upstairs, it is to be observed that Mr. Weguelin did not himself reside in that hotel after the 14th of August. He stopped with Mr. Mooney from the 5th to the 12th of September on his second visit to Youghal, and he took a house for himself at his third visit on the 26th of October. Mr. Barrett did not stop long at the hotel, and Mr. Rice and Mr. Mackey were there but occasionally, so that it is difficult to regard those those entertainments in the rooms upstairs as what would naturally occur from persons calling in the evening to see Mr. Weguelin or his friends, and being asked, as a matter of courtesy, to partake of drink. Considering, however, all the evidence given as to the character and positions in life of the persons who partook of those entertainments upstairs, that several of them were not voters, and that such of them as were voters were, with few exceptions, the avowed supporters of Mr. Weguelin, and the opponents of Sir Joseph McKenna, having pledged themselves to Mr. Weguelin from the period of his arrival, there are grounds for contending that, if the proceedings at the "Devonshire Arms" were confined to those entertainments upstairs, they would not amount to treating. But, even in that case, it would require much further consideration before I came to such a conclusion, having regard to the decisions in England, not in one particular case, but in several, and to the opinion of the judges, that arrangements of that sort, where people might come without invitation, and partake of drink at the expense of the candidate, might be regarded as acts of treating from the number of times the drink was supplied, and the apparent object with which it was given.

But I am relieved from the necessity of considering the effect of these entertainments upstairs from what took place in the coffee-room and at the bar of the hotel. It appears that on the occasions of the three demonstrations on the 29th of July, the 5th of September, and the 26th of October, and of the 14 or 15 meetings at Dill's committee-rooms, several of the people who attended the processions and meetings used to go into the coffee-room or to the bar to get drink. There is no evidence to show that there was any limit put upon them; on the contrary, the evidence shows that any of those who attended the processions or meetings might have gone to the coffee-room or bar and ordered drink; and though there is no ground for saying that Miss Murphy gave any quantity sufficient to produce intoxication, there is certainly general evidence that several voters were seen drinking in the coffee-room without paying for it; and we have the further evidence of Robert Murphy, which leaves no doubt upon my mind of the fact, that on the occasion of those committee meetings several voters of the humbler class came from the committee-rooms and got drink at the bar. He certainly declined to say whether any of the persons whom he actually saw drinking on those occasions were voters; but we have the evidence of Miss Murphy, that drink was supplied on those occasions to anybody who came to the bar and asked for it.

Independently, then, of the law of the case, no one on this evidence can hesitate to come to the conclusion that, upon those several occasions, voters of the humbler class, with respect to whom the mischief of treating would be most likely to be produced, were supplied with drink; and then the question is, Was that drink given "corruptly" within the meaning of the 4th section of the Act of 1854?

It was, as I have already remarked, urged in the course of the trials, that where an act is made penal, if done "corruptly," it is to be implied that the act per se is not necessarily corrupt. Mr. Exham, however, has referred to several authorities (some of which I had myself considered before), which show what construction the judges in England have put upon the word "corruptly," used in this 4th section as to treating. In the Windsor case, which is reported in 19th "Law Times," p. 613, and was the first petition tried, there was a dinner of the society of Odd Fellows in the month of August, at which the sitting Member attended, and ordered for it a quantity of champagne, which was paid for by him and two of his supporters. Mr. Justice Willes held that this did not constitute treating, as the society was a non-political one, although it did include several electors. But he says (p. 614), "I am impressed with the objectionable character, to say the least of it, of any transaction by which an intending candidate may seek to ingratiate himself with electors, whether of his own side in politics or not, by profuse expenditure for luxuries. I must express the opinion, for I entertain it, that this is a questionable proceeding, and that it would be well if such proceedings were refrained from in future; the more so because no one but a man possessed of wealth could afford to expend 27 l. in a single evening on drink for other people."

That case was followed by the Bewdley case, which was tried before Mr. Justice Blackburn (19th "Law Times," page 676); when alluding to the word "corruptly," he says (page 678), "The interpretation of this word as explained, and in my opinion rightly explained, by Mr. Justice Willes, is not 'wickedly' or 'immorally' or anything of the sort, but embraces such conduct as it was evidently the intention of the Legislature to discountenance; where it is shown that even the smallest quantity of meat or drink is supplied, that is of course admissible as evidence of treating, but more than that would be required to make out a corrupt intention." Again, he says, "The evidence shows that nearly 20 public-houses were habitually kept open, and that whoever chose to present himself was supplied with drinks; where that is done it would be a perfect mockery to suppose that it was done without any corrupt intention."

In the present case the "Devonshire Arms" hotel was the only place where drink was supplied under circumstances that would amount to treating, as it did not appear that the drink consumed by voters in the public-houses was paid for or ordered by Mr. Weguelin or his agents. But, considering the extent of drink given at the hotel, and the frequent occasions on which it was given, I think that the foregoing observations of Mr. Justice Blackburn bear materially on the present case.

I may also refer to the Bradford case No. 1 (reported 19th "Law Times," page 719). It appeared that 115 public-houses were opened in that town, in which refreshments were supplied to all persons, whether voters or not, and that all voters who went there were made nominal members of the committee, but had nothing to do; and Baron Martin says (page 721), "The learned counsel for the respondent has said that those refreshments were supplied to people who had done work, but the evidence is directly to the contrary; the evidence is to the effect that voters were admitted to those committee-rooms, the farce was gone through of putting down their names as committee-men, and refreshments were furnished to them whether voters or non-voters." Baron Martin also, in the second Bradford case, when giving an explanation of the grounds upon which he decided the previous petition, No. 1, against Mr. Ripley on the ground of treating, says (page 726), "The case against Mr. Ripley was that he had opened public-houses in the sense in which that is commonly and generally understood, that they were public-houses selected by him or by his agents, that rooms were allotted in these houses where people went every night if they liked; that a messenger was put at the door, or some person for preventing others from coming there than persons in some way connected with the house, and the people who went nightly to these houses went there to get drink, only limited by this, that it was to be given in reason, and that it was not to be given in excess." Mr. Exham also referred me to the Lichfield case; which I have looked at, but I do not think it bears much upon this question; but he also referred to the Westminster case as showing what, in the transactions that there took place, were the grounds upon which Baron Martin held that they did not amount to treating.

I have, however, already stated,* that I will reserve for the consideration of the Court of Common Pleas the question as to the meaning of the words "candidate" "at an election"; and if, upon further consideration as to the meaning and effect of the word "corruptly," having regard to the evidence in this case, I should be of opinion that there is any question of law respecting it which might properly be reserved for that court, before I decide that the giving of the drink at the hotels amounted to treating, I would also reserve it, as I think it desirable that if there be any such question it should be settled by some decision of the court instead of relying on observations that may be explained by the facts of the particular cases in which they were made.

What I have stated, of course, implies that, as regards the charges of treating, my judgment now on the result of the election is not final. As, however, the parties are here, I thought it would be a useless expense to postpone giving my judgment on the other parts of this case for the purpose of waiting for the decision of the Court of Common Pleas. The 12th section of the Act empowers me to reserve any question of law for the consideration of the court, and to suspend my certificate to the Speaker until the decision of the court upon the questions reserved shall be ascertained.

I have expressed what appears to me to be the contention of both parties for and against the construction of the words "candidate at an election," relied on by Mr. Butt. Further than that, I am not to be understood as expressing any opinion upon the subject; my opinion would be of little value, as the case is to go before another tribunal.

There are, however, some other matters on which I have to observe. A great deal of time was consumed with evidence as to the amount of the expenditure of Mr. Weguelin, which certainly was excessive; there are several items in that expenditure which I cannot avoid saying should not have been charged against him by those whom he employed. He states himself that he has already paid 4,200 £; Mr. Exham says the amount is something more, and there are further sums to be paid, taking into consideration the claims of Mr. Mooney, and the hotel bill, which would at all events come to some hundreds more; but even if the amount does not exceed 5000 £ such an expenditure cannot be regarded otherwise than as excessive. I think, however, that much time was uselessly occupied in this matter, as great candour and willingness were displayed by Mr. Weguelin himself, Captain Weguelin, Mr. Barnett, and the other persons through whose hands money passed, in accounting for its expenditure; every document and voucher in their possession that was called for appears to have been produced, and produced readily. I have been told that this great amount of expenditure should influence my decision upon the questions before me, and induce me to conclude that a portion of that expenditure was caused by bribery, but I do not assent to that argument.

I have been referred to what a very able judge (Mr. Justice Keogh) said in Dublin as to the amount of expenditure, and also to what has been said with regard to the amount of expenditure in other cases; but where (as in this case) the expenditure has been accounted for, and where, however improvident that expenditure may have been, it has been proved by those through whose hands the money passed that none of it was spent in bribery, then the extravagant expenditure affords no foundation whatever for the charge that any portion of this money was spent in bribery, or was expended in any other manner than what was proved by the witnesses whose evidence on the subject I see no reason to doubt.

I have been also asked to report to the Speaker that corrupt practices extensively prevailed in Youghal during this election. That I decidedly will not do; I think I should be doing an act of gross injustice to the people of this town if I were to make any such report; I see no ground for holding that there was any corrupt practice at this election except as to the drinks given at the "Devonshire Arms." [I confess I was surprised at the application, particularly when it is to be considered, as I have already remarked, that 78 cases of bribery were charged and that not one of them was substantiated. The 11th section, section, paragraph 14, requires me also to report if any corrupt practices have been committed with the knowledge and consent of any candidate. Of course, if I ultimately decide that, upon the evidence and the true construction of the words "candidate at an election," these proceedings at the "Devonshire Arms" amounted to treating, I shall report that such treating was with the knowledge and consent of Mr. Weguelin himself. The manifest inference from the entire evidence is that he knew of those entertainments from time to time, and indeed he did not deny his knowledge of them. I may observe that, as regards the consequences to Mr. Weguelin, it is immaterial whether, as such treating was committed by himself or his agents, I should report that it was with or without his knowledge and consent.

* See subsequent judgment of the 20th of April.

That same section also requires me to report whether any candidate at an election has been guilty of corrupt practices. With regard to that there is some evidence before me that drink and other matters had been supplied by some of the supporters of Sir Joseph McKenna; but I am not aware at present that there is on the evidence any sufficient ground for me to report that such drink, &c., had been supplied either by Sir Joseph McKenna or with his knowledge or consent, or by his agents; I shall, however, further consider that matter.

There now remains one question as to which I shall express my present opinion, namely, as regards the costs. The award of costs is discretionary with the judge. Mr. Exham pressed very fairly a principle upon which I have acted myself, namely, that the fact of the defeat of a petition would not necessarily be followed by the petitioner paying the costs. On the other hand, I think that, in the event of the success of a petition, it does not necessarily follow that the petitioner should get his costs. There have been repeated instances in the House of Commons Proceedings before Parliamentary Committees where, although the Member was unseated for bribery or for treating, he was not condemned to pay the costs. I have already referred to circumstances which, I think, furnish grounds for the exercise of that discretion, by disallowing costs to the petitioner in this case, even in the event of the petition ultimately succeeding by the decision of the Court of Common Pleas. And, on the other hand, I think that, should the petition ultimately fail, by the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, there are reasons for disallowing costs to the respondent. With regard to the grounds for disallowing costs to the petitioner, it is clear, upon the evidence, that, so far as he himself is concerned, the question of costs is one of perfect indifference to him; that he is not responsible for the costs that are incurred; and that, in point of fact, as far as costs are concerned, the question may be considered as if this was the petition of Sir Joseph McKenna. I perfectly agree with Mr. Exham that, in deciding whether the election is void or not, by reason of corrupt practices, I should not have regard to the fact of Sir Joseph McKenna being the substantial petitioner, or to the indemnity for costs. Mr. Exham properly urged that the rights of the public are involved in inquiries of this nature, and that, no matter who brings the petitions forward, still, if it be a bonâ fide petition, it is the duty of the judge to consider whether the law has been violated or not. But, with regard to the costs, I am at perfect liberty to take into account the fact that Sir Joseph McKenna is alone the party who would be interested in getting the costs; and when I call to mind the conduct that has been pursued, not merely by the mob, but by his own son-in-law in taking part with them, as I have already observed; and when I consider the petition itself, the Bill of Particulars, and the great length to which this trial has been protracted by inquiries in support of charges which have failed, I think there are good grounds for exercising my discretion as to the costs by refusing petitioner his costs, even if the petition should succeed. My present impression is, that in any event of the petition, I shall let each party pay their own costs. That is my present impression, but I shall further consider the matter before I make any order on the subject, and if I see reason to change my opinion, I shall be at liberty to do so.

In conclusion I have to express my approbation of the order and good conduct which prevailed during the trial of this petition. I have also, however, to express my regret at finding that the election has been productive of such bitterness of feeling between the several parties in this town; and my hope that whatever the result of this petition may be, the bitterness of feeling will subside, that past acerbities will be forgotten, and that those who ought to be on terms of friendship and amity with each other will resume their friendly relations.

I believe that there is not any other matter upon which it is necessary for me now to pronounce any opinion. I have stated the conclusions at which I have arrived on all the matters which I have had to consider, except as to treating. No case can be laid before the Court of Common Pleas until near the beginning of next term; by that time I shall, on my return to Dublin, take care to have the parties communicated with by my registrar, and if I think it necessary to apprise counsel on both sides of the nature of the case to be submitted, I will have intimation given to their respective solicitors.

JUDGMENT of the COURT of COMMON PLEAS, Ireland, on the SPECIAL CASE submitted by Mr. Justice O'Brien, delivered 10th April 1869.

The Lord Chief Justice.] THE question in this case is a simple one, and, notwithstanding the length of the argument we have heard, not, as it occurs to me, one of much difficulty. By the 4th section of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, it is enacted, "Every candidate at an election who shall corruptly, by himself or with any person, or by any other ways or means in his behalf at any time, either before, during, or after, any election, directly or indirectly, give or provide, or cause to be given or provided, or shall be accessory to the giving or providing, or shall pay, wholly or in part, any expenses incurred for any meat, drink, entertainment, or provision, to or for any person, in order to be elected, or for being elected, or for the purpose of corruptly influencing such person, or any other person, to give or refrain from giving his vote at such election, or on account of such person having voted or refrained from voting, or being about to vote or refrain from voting, at such elections, shall be deemed guilty of the offence of treating, and shall forfeit the sum of 50*l.*," &c. By the same Act, section 38, a certain definition is given of the word candidate at an election. By the 3rd section of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 87, so much of section 38 of the previous Act as defined the words, "candidate at an election" is repealed; and it is enacted that "candidate at an election" shall include all persons elected to serve in Parliament at such election, and all persons nominated as candidates at such election, or who shall have declared themselves candidates on or after the day of the issuing of the writ for such election, or after the dissolution or vacancy in consequence of which such writ shall have issued. Now, if to ascertain the true construction of the 4th section of the Corrupt Practices Act, we substitute for the words "every candidate at an election" the above definition, the 4th section will read thus: "If any person elected to serve in Parliament at any election, or any person nominated as candidate at any election, or any person who shall have declared himself candidate on or after the day of the issuing of the writ for such election, or after the dissolution or vacancy in consequence of which such writ shall have issued, shall corruptly, by himself or by any person on his behalf, at any time either before, during, or after any election, commit any of the acts mentioned in the section, he shall be deemed guilty of the offence of treating." Reading the 4th section in this way, it will contain an express enactment that every person elected to serve in Parliament who shall corruptly, by himself or any others on his behalf, at any time, either before, during, or after any election, do the acts mentioned in the section, shall be deemed guilty of the offence of treating. To get rid of this obvious construction of the section, it has been suggested that we should read the section, as it is called, redendo singula singulis, and that we should hold that the words, "who shall have declared himself a candidate," are the only words applying to acts done at any time before the election. This we cannot adopt. We are quite satisfied that the rule of construction referred to, redendo singula singulis, does not apply to a case like the present, and that any person who shall be elected, or who shall be nominated, or who shall have declared himself a candidate, after the issuing of the writ or dissolution, who shall at any time, though before the dissolution, do the acts mentioned in the section, he is guilty of the offence of treating. If a party do the acts before the dissolution, intending to become a candidate, but does not in fact after the dissolution become a candidate, and is not elected, he cannot be guilty of the statutable offence of treating. But the respondent having been elected, is, in our opinion, guilty of the offence, though committed before the dissolution. We must so decide; and that his election is, therefore, void, under the 36th section of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102.

FINAL JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice O'Brien, 20th April 1869.

Mr. Justice O'Brien.] THE announcement of my final decision as to the validity of Mr. Weguelin's election has been necessarily postponed till the determination of the questions which I submitted for the consideration of the Court of Common Pleas in the Case I sent to them shortly after my return from circuit. That Case has since been heard by the court, and I have received from their officer a copy of their judgment and determination on such questions.

The questions arose upon the facts proved at the trial with respect to the giving and providing of drink at the "Devonshire Arms" hotel, by respondent or his agents, to various electors of Youghal and other persons, on several occasions previous to the dissolution. As to these transactions, I was of opinion, upon the evidence, that the drink was given in order that respondent should be returned at the election, and for the purpose of promoting that object.

Mr. Butt (respondent's counsel) contended at the trial that inasmuch as the giving and providing of such drink was previous to the dissolution, then that same did not constitute tute the offence of treating; and it may be convenient now to state in general terms the grounds on which he relied as establishing that proposition.

The 4th section of "The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854," defines what acts done by "a candidate at an election," by himself or his agents, constitute the offence of treating; and according to the definition contained in the interpretation clause of that Act (section 38), the words "candidate at an election," would include, amongst others, all persons who should have declared themselves candidates "at or before such election"; and if that definition were still in force, it is clear that Mr. Weguelin (the respondent) would, at the time of the giving of such drink, have been a "candidate at an election," within the meaning of the 4th section. That definition was, however, repealed by the 3rd section of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 87, which gives another definition of those words. This latter definition includes all persons who should have declared themselves "candidates," "on or after the day of the dissolution, in consequence of which the writ should have been issued," but does not (as was done by the former definition) provide in terms that a declaration of candidature at any time before the election, whether before or after the dissolution, should render a party "a candidate at an election," within the meaning of the Act of 1854.

Mr. Butt contended that by reason of such alterations in the definition of those words, Mr. Weguelin, until the dissolution took place, was not "a candidate at an election," within the meaning of the Act of 1854; and that, accordingly, as he was not such when the drink was given, that act did not constitute the offence of treating, even supposing that it would have done so if it took place after the dissolution.

I observed in my judgment at the trial on the serious consequences that would result from adopting the construction of the Statute contended for by Mr. Butt, according to which a candidate would be absolved from all responsibility for acts which, though committed before the dissolution, might still be productive of the very mischief that it was the object of the Legislature to prevent. It is not necessary for me to refer to the arguments of Mr. Butt upon the construction of the Statute; it is enough to say that I declined to decide the question at the trial, as such decision, whether right or wrong, would have been final and conclusive on the parties, and I thought it more advisable to reserve the question for the consideration of the Court of Common Pleas, under the 12th section of the Parliamentary Elections Act of 1868.

Another question, affecting the charge of treating, was raised by respondent's counsel at the trial, namely, as to the meaning of the word "corruptly," which occurs in the beginning of the 4th section of the Act of 1854, that defines the offence of treating. It is, I think, clear, as I stated at the trial, that this word "corruptly" governs the entire of the section, and that in order to constitute the offence of treating, within the meaning of that section, the acts relied on as constituting that offence should have been done "corruptly." There was much discussion at the trial as to the meaning and effect of this word "corruptly." It was urged that when by Statute a certain act is made penal, if done corruptly, such a provision implies that the act per se is not necessarily corrupt; and I may observe that with respect to the meaning of the word "corruptly," as used in the 2nd section of the same Act (in defining the offence of "bribery"), Mr. Justice Coleridge, when delivering his opinion upon the questions put to the judges by the House of Lords in Cooper v. Slade (6th House of Lords Cases), states, in page 785, that "the Statute makes the operating motive in the mind of the party material," and adds that "the motive must be corrupt."

At the trial before me, Mr. Butt suggested that some interpretations might be put upon the word "corruptly," according to which he contended it should not be held in this case that the act of giving drink at the "Devonshire Arms" hotel was done "corruptly." But I stated at the time that the interpretations which he suggested were not such as in my opinion were warranted by the Statute. I had, however, stated during the trial that I would reserve for the Court of Common Pleas the question raised by Mr. Butt, as to the meaning of the words "candidate at an election," and at the close of the trial I stated my intention that if, upon further consideration, I thought there was any question of law as to the meaning of the word "corruptly," which might properly be reserved for the court, then that I would reserve such further question accordingly.

In some reports of my judgment I am represented as having said, without any qualification, that I would reserve for the consideration of the court, not merely the question as to the meaning of the words "candidate at an election," but also the question as to the meaning and effect of the word "corruptly." This statement, however, is erroneous, and must have proceeded from a misapprehension of what I said at the trial, as my intention of reserving any question of law as to the meaning and effect of the word "corruptly," was only in the event of my being of opinion, upon further consideration, that such question was proper to be reserved; and I believe it is in the recollection of respondent's counsel, as well as of petitioner's counsel that I expressed, in that qualified manner only, and not positively, my intention of reserving any such question. In point of fact, it was not stated at the trial what was to be the nature or form of such question, in case I should decide on reserving any as to the meaning or effect of the word "corruptly."

Before sending in the case to the Court of Common Pleas, I required (as I stated at the trial I would do) the attendance of petitioner's and respondent's counsel at a meeting to settle such Case; and I required their attendance not merely for the purpose of framing the questions with respect to the construction of the words "candidate at an election," but also for the purpose of conveying to them that, upon further consideration, I was of opinion that there was no question which could properly be reserved for the court as to the meaning or effect of the word "corruptly" in the 4th section. At that meeting with counsel I accordingly stated to Mr. Butt the opinion which I had so formed, and it was not even suggested by him that I had made at the trial any unqualified or positive statement of my intention to reserve any question as to this word "corruptly." On the contrary, his recollection agreed with mine, that the effect of what I stated at the trial was that I would consider whether or not I should make any such reservation.

In the interval between the trial and that meeting I had fully considered the matter, and had come to the conclusion that upon the evidence in this case there was no question which could properly be reserved for the court as to the meaning or effect of that word "corruptly"; and even if I had, positively and without any qualification, declared at the trial my intention to make such a reservation, I would, upon further consideration, have felt myself bound not to act upon that statement. The existence of a corrupt motive in doing any act is an inference to be drawn from the evidence. With respect to such act, and under the Statutes of last Session for the trial of these election petitions, it is only questions of law that can be reserved for the court, and the judge who tries the case is the only tribunal to decide whether or not the existence of a corrupt motive is to be inferred from the evidence. With respect to the evidence as to the giving of drink at the "Devonshire Arms" hotel, the case is not confined to the entertainment given in the rooms upstairs. If it had, then, perhaps, the respectability and position of the electors who partook of it there to any extent, the fact of their being the pledged supporters of Mr. Weguelin, and the nature of the occasions on which it was given, might be relied on as showing that it was not given "corruptly," within the meaning of the Act of 1854, for the purpose of influencing their votes, or in order to promote respondent's election. But with respect to the drink given downstairs in the coffee-room and at the bar of the hotel, the case is very different.

It appears that on 14 or 15 occasions, during the few months preceding the election, there were meetings in the evening of respondent's supporters at Mr. Dill's committee-rooms, which had been engaged for respondent; that at the conclusion of such meetings great numbers of those who attended them used to go to the "Devonshire Arms" hotel, which had been also engaged for respondent; that such of those persons as were of a more respectable class went upstairs, but that considerable numbers of the humbler class, including several electors, remained below, and got drink from the bar upon their asking, but without paying for it.

It is unnecessary for me now to refer at greater length to the evidence on this part of the case, as I have observed on it more fully in my former judgment. It is sufficient to say that, considering the occasions on which such drink was given, the class of electors who partook of it, and the frequency of such proceedings, and having regard, also, to the observations of the judges in the several election cases in England, which were referred to in my former judgment, I came to the conclusion that this giving of drink must be considered as having been done in order to promote respondent's return, and as having been done corruptly. I therefore framed the case and questions for the court in accordance with that opinion; and, from their determination of the case, it follows that I should report to the Speaker that Mr. Weguelin was not duly returned at the election, but that such election was void, and that Mr. Weguelin was by his agents guilty of the offence of corrupt practice of treating at said election. I shall also, in pursuance of the Act of last Session, further report that such corrupt practice of treating was committed with the knowledge and consent of Mr. Weguelin. I stated at the trial that if those proceedings at the "Devonshire Arms" hotel should be held to amount to treating, I should report that such treating was with his knowledge and consent; and it was not, indeed, disputed at the trial that those proceedings were with his knowledge. He was examined at the trial, but was not questioned as to the fact, and there was nothing in his evidence to rebut the presumption of such knowledge and consent, which clearly arose from the entire evidence in the case.

I stated also at the trial that I would not report the extensive prevalence of corrupt practices at the election. I am still of the same opinion, and I shall accordingly report to the Speaker that, from the evidence at the trial, it did not appear to me that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at said election, and that there is not, in my opinion, reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at said election.

The only other question of which I have to dispose is that important one as to the costs of these proceedings. I stated at the trial that my impression then was that whatever would be the ultimate result of the petition, I would let each party abide his own costs; and I stated also, in my judgment, the several reasons which then induced me to come to that conclusion. I stated, however, that if I saw reason to change that opinion before I made an order on the subject, then that I should be at liberty to do so. In consequence of this reservation, and as the question of costs could not be formally decided till the result of the case submitted to the Court of Common Pleas was ascertained, I acceded to the request of Mr. Heron, on the part of the petitioner, that I should hear him on that question; and, accordingly, there was a meeting before me some few days back on the subject, attended by counsel for both parties. In considering this question of costs, it is important to observe that, so far as the petitioner himself is concerned, the question of his being awarded the costs is a matter of perfect indifference to him. It appears upon the evidence that he is not himself responsible for them to his solicitor; that he has been indemnified against them by Sir Joseph McKenna, who is to pay his solicitor the costs, and and who is, in fact, the only party who would benefit by having costs awarded against the respondent.

Youghal.

It is true that, for the purpose of deciding the validity of the election, the petition is to be regarded as that of the petitioner, and that the question as to the validity of the election should not be affected by the fact of the petitioner having been indemnified against the costs; but, as far as regards the question of costs, I think that, from the fact of such indemnity, I am at liberty to decide the matter as if Sir Joseph McKenna was himself the petitioner. One of the reasons which I mentioned in my former judgment for the opinion I then stated as to the costs, was the fact that, by the bill of particulars, specific charges were made of the bribery of 78 different electors (the entire number that voted on both sides being only 233, of which 127 voted for Mr. Weguelin, and 106 for Sir Joseph McKenna). By that Bill of Particulars also Mr. Weguelin is charged with personal bribery in all those cases except one; and various other persons, nearly 40 in number, were also charged as bribers. None of these charges were proved, and as to several of them no evidence whatever was given, and no attempt made to sustain them. And it appeared to me that these numerous and unfounded charges were either inserted for the purpose of baffling inquiry by the number of cases about which inquiry was to be made, or were inserted at hazard, without any reasonable grounds, and with a complete indifference as to their being well-founded or not. With respect to this Bill of particulars, Mr. Heron contended that the large amount of respondent's expenditure on the election, and particularly the amount of the sums paid for watchers, and for goods and clothes given to the poor, afforded reasonable ground for inquiry, and for charging that such several payments were not bonâ fide made for those purposes, but were colourable, and were, in fact, made for the purpose of bribery. I do not, however, concur with Mr. Heron in thinking that the insertion of so many charges of bribery could, to the extent he contends for, be ascribed to or considered as justified by the amount of such expenditure and payments. I was satisfied at the trial that the orders given for goods and food to the poor could not be relied on as acts of bribery, and I have no doubt that proper inquiry on the subject would have shown those acting for the petitioner that they could not be so relied on. With respect again to the case of watchers, the expenditure for that purpose cannot be relied on by Sir Joseph McKenna as justifying the charges of bribery against all by whom they were employed, when it clearly appears on the evidence that the employment of these watchers for the protection of Mr. Weguelin's voters, was rendered necessary by the violent conduct of the partisans of Sir Joseph McKenna, and by the threats made use of by some of those acting for him. I would also refer to the evidence of Mr. Deunehy, the resident magistrate, from which it would appear that the employment of those watchers contributed in some degree to the tranquillity of the town upon the day of the election.

But the insertion in the Bill of particulars of these numerous and unfounded charges of bribery was only one of the reasons which I assigned for not giving petitioner the general costs of these proceedings.

This question of costs, as I have already stated, is to be considered as if Sir Joseph McKenna was himself the petitioner, and therefore the conduct pursued previous to the election by those acting for him may well be relied on as disintitling him to such costs. I need not repeat what I stated in my former judgment as to the course of procedure adopted by Sir Joseph McKenna's supporters, from the beginning of Mr. Weguelin's candidature, the reference made by Mr. Hodnett to what the Rev. Canon Murphy was to do, the active part taken by Canon Murphy and his curates against Mr. Weguelin, the very strong appeals made by them to their congregations on the subject, the threats held out by other supporters of Sir Joseph McKenna against Mr. Eastway, Mrs. Donovan, and others of Mr. Weguelin's friends, the subsequent assaults on Donovan and his wife, and the attacks upon their and Mr. Eastway's houses, at the latter of which Mr. O'Connor, the son-in-law of Sir Joseph McKenna, was present. These were the circumstances which, in addition to the numerous charges in the Bill of particulars, and to the increased expense of the trial caused by their insertion, induced me at the trial to form the opinion that even in the event of petitioner succeeding in setting aside the election, I would not give him the general costs of the proceedings. I may also observe that, with respect to the large expenditure of Mr. Weguelin on the election, which is relied on as one ground for making him liable to costs, it does not appear what was the amount of Sir Joseph McKenna's expenditure, as he had not, up to the time of the trial of the petition, lodged the detailed statement of his expenses, as he was bound to do, by the 26 Vict. c. 29, s. 2, within two months from the election, under a penalty of 5*l.* for every day beyond that period that he delayed doing so. And this default on his part should also, I think, be considered in deciding his right to costs.

With respect to the decisions already made as to the costs of these petition proceedings, it has been held as a general rule that the costs should abide the result, though the 41st section of the Act lays down no such rule. That section gives the judge who tries the case full power and discretion as to the award of costs, and it is clear from it that in every case the judge is at liberty to consider whether there are exceptional circumstances in the case which, in his judgment and discretion, render it advisable not to give costs to the successful party.

That discretion has been exercised in some cases in England by refusing, on special grounds, to give costs to the sitting Member, though he had successfully defended his seat, and defeated the petition; and I see no ground on principle, why, in the converse case of a petitioner succeeding in setting aside the election, such discretion may not be exercised under the special circumstances, by refusing petitioner his costs.

It frequently happened in the proceedings on election petitions before Committees of the House of Commons previous to the recent Statute, that costs were not given against the sitting Member, though unseated for bribery or treating. But Mr. Heron contends that in all the trials that have taken place in England, under the recent Statute, costs have been given against the sitting Member whenever he was unseated for corrupt practices. He has referred to the Norwich case, the Bradford case (No. 1), the Bewdley case, and other cases in England, in which the sitting Member was unseated for bribery or treating, and had to pay costs, and also to the Taunton case, in which he was unseated for bribery, and had to pay costs, though the petition contained over 300 charges of bribery, and only 30 were proved. But in none of those cases did it occur, as in this case, that the award of costs to the petitioner would be for the benefit of the defeated candidate, whose supporters had, previous to the election, pursued the course adopted by the supporters of Sir Joseph McKenna in this case, and to which I have already referred.

I therefore remain of the opinion which I expressed at the trial as to not ordering the petitioner the general costs of these proceedings, with the exception of the costs of arguing before the Common Pleas the case which I submitted for their consideration; I reserved that question for the court at the instance of respondent's counsel, and I think it reasonable he should pay the petitioner's costs of that argument.

DROGHEDA ELECTION.

Drogheda.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Keogh, 19 January 1869.

Mr. Justice Keogh.] To this case of the Drogheda Election Petition I have given the most anxious consideration in my power. The parties have been represented here by counsel on both sides of the very greatest ability, and everything that could by possibility be urged upon the one side or upon the other, has been presented in the fullest and in the fairest manner to the court; therefore the parties have no reason whatsoever to complain that their case has not been, in evidence and in argument, fully developed so as to arrive at a just and satisfactory conclusion.

Since the court sat yesterday evening, I have taken the trouble, most anxiously and most carefully, of going over the entire of the evidence in this case, and I have given it the most careful consideration that I possibly could, with a view of arriving at a just determination, both as to the matters of law and as to the matters of fact, which were presented to my mind by the counsel upon both sides.

The petition substantially consists of, I think I may say, three clauses, containing charges against the sitting Member. The first clause to which I refer, is the third in number, which states, "That upon several days preceding the election, addresses and speeches of an exciting and inflammatory nature were delivered in the public streets of Drogheda, by Mr. Whitworth and several other persons, in his presence, and with his knowledge and consent, for the purpose of urging and inciting a number of persons to use force in order to intimidate and prevent the electors from voting for the petitioner." The fourth clause alleges, that "A large number of men and women were hired by the said Benjamin Whitworth, or with his knowledge and consent, for the purpose of intimidating electors, in order to induce them to vote for the said Benjamin Whitworth, or to refrain from voting for the petitioner or Mr. Brodigan." The fifth clause alleges, that "Several members of the Roman Catholic priesthood improperly exercised their spiritual influence over many of the electors, for the purpose of constraining them to vote for Mr. Whitworth, and to prevent them from voting for the petitioner or for Mr. Brodigan." The seventh clause, which is the most important of all, says, that "Upon the 20th of November 1868, being the polling-day, several thousand persons, friends and supporters of the said Benjamin Whitworth, armed, some with fire-arms, and others with bludgeons and sticks, attacked voters who wished and had promised to vote for the petitioner, and inflicted very severe wounds and other bodily injuries upon them, and forcibly prevented many of them from recording their votes, and also attacked a large escort of cavalry, infantry, and police, who were acting as an escort for the protection of voters, and caused such terror and alarm in the minds of the electors, that many who had promised to vote for Mr. Brodigan, and some who had promised to vote for the petitioner, were induced by intimidation to vote for Mr. Whitworth; and many of the electors who had promised to vote for the petitioner, and had come long distances to do so, and were most anxious to do so if they could, without risk of their lives, were deterred from going to the poll and recording their votes." The eighth clause is, "That the offence of undue influence at the said election was committed by the said Benjamin Whitworth, and a great number of other persons with his knowledge and consent; and that an organised system of intimidation and violence was established by the said Benjamin Whitworth and his friends and agents, and that the said Benjamin Whitworth Whitworth could at any time have restrained the rioters from acts of violence if he had been willing to do so."

Drogheda.

Those are substantially the charges in the petition. The petitioner does not by that petition claim the seat; he merely prays that the election may be declared a void election; and he seeks to avoid that election by trying to establish a breach of the well-established principles of law, namely, that an election should be a free election; that it should be the result of the free voices of those who are qualified by law to register their votes, and that those voters, to be free, must be uninfluenced either by any undue pressure, coming from whatever quarter it may, or by spiritual influence, by mob rioting, by bribery, by treating, or by violence. If any of those influences are admitted to have their way at an election, the voices of the electors cannot be freely given. And whether it be one or whether it be many, whosoever, being an elector, is acted upon by any one of those illegal influences, his vote is not a free vote given at the election.

One of the best established rules of freedom of election is, that the electors shall come to the poll perfectly free as they are registered, that they shall not themselves accept bribes, that they shall not be treated, that they shall not be coerced, and that they shall not be intimidated; and if, as regards any single vote, it is proved to the satisfaction of the court that any such voter has been so acted upon, it is the imperative duty of the court to resolve that that is not a good vote. I am taking it now step by step; first, as to the question of avoiding an election. There may be many votes declared to be bad votes; there may be men bribed at an election; there may be men treated at an election; there may be men coerced at an election; but it does not necessarily follow that, because of those circumstances, the election itself is void. But I take it to be well settled law, not only settled by a chain of decisions of Committees of the House of Commons, but decided also collaterally in cases in which such questions were brought before the superior courts, that an organised system of bribery, that an organised system of treating, will invalidate an election, and compel the court (whatever it may be) trying the question to declare that to be a void election. Surely it could not be for a moment contended that supposing, in a borough of this description, banks were to open their doors, to let it be understood and known that every man who voted in a particular way would receive a sum of money, that large amounts were deposited for that purpose which you might never be able to trace to the candidate, or to any one of his agents; but yet you would be able to prove that there was an organised and extensive system of bribery carried on in the borough, an election under such circumstances could be allowed to stand. Take, then, the case of an organised system of treating. I am speaking now of cases in which nothing could be traced to the candidate or his agents; but suppose that at the head of every street food and drink were provided in large quantities, and places for eating and places for drinking opened, as to which it was known that every voter who wished to go thither and seek for food or for drink would receive it, provided he was a voter upon the side of a particular candidate, and that that was an organised system for the purpose of debauching the voters of a particular borough, although all the while not traceable to the Member or to his agents, so as to disqualify him at future elections, is it to be supposed for a moment that that organised system would not defeat the election? I take it that it is well settled that it would do so, and that there is no possibility of contesting that proposition.

Now, I refer to a case in which probably as much indulgence was shown to the sitting Member by a Committee of the House of Commons as in any case which is to be found within the whole range of the authorities; that is the well-known Dungarvan case, in which the present Sir Joseph Napier, afterwards Lord Chancellor of Ireland, was the Chairman of the Committee. There the Member was declared duly elected; but what does that learned Chairman say? "Two great principles," said the learned Chairman, "were always sought to be maintained; first, that the election should be free; secondly, that the character of the candidate should be pure in regard to that election. It is very material to distinguish between acts by which an election may be avoided, and the misconduct by which the candidate may be disqualified. It is justly observed by Mr. Rogers, in the seventh edition of his work on Elections, that there are usually two distinct issues; first, whether the election has been procured by bribery or other undue influence; and, secondly, whether the sitting Member has been guilty by himself or his agents; this second issue being subordinate to the first. He states that the second issue is usually entered into with a view to incapacitate the sitting Member from becoming a candidate, supposing the election should be declared void. On such an issue it becomes the very essence of the inquiry to show that he was cognisant of the corruption; for the object being to fix upon him a personal incapacity, strict proof may be well demanded to show that he was implicated in the transactions complained of. The avoidance of an election depends upon the effect of all acts done which interfere with the freedom required by law. The disqualification of a candidate arises from his culpability in what he does, or causes to be done, or attempts to do, for the purpose of procuring a return by undue influence. These matters are in their nature distinct, and ought not to be confounded."

Now, again, I recur to the words, "The avoidance of an election depends upon the effect of all acts done which interfere with the freedom required by the law;" and, acting upon that well-settled view of the law, Mr. Pales yesterday, in his most able and eloquent address, did not seem to me to contend that an election might not be avoided by an organised system of bribery or an organised system of treating, but he most properly said, "You may have a vote struck off the poll, and the voter incapacitated, without unseating the sitting Member." So, undoubtedly, you may have many voters declared incapacitated and struck off the poll upon a scrutiny, without disqualifying the sitting Member, or unseating him. So, in like manner, for treating, you may have many votes similarly dealt with without unseating the sitting Member. But again, I say, if the aggregate of those instances amount to what may be called an organised system of bribery, or an organised system of treating, pushed to such extremities as to convince the tribunal which is deciding upon the case that freedom of election has not existed, then that election ought to be and will be avoided, although it may not have the consequence of disqualifying for a future election the sitting Member.

Mr. Palles, in his very clear and astute argument, assimilated intimidation to bribery and treating, but; at the same time, tried to limit the consequences of acts of intimidation, and he used a very remarkable phrase, that "it must be the communism of intimidation." Now, I adopt that expression, though probably it is not a strictly accurate expression; but to my mind it conveys a great deal; and the way in which I accept it is this, that to put intimidation upon a parallel with bribery and treating, it must be spread over such an extent of ground, it must permeate through the community to such an extent that the tribunal considering the case, and ultimately to decide upon it, is satisfied, if it be so, that freedom of election has ceased to exist in consequence. If that be the case, I, for my part, see no distinction between the law as to an organised system of bribery, an organised system of treating, and an organised system of intimidation.

This distinction was taken, before some Committees of the House of Commons constituted as they were, that intimidation however extensive it might be, unless it had a substantial influence upon the fate of the election, could not result in the election being declared void. And Mr. Palles with the great industry which he always shows, and which assures me that everything that can be said upon his side has been brought forward, mentioned a number of cases, and particularly, I think, referred to the Roxburgh case, which may be considered a leading case upon the subject.

Before I comment upon this case, I will say one word as to the whole class of those decisions before Committees of the House of Commons. In the first place, the law of Parliament has only grown up on the subject of these elections within say two or three centuries, and the decisions which have been made upon these questions of Election Petitions were, at all events until within that period, entirely unknown to Courts of Justice, and for obvious reasons. First, there was not this conflict about elections in earlier times. At one period in our history it was a labour to induce any one to be a Member of Parliament in many places. They had not to drive the voters to the poll, but sometimes the candidates had to be driven to Westminster; that is not the case now. Secondly, there was a very jealous spirit on the part of the House of Commons, of even the Courts of Law trenching at all upon their privileges. And some of the most eminent judges whom we ever had, said it would be rather a serious thing to have anything to do with the privileges of the House of Commons, or to say one word as to the manner in which their Members had been elected. Coming down to 150 or 200 years ago, we first discover a trace of authority upon the subject, but it is only within a very recent period; that is to say, only within the last 80 or 100 years, that those decisions have found their way into reported cases. This case of the Roxburgh Election, receiving as it did almost all the antecedent decisions, was argued by some of the most eminent Parliamentary lawyers that ever appeared at that bar. I allude to Mr. Austin, who was perhaps the most eminent advocate who ever argued before Committees of the House of Commons. After reviewing those authorities (I believe it is stated in the notes that these cases had been very carefully examined, so as to insure their accuracy even in the arguments of counsel), Mr. Austin thus sums up the result of all these cases:—"In the Reports of Perry and Knapp are to be found collected cases of riots, beginning with the year 1624, and ending with the Coventry case in 1827. Among them are only two instances in which the election was not set aside. The Pontefract Election in 1624 was set aside. The Southwark Election in 1702 was set aside, though several witnesses swore that they never knew a quieter election. Three Coventry Elections in 1706, 1722, and 1736; two Westminster Elections in 1722 and 1741; the Pontefract in 1768; the Morpeth in 1774; the Coventry in 1781; and the Nottingham in 1802, were all set aside on account of riots. The Coventry Elections in 1827 and in 1833" (Coventry appears to have earned for itself rather an unenviable notoriety) "are the only instances of petitions not being successful where riots have been proved." And then Mr. Austin goes on to explain why he thinks even that the late Coventry decision is not an authority, because he says, that before the Committee came to the conclusion of the inquiry, it appeared that the petitioning candidates, "Mr. Tyler and his colleague, abandoned the contest, and retired without any reference whatever to the riots, and consented to the return of the sitting Members without any protest against the validity of the election." But notwithstanding the very able argument of Mr. Austin, Mr. Palles very properly said, and relied upon the fact, that this Committee in the Roxburgh case arrived at resolutions, showing that riots had taken place, but still allowing the sitting Member to hold his seat. Now it appears upon the resolutions of that Committee, "That it appears to this Committee, that at the late election for the county of Roxburgh, riotous and tumultuous proceedings took place, in consequence of which, according to the evidence produced before this Committee, prosecutions were instituted in the Justiciary Court of Scotland, upon which prosecutions certain of the offenders were convicted. That the Committee are of opinion that the riots were not of such a nature, nor of so long a duration, as to prevent the votes of the electors electors of the same county of Roxburgh being taken in the matter of such election." That was their decision. And the basis of this decision is, that although there were riots, yet they were not of such a nature, or of so long a duration, as to prevent the votes of the electors being taken. But even that resolution was not arrived at unanimously by the Committee. On the contrary, the minority of the Committee moved that the election should be declared null and void by reason of the adjournment and premature close of the poll at Hawick, whereby the electors of that district were deprived of a portion of the period allowed by law for the exercise of the franchise. And that proposition on a division of the Committee was negatived by six to three, the Committee consisting of nine members. And the resolution arrived at was only on the ground that the interruption of the poll or "the riots were not of such a nature, nor of so long a duration as to prevent the votes of the electors of the same county of Roxburgh being taken in the matter of such election." Accordingly it was held that the sitting Member should retain his seat.

Let me say one word as to the Election Committees of the House of Commons. No man has a greater respect than I have for everything appertaining to the House of Commons. It is the greatest happiness and pleasure of my life that I once had the honour of being a Member of that great assemblage. No one can possibly have a greater respect than I have for Committees of that House, and for their decisions. I have myself sat on Election Committees, and know something therefore of their practice, but with all the respect which I feel for those Committees, they were not composed of men who had received a strictly legal education. Occasionally there was a legal gentleman on the Committee, and sometimes a lawyer was the Chairman, but generally speaking the majority of the Members of those Committees were persons who did not even pretend to be capable of deciding upon legal questions. It is not necessary that I should repeat that when I say this, I mean not the slightest disrespect to Members who ever sat upon any Committee of the House of Commons. But the House of Commons itself, as a component part of the Legislature, has declared by a legislative enactment its own opinion, namely, that those Committees were not the best tribunals for the decision of questions of this kind, and it has abdicated its own functions in that respect, and has sent such questions to be tried before the ordinary tribunals of the country.

The distinction to which I was referring may be illustrated in the following manner:— Let me suppose that 50 men were shot dead (if the argument is worth anything, it must be pressed to that) outside this court-house upon the 21st of last November, every single man of them coming up with Sir Leopold M'Clintock's ticket in his hand, from his tally-room, to register his vote on his behalf, every one of their lives might be taken away, and yet that being admitted, and proved, and conceded, the election should still not be declared a void election. That is the proposition, because by the very able argument of Mr. Beron, seconded and enforced, and losing nothing of its weight, but as I think gaining as it went along by the admirable argument of Mr. Palles, it is contended that provided the sitting Member has, at the close of the poll, a majority of registered electors, be it ever so small (and I lay no stress upon the circumstance that it was here of the very smallest, because in the view I take of this case it is not to be decided by mere numerical calculations), then no matter what happens outside that; no matter how many electors are assaulted; no matter how many are driven from the polling-booths; no matter how many men are hunted through the fields, and obliged to go by devious ways and across paths, in order to get back to their homes, or to the conveyances which are to take them to their homes; no matter how much blood has been shed; no matter how much spiritual intimidation has been brought to bear upon the electors; still if the candidate who is returned upon the day of the polling by the high sheriff is able to take his pen and say, there are 1,000 electors on the register for the borough of Drogheda, my seat cannot be in any way endangered, or the election declared null and void, because I have polled, no matter by what means, 501 electors. To be of any value the argument must be pressed to that, unless (which is an impossibility) the other candidate can show that he, but for the violence which was used, would have had a majority on the day of the poll.

I must at once say that that is a proposition from which I wholly and entirely dissent. It is subversive, in my mind, of the whole principle of freedom of election; and if freedom of election is subverted, in vain do you extend franchises, in vain do you confer privileges, in vain do you strive to enfranchise the people; because the greater and the more extensive are the privileges that you confer, if they can only be exercised under intimidation and undue influence, I care not whether it be lay or ecclesiastical, under violence of any kind, or seductions or blandishments of any nature, the sooner will the liberties of the people be subverted.

Again, it is said by both of the counsel for the sitting Member, that freedom of election is secured, provided that the majority are shown to have had the power of recording their votes. I deny that altogether. This is not solely a contest between Mr. Benjamin Whitworth the sitting Member, and Sir Leopold M'Clintock the petitioner. There is another and a greater interest than belongs to either of them; there is the public interest. The liberties of the people of this country are involved in the freedom of election; and I say that the humblest individual, the poorest unit in the whole of the constituency of the county of the town of Drogheda, has as good a right freely, without fear, without favour, without intimidation of any kind or description, to come into this court-house upon the day of the election as the richest man upon the register, and as good a right as the great majority of that constituency. Take it that a candidate has by the most legitimate means, without any injury whatsoever being inflicted upon any one, without any coercion, without any bribery or treating, obtained the votes of nine-tenths of the constituency in his favour, yet it is of vital importance to the public weal that the remaining tenth should be able to record their votes and to express their opinions. How often, and for how many long tens of years, have we seen the minority of the country trying to cause their opinions to prevail in Parliament; and how long have we seen them borne down by the majority, and in some instances rightly so. But in other cases the good sense of the minority has ultimately prevailed, if it was the better cause; and what was the minority has become in the end a triumphant majority, and the principles of the minority have been asserted. But if the majority are not only to be able to choose their representative, but having the strong arm with them, are to drive from the very hustings the minority who are seeking, though unavailingly, to make their opinions triumphant; if they are not only to send their own representatives to Parliament, as of course the majority must do, but if they are to drive by terror and with ignominy, with scorn and with denunciation, the minority from the poll, what becomes of freedom in this country? If such a principle as that were to prevail, it would take us back to a time when there was what was called a republic in Rome, and when men who came up to express their opinions were driven from the Roman Forum with brands and swords, and death. The Roman citizens were not allowed to vote, and then that terminated, as all such proceedings will terminate in every country in the world, in freedom itself becoming a disgrace, and the mass of mankind rushing for protection into the arms of some despotic authority or order.

That is the proposition that is put on behalf of the sitting Member. It is alleged that he had the majority of the whole constituency, namely, I think 365. There were some of them who gave evidence, whose names I can presently recall, who said that they would have voted otherwise, but for intimidation. Men absolutely came up here, and swore that they had promised their votes to Sir Leopold M'Clintock, and that they would have exercised the franchise in his favour, "If I had been protected," was the expression used by one man; "but he was afraid of his life," was the expression of another. Take away those two or three votes (though I say again that I attach no value to the numerical argument, as I call it), and even that sorry argument disappears, namely, as to having a majority of the constituency.

Then it is said, how is the party to show that it did not influence the election? The petitioner should prove that it did. First, you are to obtain a majority by violence, by intimidation, and by undue influence; and, having then so got a majority, you are to turn round on the other party, and say, "You are in the minority, and you must show that the mind of each voter that composed that majority, so as to place me ahead of you, has been influenced by this intimidation. In the case of bribery it might be hard, if there was an extensively organised system, to trace it to each individual voter; and on the case of treating detection would be still more difficult. But even there you have something to lay your hands upon; you have money, you have food, you have drink, but who is there that will venture to gauge the influences of intimidation? Who will say how far that reaches? Who will be able to tell what the effect of intimidation is upon the human mind? It is true that you may prove that a man has been told, standing outside the Court-house, "If you go in and vote for Sir Leopold M'Clintock your brains will be dashed out." That will show that that man has been intimidated; but will any man say that if there are half a dozen voters standing by whilst that same observation is made, the influence of that threat, directed specially against him, will not operate upon them? How is the limit to be fixed? How is the influence of intimidation to be traced? I will put a case which I am sorry to say is not an imaginary one. Supposing that a minister of religion were to say to an individual voter, "If you do not vote in a particular way, and if anything should happen to you, between this time and the time at which you should reach your dwelling-house, your immortal soul, your salvation, will be perilled," who is to say what would be the extent of the influence of that observation, proceeding from the mouth of a minister of religion, upon the whole of his congregation? It is not possible to give evidence in a court of justice which would carry out the proposition which has been laid down by the counsel for the respondent here; and if at all it is to be made a matter of evidence, the onus of proof should be thrown upon them to show that when the law has been violated, when gross outrage and intimidation have been organised, that intimidation and that violence have not produced their natural consequences, namely, terrifying the people from the exercise of their legitimate franchise.

That is my view of the law, and I hope it is a correct one. I am sure that I have approached the subject with as anxious a consideration as ever man gave to a case, carefully jealous as far as I could be, that I did no injury either to the sitting Member or to the electors who chose him as their representative; but also feeling it to be my imperative duty to see that the public interests were not disregarded in this inquiry, if I arrived at the conclusion that there had been acts committed which were calculated to destroy the freedom of election.

Now, let us come to the facts of this case; they do not range over a very long period of time; Sir Leopold M'Clintock came late into the field. A question has been raised as to when he came into the field, or why he came into the field, but it is sufficient to know that he came into the field; every man has a right in this free country to be a candidate. Every person has a right in this free country to vote for any man he likes; I do not enter into Sir Leopold M'Clintock's qualifications, or his position; I have nothing to do with his qualifications or with his position, or with those of his honourable

honourable opponent. It is said that he came because there was an unworthy attack made upon the sitting Member as to his conduct in another place in the discharge of his duty under the solemn obligation of his oath; I do not feel that I should be justified in passing that by, without expressing the greatest disgust at that attempt which I believe no gentleman could avow, and afterwards ask to be admitted into the society of gentlemen. Mr. Whitworth, I make no doubt, did his duty as an honourable man, acting under the obligation of his oath; a painful duty it was, no doubt, to him; but I am quite satisfied that wherever he goes no honourable man will ever turn aside from him, because he so discharged faithfully his duty, and only the lowest of society and the basest of men could ever have thought of bringing such an accusation against him; Sir Leopold M'Clintock's counsel have disavowed his being a party to those proceedings. I am perfectly satisfied that it did not require any disavowal from any person of the community who was actuated by manly and honourable feelings.

The 13th of November was the first day of Sir Leopold M'Clintock's canvass, that was a Friday. His first witness, Mr. Cairns, who is, I believe, a brewer in this town, and I suppose a person of some influence, canvassed with him, and says that at first they were well and respectfully received, and that there was no incivility. On the Monday they attempted to canvass, and then, he says, the whole character and appearance of the place was changed, and they were immediately met with insults from the mob. Now to that I call particular attention; they were immediately met by a violent mob, and that very mob, Mr. Cairns says, closed upon him, and tried to throw him down, very near this court-house; and then there is this remarkable circumstance, which has not been much commented upon, but which I take to be the opening of the whole of this inquiry. In that mob were two solicitors, one of them Mr. Clinton, and the other Mr. Verdon; one of them, Mr. Clinton, turns out to have been the conducting agent of Mr. Whitworth, and he was in that mob, and as Mr. Cairns says, was countenancing that mob; and Mr. Verdon, who was another solicitor, and who was in company with the conducting agent for Mr. Whitworth, used these remarkable words, "We will have no Orangemen here." Can it be said, for a moment, that that was not inciting the mob, and countenancing the violence of the mob, Mr. Cairns himself being attacked by the mob upon that occasion? If that was in any way highly coloured by Mr. Cairns, I will be glad to know why Mr. Clinton was not put into the chair to explain that occurrence? Mr. Clinton has sat in this court during the whole of this inquiry, properly assisting his counsel, and I have no doubt, though I do not know his appearance, that Mr. Verdon was within reach also; yet although this evidence was given by Mr. Cairns, denoting the character of the very commencement of these election meetings, three days have elapsed since the commencement of this inquiry, the case of the respondent being conducted by the most able counsel, who had that evidence before them, and neither Mr. Clinton nor Mr. Verdon is called to explain, in any way, that transaction; what the result of that mob attack was, has been described by Mr. Cairns; that Sir Leopold M'Clintock and his supporters held a consultation, and came to the conclusion that it was utterly impossible for them, with safety to themselves or to the peace of the town, to continue their canvass; that was on Monday the 16th.

It is said that the whole of the rioting at this election was caused by its coming somehow or other to the knowledge of the people of this town, upon the subsequent Thursday, that some telegraphic message had been sent, or that some call had been made in Dublin to bring down some Orangemen here on the part of Sir Leopold M'Clintock; it is perfectly plain that this idea and this method of conducting this contest arose long before that, because on the Monday (and there is not a pretence for supposing that there had been any hint of the kind as to bringing men from Dublin until the Thursday) Mr. Verdon and Mr. Clinton being both together in the presence of a violent and excited mob who assaulted Mr. Cairns; one of the principal supporters of Sir Leopold M'Clintock used that identical expression, "We will have no Orangemen here," and Mr. Cairns was accordingly assaulted. He gave an account of that assault, and he appealed, as many of the witnesses did, to persons present who could have corroborated or contradicted him; he turned round, sitting in that chair, and said, "I think Mr. Gardner, the sub-inspector of police, was present at that time." Mr. Gardner, a gentleman of the highest possible character, and who is respected by everybody who knows him, could have been called; his being in the constabulary, so far from protecting him from liability to examination, places him at the disposal of the parties to say what he knew about it; but he has never been put into the chair.

On the Tuesday, Mr. Cairns says, it became hopeless to canvass, from the state of the town. Wednesday is the day of the nomination. Now I am not at all strait-laced about the noise and the confusion of a nomination day. Most of us have had experience of such things, and as to the disturbance, and not being able to hear the voices of the candidates, I think it is looked on as a sort of saturnalia, and if it does not proceed to outrageous violence the less we say about it the better. But what takes place? After all this violence, and all being so contrived that nobody could be heard, which I believe is the normal state of a nomination, how is the poll demanded? It is stated by Mr. Cairns that, when all was over here, in this court-house in which we are now sitting, he met outside the respected high sheriff, who gave his evidence, in my opinion, clearly and satisfactorily and fairly, and who, I see no reason to doubt, did act as a gentleman in the whole of these transactions. And what does the high sheriff say? "Who is the person that proposed, or did any one; second, Sir Leopold M'Clintock, and has any one asked a poll for him?" This was after they had left the court-house, and were out in the passage. Such is the confusion that even the high sheriff, the returning officer, has to apply to a voter to know whether a poll has been demanded. "At all events," says Mr. Cairns, "I now demand a poll, to put it beyond doubt;" and the high sheriff then says, "All right."

That is the day of the nomination, and then there is an intervening day. I do not refer now to the statements made before this time about speeches and other things done upon the Sunday. Mr. McKenna, a man who, I think, was an active supporter of Mr. Brodigan, but who did not ultimately vote, swore he did not vote for Mr. Brodigan, for fear of his life. He may, without intending to speak an untruth, have highly coloured what was passing before him or in his mind; but he used a very remarkable expression; he said, "I don't want to say anything about names or persons, but," addressing me, he said, "on the Monday morning a reign of terror existed in this town." That was his very remarkable expression. He described that he was told by men armed with bludgeons that it would be the last vote he ever gave if he voted for Mr. Brodigan; he was told that his premises would be burnt, I think he said; and two miniature coffins were laid before his door. Accordingly, he does not vote, although he appears to have been one of the most active men in bringing forward Mr. Brodigan to contest the place. That is a very remarkable circumstance; he absolutely does not vote at all, he himself being a man in the better class of life, and a sturdy and powerful man in his physique, and an intelligent man, according to his lights, from the way in which he gave his evidence. He says, "I don't want to say what occurred on a particular day, but on the Monday morning a reign of terror prevailed in this town."

Now we come down to the eventful day, the day before the polling in this place. Mr. Whitworth is staying at a particular hotel, which I think is called "Simcock's Hotel," and on the evening of this day the people outside are addressed from the window or the verandah (as some of the witnesses called it) of that hotel. Beyond the possibility of doubt it is established that there were a number of Roman Catholic clergymen in that room upon that evening. We have the shorthand writer's report of what passed, and with the exception of one single word no one insinuated that he has misrepresented anything there. So far as Mr. Whitworth is concerned, he, I must say, gave his evidence throughout, as it appeared to me, with the greatest wish to be candid in every way to the Court, however serious the inquiry may be to him, and in a manner that I think was creditable to him, but there is no question at all about the accuracy of this Mr. McCabe's report. What are the statements made upon this evening? The first gentleman who speaks, and who I think is the Reverend Mr. Murphy, as distinguished from the Reverend Dr. Murphy, said, "He would advise them seriously to be fully prepared, for the Orange party in Drogheda were anxious and panting to crush them. He never wished any man to do wrong, but he must again call on them to be prepared, for the Drogheda Orangemen had secured the assistance of 500 of their brethren in Dublin. Those Catholics who are on the side of the Orangemen must be put down; they must be crushed at any risk. They should therefore be well prepared for them, for it was a terrible crisis;" that is the first speaker; then comes the address of the next gentleman, the Reverend Mr. McKee, and he said "the Orangemen of Dublin were on the next day to come down to Drogheda; if those men should come, let them hurl them into the Boyne. Let the people meet them in the morning at the train, and give them a warm reception." The first gentleman says that "The Catholics who are on the side of the Orangemen must be crushed at any risk," and then the next gentleman says, "Let them hurl the Orangemen into the Boyne; let the people meet them in the morning at the train, and give them a warm reception." Again this passage occurs: "He advised all who heard him to bring their friends to the poll, to marshal their forces early in the morning, and when they were about to charge, say, 'Friends of freedom, charge them home; foes of freedom faugh-a-ballagh,' which we all know is 'Clear the way.'" Then again he says, "The would-be Catholic Member, Mr. Brodigan, and Orange emissaries from hell, had come among them at this critical juncture; he advised the people to be faithful in following the advice of their clergy." This is another clergyman, the Reverend Mr. Gavin: "Yesterday, in the City of Dublin, some of the friends of ascendancy in this town hired 300 assassins to come down and butcher the Catholics of Drogheda. He asked them would they meet them; he assured them, on the word of a priest, that what he said was a fact, that some party in favour of the Orange candidate here went to Dublin and purchased the tag-rag and bob-tail of Orangedom to come down and butcher them to-morrow, and he did not want the people of Drogheda to treat those hirelings as they deserved." Now Mr. Gavin has himself been examined; and he says that that report is substantially correct, with the exception that he says something about "Despising them," which is not reported here, and that is the only word in which an alteration was suggested. That speech was heard by Mr. Whitworth; he says he was present at the concluding sentences of Dr. Murphy's speech. Dr. Murphy's speech preceded the Reverend Mr. Gavin's, and Mr. Whitworth says that he considers, having heard it read, that that report of the Reverend Mr. Gavin's speech is substantially correct, and Mr. Gavin himself says the same.

Now Mr. McKee is the first person who called upon them to go to the station to meet these so-called Orangemen at a particular hour of the morning, and to throw them into the Boyne; Mr. McKee on examination has stated that he and all his fellow-clergymen here had very great influence with the people; no doubt they had great influence with the people, and they ought to have great influence with the people; the reasons for that influence influence have been spoken of in language which I could not attempt to imitate without greatly taking from its effect, in the most eloquent and generous words which were pronounced by Mr. Plunkett in this case; words worthy, I will say, of the eloquence of the illustrious man from whom he is descended. Now, what takes place? The crowd outside say (and this is admitted), "We will, father, meet them;" it is proved distinctly that they cried this out from the crowd. But by whom is this conduct to be judged? Ultimately, in this court, I am to decide upon it; but in whom has it found a judge before it has come into this court? Why, in the person of the Reverend Mr. Powderley, a Roman Catholic clergyman of this town, who being then and there present on that evening, felt that the thing was altogether too strong; that it had gone beyond all latitude; that it had become positively dangerous, even to the cause in which they were themselves enlisted; and he tells us here, and it is highly to his credit, that he rushed forward, and twice or three times remonstrated with his brother clergymen, and tried to stop their uttering those addresses to the people; there can be nothing stronger than the fact, that a reverend gentleman of the same community, living in the same town, acting in the same cause, anxious for the same interest, felt upon that occasion that the speeches of those gentlemen had exceeded all bounds, and that they were calculated to do injury to the very cause which they were anxious should be triumphant? But what takes place the next morning. At half-past eight o'clock, at the very earliest time, I have the best and most conclusive evidence as to what was the state of the railway station; down came Mr. Hamilton and some two or three voters by the early train, which came from Balbriggan, I suppose, not from Dublin, and they wanted to go up the town to vote; there was a resident magistrate there, Mr. Reed, who had with him a number of constabulary and a number of soldiers; and that experienced gentleman, I suppose, knowing that it would be his duty to escort and protect persons going to the poll, absolutely tells the gentlemen who had arrived at that early hour of the morning, that they could not with safety go up to the town (not a thousand yards, I believe, from where I now sit), and that he would not undertake to bring them down until he had largely increased the escort which he was to have there to meet the train arriving at 12 o'clock; but that when he had doubled and trebled his force, when he had the hussars, when he had an additional force of infantry, and when he had an additional force of constabulary, he would escort them to the town: to complete the whole "pride, pomp, and circumstance of war," nothing was wanting but that there should have been a park of artillery. Mr. Hamilton is anxious to get up the town and to get away as quietly as possible, and to vote as early as possible; and actually the resident magistrate, who must stand independent between all parties, says, "I will not undertake the risk of taking you to the town," and begs Mr. Hamilton to wait until he has an increased escort; that evidence is uncontradicted in this case in all its material passages, and even if it were contradicted, I would rely in balancing the evidence (and here I must act not only as judge but as jury) upon the testimony of that gentleman, Mr. Reed. He said that he could not escort those voters up, and as a matter of fact, they were not escorted up until the other party had arrived; to what then took place I shall have to refer in more detail in another branch of the case. Mr. Hamilton is with those four men whose names are Semple, McDonald, Usher, and Devine; Semple appears to have been a man of a better class than the rest; probably he felt that he had friends in the bystanders, and that he was known; at all events, he goes up alone and votes for Sir Leopold McClintock, and does so in safety; it is an extraordinary circumstance; McDonald disappears, no one knows how or whither, but he got back home in some way, and did not vote; Usher and Devine remained with Mr. Hamilton; Mr. Hamilton is said to be the agent over the property on which they live; it is said, on the other hand, that there was tyranny established over those voters; that may or may not be, but so far as the evidence is given here, it does not go very far, because the letter by which those voters were canvassed is produced; I do not doubt that Sir Leopold McClintock would prefer not to be so highly lauded in the letter as he was; he is no doubt a very eminent and remarkable man, but he is described as "the leading man in Europe," or in similar language; but perhaps a little exaggeration in election times is not to be wondered at; he is a very eminent man indeed, of whom this country is justly proud. Mr. Hamilton says, "Sir Leopold McClintock is going up for the borough of Drogheda, and you will oblige me by giving him your vote;" he gives them half a sovereign to go up to Dublin to amuse themselves with, and on the morning of the election they are here with Mr. Hamilton at the station; they being here Mr. Whitworth arrives on the scene, and so does Mr. Clinton, who, mark, was identified with the very first violent mob that was acting in this town, and who is the conducting agent of Mr. Whitworth; Mr. Whitworth is up with his conducting agent at the station, when it is surrounded and filled by an admittedly most violent mob, because it must have been violent, as it intimidated Mr. Reed, the resident magistrate; they are armed with sticks; they are armed, as one of the clergymen, Mr. Moreton from Lismore, I think, told us, with railway bolts, those joining bolts about a foot long, to which nuts are attached, by which two rails are laid together and joined, and they are flourishing these weapons. I can picture to myself the scene, the men holding those dreadful weapons outside the walls of the station, and calling to those gentlemen and to the constabulary, either to let them in at the voters or to let the voters out to them, and that they would provide for them; and whilst this scene is going on those two voters are appealed to by Mr. Whitworth, and to one of them (I think to Usher) Mr. Whitworth says, "For whom will you vote?" The crowd being round them in this way, and at the same time two or three iron bolts being held up in his face, Usher says, "I will vote for you," and he has come on the table since and said that he did it to save his life; the moment he says that Mr. Whitworth says, "Come along here." I do not mean to say with any criminal intent as to coercing this man, but he takes him away, and he is immediately hoisted upon the shoulders of the people, and they carry him off to Mr. Whitworth's tally-rooms; he declares that he went to vote for Mr. Whitworth, but he never voted for Mr. Whitworth; that was a most remarkable circumstance. What takes place with Devine? "For whom do you vote?" he is asked, and he replies "I will not vote for anyone;" and Mr. Whitworth, according to his own statement, leaves that place, but almost instantaneously, as Mr. Hamilton and Devine describe the scene (and their description of it is entirely uncontradicted), that mob, in which two minutes before Mr. Whitworth and his agent, Mr. Clinton, were in close contact, seize this man Devine and drag him away, as he says himself, and put him on a car; six men get up, three on each side, and instead of this man, who we are asked to believe willingly went on the car, being placed on the side of the car, he is thrown on his back on the well cushion; and so carried up to Mr. Whitworth's committee-rooms.

Now, is that freedom of election? Can it be said that either of those men had his freedom? Of what avail is it to them to have the franchise if they are not to exercise it? It is said that if they had not a landlord they would vote the other way. That may be so; I cannot search the recesses of their hearts; I cannot know whether they would or would not do so; but all I know is that they had a right to vote, and that according to their own solemn swearing, which is uncontradicted as regards Devine, and corroborated as to the fact as regards Usher and Devine, they were both in the committee-room of Mr. Whitworth, and they never did vote for him during the whole of the election. Mr. Whitworth himself says that he, who heard at the station from Devine that he did not wish to vote for any one, and who says that the moment that he ascertained from a man that he did not want to vote for any one, he declined to attempt to influence him in any way to vote; when he afterwards saw them in his tally-room, said to both those men, "Have you voted?" Now Mr. Whitworth himself says that Devine told him he did not want to vote for any one. Must it not have crossed the mind of Mr. Whitworth as an extraordinary circumstance that he should find that man in his tally-room shortly afterwards? The only way in which Mr. Whitworth can be relieved from all the consequences of that transaction is by supposing that when he turned round at that moment at the station, those lawless persons put that man on a car and carried him off, he saw nothing of those transactions. He says he did not see him, and I believe him; but there was near him at the time his conducting agent. This is no case of a canvasser or of a messenger; but here is the conducting agent, who had been in contact with that lawless mob on the Monday evening, present at the railway station, with a mob brought together by the exhortations of the clergymen on the previous night, counselling them to go down to crush the Orange Catholics at any risk, and to hurl the others into the Boyne.

What takes place after this? The other men come down from Dublin, and are they mere units as regards this constituency? I observe, in going through the evidence, that the names of 18 persons are given (though I cannot now carry them all in my memory) out of 40 whom the officer says that he had to escort up to the court-house. That military gentleman, Captain Daunt, who was very clear in giving his testimony, behaved with singular humanity. But for his forbearance under the greatest provocation, his own life being in danger, knocked down at one time speechless and unconscious, as he described it, I have no doubt whatsoever that there would have been an enormous loss of life in this town. The men, as described yesterday by one of the clergymen, were shaking with agitation; they had their rifles loaded, cocked, and brought to the level. Just fancy the desperate danger that those people are incited to undergo! Who could venture to say that even the remonstrances of a British officer would be sufficient to restrain a man with a loaded rifle cocked in his hand, shaking with agitation? for that is the graphic description given by one of those very clergymen. Captain Daunt says that he formed his men, and that he had 40 voters, he thinks, to conduct to the poll. Mr. Hamilton says there were over 30; he gave the names of some 17 or 18; and he said if he had time given to him he thought he could put down a great many more. Of course it is quite right that counsel should raise every objection as to the number of men, but I have no doubt that every man who went into that hollow square was a voter. What else would bring him there? Is it to imperil his life? Before they arrived at the terminus the station-master runs down a hundred yards, and says, "Are you voters? If you are voters take care of yourselves! Look sharp, and get into one carriage, for there is great danger."

Is that freedom of election? Who are those persons? They are persons in a very superior rank of life. That does not give them a better right to exercise the franchise than the humblest man in the community, but at all events they could not be supposed to be coming there under any coercion to vote for Sir Leopold M'Clintock. They are persons of position in society; they are not accused of having had bludgeons; they are not armed; they have not taken any precaution. The only case of a revolver that was mentioned was in the hands of one of the rioters; and I make no doubt that every man that went into that hollow square that morning was a voter, and that every one who found himself there believed himself to be in imminent peril in order to exercise the franchise which the Legislature had conferred upon him. The officer says, "Keep your men up together, and I will form my men;" and how does he form them? Literally as if he was proceeding into an enemy's country! First there is the troop of Hussars; then there are the 9th Infantry, of whom I think the officer said there were 64; then there are cavalry on the wings, wings, all described in full military phrase. "I covered my rear," he says, "with the Royal Irish Constabulary, and let into this hollow square some 35 or 40 voters," no inconsiderable number at all.

This case has been spoken of as if half-a-dozen men were prevented from voting. The whole constituency numbers 750, and there were from 30 to 40 of them coming up to represent their opinions. Mr. Hamilton says there were 35; but Captain Daunt said he believed he had 40 voters in charge. When the party advances, stones, glass, iron hoops, and iron bars are flung at them; one officer said that the air was thick with weapons flying about in every direction; everybody was struck. One of the Roman Catholic clergymen said here, that he saw but one person bleeding. Why did he see but one person bleeding? Because they all fled in every direction, and took refuge and sought protection wherever they could find it. Was that the only time that the voters were attacked? It was proved to us by Mr. Cairns, that early in the morning, when the voters were coming from the tally rooms, the mob were striking them over the bayonets of the constabulary.

But to continue as to the party of 40. They advanced down this narrow way; the soldiers are all struck; at length Captain Daunt, trying to get to the front, receives one heavy blow on the side, which he says stunned him, but he did not fall; he rallies his men, but he is struck on the side of the head by another stone. Her Majesty's troops, on the requisition of the magistrates, are sent to escort the voters, three officers being in command—Captain Knox in command of the Hussars; Captain Daunt in command of the whole party, and another officer, Captain Jephson. Cavalry, Infantry, and the Royal Irish Constabulary, all are disorganized and knocked about; there is not the slightest respect for authority in any shape or form, and all this was to get at 35 or 40 gentlemen who had committed the dreadful crime of coming down here to exercise the franchise which the laws of the land had given them.

They approached the Bull Ring; one gentleman is struck on the head with, I suppose, about as bad a weapon as ever was hurled from human hand, the butt end of a quart bottle; two Hussars and their horses are tumbled down. How are they tumbled down? A chamber is thrown from a window in the street at one of those horses, and he tumbles, and falling he brings down his comrade who is next. I protest the account appears to me to be more like that of a town taken by storm, than of the exercise of the legitimate privileges of persons calling themselves freemen. What takes place then? As generally happens in these cases, a shot is fired, and an unfortunate man meets his death; and I will be glad to know how the individuals who excited those feelings, not now, but at another time, will reconcile it to themselves that they urged those persons to go up to the railway that morning, and by so doing sent that man to an untimely end. There stark and stiff lay that man upon the bridge, and then the Hussars re-formed; Captain Talbot, the resident magistrate, not called by the sitting Member, though I saw him here in court, at length gives the order to the cavalry to charge, and then the officer says that the rioters fled in every direction, I think he uses the expression, "like rabbits in a warren." Then the infantry rush up at the double, and that scene, as described opposite the court-house, took place. Then the very clergymen who the previous night had exhorted the people, and called upon them to go down to the railway station to be prepared to meet those men, and to crush at any risk the Catholics who dared to support, as they said, the Orange candidate, who called upon them by express terms to go down there, canvassing from the front window of the hotel in which Mr. Whitworth was stopping, come out, and what do they do? One of them raises his hat and calls upon the people to follow him, and he says that, obedient to that tremendous influence which the Catholic clergy exercise, they followed him as one man instantly, he taking them away from the military; for what reason? Because he says he saw the military with their rifles cocked and loaded, and their bodies trembling with agitation, and he did not know but what disastrous consequences would follow. Am I to say that that is freedom of election?

Then what took place with regard to those voters? Some of them are in the Bull Ring, some of them are in the tally-room, some of them come into the court-house, I believe, and some go away altogether. Mr. Filgate, a respectable gentleman, a member of the Bar, who fills the office of secretary to the Lord High Chancellor, comes down from Dublin to register his vote; he is struck on the head; he gets a fearful blow on the head from a man who had a bar of iron in his hand; he is knocked down, and he escapes out of this town, taking good care to avoid all the public ways, getting up to the railway by walking across the lattice bridge, commonly known as the viaduct, over the Boyne; and another gentleman does the same. It is argued that all that is true; but, after the man was shot, and after the clergy drew away the people to protect them from being shot, "At one or two o'clock in the day," says Mr. Whitworth, "I myself went wherever I heard there was a voter who was likely to register his vote against me, and I absolutely offered him my protection, with the high sheriff or somebody else, to take him up to the poll." The whole of that evidence had a most powerful effect upon my mind in the opposite direction to that which it was doubtless intended to produce. Did ever any one hear in a legitimately conducted election, where there was freedom of election, of a man coming and canvassing against himself? Did anyone ever hear of a committee of one candidate going and suggesting to voters in the other interest to come up and poll? "I will give you an escort," says Mr. Whitworth; and can any man say he believes that voters who come from great distances, as one gentleman did, 160 miles at least, from Clew Bay in the west of Ireland to Dublin, and another who came from Waterford to Dublin, whom the Queen's troops, cavalry, infantry, constabulary, magistrates, the whole civil and military power that could be organized in this town, were not able to protect, would be safe in coming up to the poll even with Mr. Whitworth? But if that be so, and if the gentlemen who offered to bring voters up to the poll (Mr. Chadwick was one and Mr. Gradwell was another) had the power of doing what all this military authority could not effect, what is the natural logical conclusion? Why, that the whole of the people of this town were obedient to their nod, and that they could call them off from violence or encourage them on to it at any moment exactly as they thought would best suit the interests of their candidate, and that they only offered this protection when, awaking to a sense of what had been done, they saw that no such election could be declared free, and that every election must be declared void, in which such an intolerable infraction of the liberty of the subject had taken place.

Drogheda.

To my mind the whole of that shows better than any evidence to what a state this town had been brought, and how the dreadful transactions which had taken place operated upon the minds of the persons who were most anxious for Mr. Whitworth's return, when they absolutely went about the town canvassing every man who was supposed to be in the interest of his opponent to come up and register his vote in order to take out of his mouth afterwards the right to say that he had not an opportunity of doing so. I say, if stones are thrown, and shots fired, and bottles hurled, amongst persons coming up to register their votes, they are not bound again to risk their lives in coming to the poll; and if they do not risk their lives they are not precluded from coming before one of the authorised courts of the country to say, "It was not a free election, in which we could not have registered our votes without imminent peril to our existence."

After that the town remains perfectly quiet. This case has perhaps called up as many witnesses as ever were called before a court of justice in a case of this kind; 55 witnesses have been examined, 17 or 18 of whom were examined yesterday for the sitting Member. They have proved that the town was perfectly quiet after that time; I dare say it was. Shortly afterwards it became perfectly quiet; but it is said that from the early morning there was not the slightest hope of Sir Leopold M'Clintock's return, and that Mr. Whitworth felt that there was no election at all, and that he was as certain of being returned as he was of his own existence. I shall presently refer to transactions with which unfortunately Mr. Whitworth has connected himself, even long after that occurrence, most clearly showing to my mind that there was an impression amongst the parties managing this election, that it was possible that this election would go against them, and that, therefore, not trusting to their own intrinsic strength, they are led to do acts which are utterly irreconcilable with freedom of election.

In one case Sir Leopold M'Clintock asked Captain Talbot to give him an escort for the men back to the train; this is after the man was shot, and the troops were withdrawn, and after the people were carried off, I think the clergyman said, to the Whitworth Hall; when Sir Leopold M'Clintock asks Captain Talbot to give him an escort to take the men back, what is the answer of Captain Talbot, even at that time? He declined to do it; he said, "I think it is better to remain until dusk." Such was the impression, even at that time, on the mind of the resident magistrate, who, being here, could have been called, if that were not the fact, to contradict or explain it. He said, "Although I am bound to give you an escort to protect you, still it is better, in my mind, for you to remain here until dusk." Some of them did go back under his protection, and they were very thankful for it. What became of Dr. Breedon? I think it was Mr. Whitworth who came down to protect him up to the poll, and the man was unable to come; he had by that time been carried to bed.

But the whole of this doctrine, that freedom of election consists in the freedom of the majority, is, I say, subversive of the rights of the electors, is contrary to the laws of the land, and is irreconcilable with common sense. Who knows how many voters were induced by terrorism upon that morning to vote for Mr. Whitworth? How can it be told how many were influenced by seeing that the other party were driven out of the field and had not a chance? Did not Mr. Whitworth himself use that very argument to induce voters to poll for him, namely that he had a considerable majority over his opponent? What did he say to Usher and Devine when they were in the tally-rooms? He does not say to Devine, "You said you would not vote for anyone, and I do not want you to do so;" but he makes use of the observation, that they could do without him. They go away in every direction; they see blood streaming down, gores of blood on the railway station, men's heads broken, and one venerable old man, Colonel Fairclough, is described as a gentleman with his white hair streaming down, covered with clots of blood. Dr. Breedon is desperately wounded, and unable to come up. The poor soldiers must stand every sort of treatment: if they disobey their officers they are liable to be punished by military law and brought before a court martial, and they have to undergo the severest penalties; if they obey their officers, they are liable to be tried if any fatal occurrence takes place if they fire unless for the protection of their own lives, or to prevent a felony. Thus they are liable to be punished by both laws, the civil and the military. What was their language while standing there protecting the Queen's subjects? "Are we to be murdered?" "Flesh and blood cannot stand this!" "Are you going, sir," (addressing their officer) "to leave us here to be murdered?" Was that a mere effort of the imagination? There were 64 infantry there, and it is proved that 51 muskets out of the 64 were seriously injured by the shower of stones and weapons flung upon them; four officers and 14 men were badly wounded. One (Serjeant Campbell) is seriously seriously ill even now while I am trying the case, and has never since been out of the hospital. The officer in command of the infantry, as I said before, was knocked down and rendered unconscious. The cavalry charge, and then the mob fly in every direction; there is no more heard; the agents are withdrawn from the booths, and two or three voters come up after that to poll for Sir Leopold McClinton. The rest do not. Some of Mr. Brodigan's voters do not come forward at all; they do not appear at the hustings, but remain at home and do not stir out; and at the end of the day Mr. Whitworth is declared duly elected by a majority of the whole constituency of the free and independent electors, as I suppose we must call them, of the borough of Drogheda.

I am bound to say that was a void election; I cannot avoid saying there was no freedom of election, and I shall certify to the Speaker of the House of Commons that that election was void and that Mr. Whitworth was not duly elected.

But I shall be obliged to go further. Mr. Whitworth has given his evidence, and, as I have said, given it candidly; but if Mr. Whitworth chooses to place himself in the hands of parties who have no discretion, who set no limit to their doings, and who think they can carry with a high hand everything before them, he has to blame himself if he is a sufferer by it. I have said that I declare this to be a void election; that does not affect Mr. Whitworth with any penal consequences; but I am sorry to say that I cannot pass through this inquiry without coming to a resolution which is very penal to Mr. Whitworth. There is one transaction at the station which, in my mind, has not been cleared up, but which remains in all its details, as far as I can see my way to it, established, and that is the case of Devine. If it stood merely upon the case of Usher, Usher, from whatever motive it may have been, having declared to Mr. Whitworth that he was going to vote for him, I would not have seen my way to have come to a conclusion that Mr. Whitworth had exercised any undue influence over that man, because he had in all probability a right to say, "He has declared to vote for me and therefore I am justified in taking him away." But the case of Devine stands upon entirely different grounds; Devine said he would vote for no one. Mr. Whitworth turns away; his agent, being as far as I can see, there present, and immediately this man is seized by the mob; he complains to Mr. Hamilton; he is torn away from him, Mr. Whitworth himself having been in some sort of altercation with Mr. Hamilton. Mr. Hamilton says Mr. Whitworth struck him; Mr. Whitworth says he shoved Mr. Hamilton, or pushed him, on the hand. At all events, the man is carried away lying on his back on a car on the well cushion, and is taken to Mr. Whitworth's committee-rooms; and there, afterwards, Mr. Whitworth finds him. The first question he asks him is, "Have you voted?" Having been informed by the man that he did not want to vote, and being told that he would rather not vote, Mr. Whitworth, says "We can do without him." That is an hour after that dreadful occurrence at the bridge. In my humble opinion, that has not been explained by Mr. Whitworth.

There is another case to which I must also refer, and that is a case which, to my mind, remains unshaken. I refer to the evidence given here by Kelly. Kelly says that he intended to vote for Sir Leopold McClinton; Kelly says he came out on that day for the purpose of voting for Sir Leopold McClinton; he was visited, I think he says, by Father Matthews in the morning; he came out afterwards to vote, and he is in the street, where Father Matthews says to him, "Have you voted?" "I have, sir," he said, there being, as he says, a number of persons all about. "For whom have you voted?" asks Father Matthews. "I have voted for Whitworth," replies Kelly. Father Matthews himself admits that, not believing his statement, and being interested in knowing the truth, he absolutely went into the booth to ascertain whether or not this man had voted for Mr. Whitworth, and that he came out and said (these are his words), "You are a great rascal. You have told me a lie; you did not vote for Mr. Whitworth." He denies that he said anything further to Kelly; and I am quite willing to give him credit that he did not, or that, if he did, he forgot what he had said. But the fact remains unchallenged, that the man told him he had voted for Mr. Whitworth, and he comes out and says, "I called him a rascal" in the presence of the mob; "and I said, 'You have told me a lie.'" Father Matthews says that he did not desire the mob to hold Kelly; but he is held, beyond all doubt, and he is next found in the polling booth. Does that depend upon the evidence of Kelly alone? On the contrary, the check clerk in the booth, Mr. Edward Townley Hardman, says "The man came up in the custody of several persons, there being three clergymen with him, who appeared to me to be coercing him to vote, and the man refused to vote." Kelly himself says that he claimed the protection of the "judge in the court" (that is, I suppose, the sheriff's deputy), and asked him was he to be compelled to vote, and the sheriff's deputy said, "No." Then Kelly leaves the booth and goes downstairs, where those clergymen are with him, and Mr. Whitworth is with those clergymen downstairs. That is proved by Hardman, and by a person of the name of Iddon. He went downstairs, and he passed them, and both those men, Hardman and Iddon, distinctly declare that they heard the word "hell" used, and that they heard one man caution Kelly about losing his bread, he being a baker in the town. The man himself supplemented the testimony of those two witnesses, and he says, "I was taken down there, and one of the clergymen" (he says a Christian Brother) "told them 'Let him go; there is no use in saying anything; but if anything happens to him between this and the time he reaches his house, he will be in hell in five minutes,'" or something of that kind. Mr. Whitworth is at that time in company with the Rev. Mr. Powderley, the

Drogheda.

Rev. Mr. Doyle, and with Mr. O'Donnell, who is not a clergyman, but who is described as being a Christian Brother, and who is dressed as a clergyman. The man says, and Mr. Whitworth doesn't contradict him, that Mr. Whitworth said to him, "Kelly, why will you not vote for me? You know my principles, and I have a large majority at this hour"—there again making use of the majority, which might have been obtained by this very violence and intimidation, to induce this man to vote. That was after the outrage; certainly after the morning outrages, though perhaps not after that dreadful scene at the bridge. But Mr. Whitworth admits that he said that. The man says that what was said was, "Why do you not do as you are desired, or told, or bidden by your clergy?" Now there are three witnesses, Kelly, Hardman, and Iddon, deposing to the use of the word "hell" by some one in that party, in that booth, or in the hall leading up to that booth. This man, having been before in another part of the street or of the town, challenged by Mr. Matthews, and first told he was a rascal and had told a lie, and then having been carried off to the booth, and having had to claim the protection of the deputy sheriff, is taken down and told there what I have already stated, Mr. Whitworth being there present at the time, I cannot arrive at any other conclusion but that Mr. Whitworth is responsible for that transaction; and being so responsible for that transaction, without going further now into the many other minute circumstances of the case, I must arrive at the conclusion that Mr. Whitworth did make those persons who so acted upon that occasion, and those persons who were so engaged with him at the Railway Station, without going at all into the question of constructive agency, his agents, for the purpose of coercing Devine, and for the purpose of coercing Kelly.

Therefore, I come to the conclusion that Mr. Whitworth, within the meaning of the seventh section of the Act of Parliament, has been, by himself and his agents, guilty of undue influence as regards those two men, and I mean so to report to the Speaker of the House of Commons.

That being so, it is not necessary for me to go at any very much greater detail into the case. There has been conflicting evidence as to matters of a very minor description; but I look at the broad facts of this case, and I ask myself, has there been freedom of election in the county of the town of Drogheda? I say at that election there was none. My attention was called to the circumstance of there being other petitions for the county of the town of Drogheda, in which Committees of the House of Commons had come to resolutions that gross violence and intimidation had taken place in the town of Drogheda at previous elections, and had yet not unseated the sitting Member. I am satisfied that in this case there has been gross intimidation and outrageous violence, and I shall declare that the law is not to be violated with impunity.

I have therefore arrived at the following Resolutions:—

1. That Benjamin Whitworth, Esquire, is not duly elected a Burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough and County of the Town of Drogheda.
2. That the last election for said Borough and County of the Town of Drogheda is a void election.
3. That Benjamin Whitworth, Esquire was, by himself, and by his agents, guilty of undue influence as regards two electors, John Devine and Michael Kelly, at the last election for the said Borough and County of the Town of Drogheda.
4. That a system of intimidation was organised and carried out at the last election for the said Borough and County of the Town of Drogheda, subversive of the freedom of election, and outrages were committed which were calculated to deter, and did in fact deter, a considerable number of voters from exercising their franchise at such election.
5. That the costs of the Petition be paid by the Respondent.

GALWAY TOWN ELECTION.

JUDGMENT delivered by Mr. Justice Keogh, 3 March 1869.

Galway Town.

Mr. Justice Keogh.] WE have now at length arrived at the end of this very protracted inquiry, and my first duty is, as it is also my pleasure, to thank the gentlemen of the Bar upon both sides for the great assistance which they have afforded me through the whole of this inquiry. They were led on both sides by gentlemen of great experience and matured wisdom, and I am bound to say that the subordinates and the leaders upon both sides were fully equal to the occasion, and make one justly proud that the position of the Bar at the present day in Ireland is in no respect inferior to that which it occupied at any period in our memory.

I for my own part rejoice most sincerely that this is in all probability the last election petition that I shall have to try. For weeks on weeks we have all been engaged in the discharge of these arduous duties, and it is known to all that only by working very frequently 10 hours a day have I and my learned colleagues in other parts of the country been able to discharge those duties; and even now, unless by that extraordinary labour, I should not have been enabled to open the Queen's Commission in another province and another county, to which I am hastening this day, and where I scarcely hope to be able to arrive in time.

However, as I have said before, the Legislature has thought proper to impose upon us this most arduous and most painful duty, and I for one have performed it without any murmur, not regarding the very certain consequences which I knew would follow upon the faithful discharge of duty in this country. Satisfied from the very first that I should be exposed in doing so, not from one side or the other alone, but from both, to the perhaps not unnatural irritability of those persons in higher positions, whose status has been altered by our decisions, and still more offensively to the attacks of that lower tribe, upon whom you may have conferred a momentary notoriety by drawing them from the corruption on which they battered to the light of day.

I have been addressed in very impassioned tones, not in the slightest degree improper, but yet I say impassioned, by the counsel on both sides. My learned friend, Dr. Seeds, who has for the first time appeared, I believe, in the discharge of professional duties in this part of the country, at the close of his most able address, adjured me to discharge my duties fearlessly, and called upon me to rescue this, which he called my native town, from the disgrace of being handed over as a nomination borough to the clergy of this part of the country. On the other side, I was reminded by my learned friends there that at one time it was the highest pleasure of my life to have been a participator in the councils of the nation in my capacity as a Member of the House of Commons, and I was adjured by all the recollections which I had of that great assemblage, not prematurely to mar the ambition of the two representatives whom I now see before me, who have been chosen once, twice, and another once to be the representatives in Parliament of this ancient borough. It is true that I read my earliest lessons in this town. They were not lessons of servility. It is true that on this circuit I practised for many years, and I think I can say that it was not my habit to turn from the direction of my duty, because of any fear or apprehension whatsoever. I have done my utmost to keep myself clear in this inquiry from any influence, and I candidly confess that I have not had to struggle so much against any apprehension that any unworthy fear could reach my mind of any authority whatsoever, lay or ecclesiastical, no matter how high it may be, as against that of which I was in my heart conscious, namely, the impatience I have ever had of any dictatorial dogmatism, no matter from what quarter it may address itself to me. I should struggle, and I should see that no feeling of that kind prejudiced the cause of either of the parties. To me all the gentlemen engaged in this election are alike. I have had the honour and pleasure of knowing them all; some for a longer, and others for a shorter period. I allude of course to the representatives for the borough and to the gentleman who is the unsuccessful candidate. Mr. O'Flaherty for many years occupied a position in an honourable profession, and did so in a highly honourable manner. I have never heard a word of disparagement of him as a gentleman. He bears in this town and county, famous for its preservation of its old families and its old traditions, a name not second in point of genealogical position to any that I know of. It is no disparagement to Sir Rowland Blennerhassett, that he is not personally connected with this town and county, but that he comes from a neighbouring province. Neither the law of the land, nor the custom of this part of the country, makes that a disqualification for seeking the representation of this borough. It is not so long back but that we can all recall the time when this borough was represented by a gentleman who came from far away, and of whom, as he is absent, I will only say that he did not carry in his train peace or plenty to the people of Galway, though he was once their idol. Of the other representative for the borough, Lord St. Lawrence, it is scarcely necessary, and it may almost seem impertinent, for me to say a word. Mr. O'Flaherty himself in handsome and becoming terms upon that chair spoke the truth when he said that Lord St. Lawrence could in no sense be considered an intruder into this borough. Connected with the county, and by great possessions it was becoming in Mr. O'Flaherty to say that he considered Lord St. Lawrence's candidature almost a proper one. He bore testimony to the manner in which Lord St. Lawrence had demeaned himself during the whole of this contest, and he put the final touch to his praise when he stated that he had himself canvassed every independent elector whom he could influence to give his second vote to the noble Lord. Mr. Macdonogh said that Lord St. Lawrence might almost be considered the legitimate successor of a relative of his, whose name I cannot now, in an assemblage of Galway men, mention without emotion. It seems almost but as yesterday since in this very courthouse, after a long estrangement, he extended to me his generous hand. What talents and what accomplishments were his! The very least thing you could say of him was to call to mind that he was descended from a long line of illustrious ancestors upon the one side, and that upon the other he almost immediately represented one of the greatest orators, statesmen, and unto whom this country has often, so often, contributed to the parent State (George Canning). Every one who knew Lord Dunkellin loved him, and I believe he was mourned by all.

"Nec puer Iliacâ quisquam de gente Latinos
In Fantum spe tollet avos; nec Romulas quondam
Ullo se tantum tellus jactabit alumno."

If Lord Dunkellin himself were here (as would to God he were), though I might have owed some reparation, if not to him to his, for words spoken in the heat of advocacy, yet I could not have yielded to any such consideration, and I must have held, as I did hold in Sligo, that to me was given no prerogative of pardon in these inquiries.

Having made these remarks, I now approach the subject matter of this petition. The constituency, as I see by a return before me, is in all 1,421. Of those there voted at the last election 826 for Lord St. Lawrence, who was at the head of the poll 804 for Sir Rowland Blennerhassett, 432 for Mr. O'Flaherty, and 213 for Captain Ottard. I have before me an analysis of those voters, and whilst I think the freemen are altogether 449 in number, I observe that 312 of those voted for Sir Rowland Blennerhassett, 282 for Lord St. Lawrence, 65 for Captain Ottard, and 118 for Mr. O'Flaherty. But if you were to deduct the whole of those freemen, the state of the poll would stand thus, that Lord St. Lawrence would be in a majority of 230 over Mr. O'Flaherty, that Sir Rowland Blennerhassett would be in a majority of 178 or 180 over Mr. O'Flaherty, and that leaving out the freemen altogether, each of the present representatives would have been in an overwhelming majority on the poll.
